

FOREIGN RELATIONS
OF THE UNITED STATES

1961–1963
VOLUMES X/XI/XII

AMERICAN REPUBLICS;
CUBA 1961–1962; CUBAN MISSILE CRISIS AND AFTERMATH

MICROFICHE SUPPLEMENT

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Washington

Foreign Relations of the
United States, 1961–1963

Volumes X/XI/XII

American Republics;
Cuba 1961–1962;
Cuban Missile Crisis and Aftermath

Microfiche
Supplement

Editors Edward C. Keefer
Louis J. Smith
Charles S. Sampson
General Editor David S. Patterson

Department of State
Washington
1998

Department of State Publication 10437
Bureau of Public Affairs
Office of the Historian

Preface

The Foreign Relations of the United States series presents the official documentary historical record of major foreign policy decisions and significant diplomatic activity of the United States Government. The series documents the facts and events that contributed to the formulation of policies and includes evidence of supporting and alternative views to the policy positions ultimately adopted.

The Historian of the Department of State is charged with the responsibility for the preparation of the Foreign Relations series. The staff of the Office of the Historian, Bureau of Public Affairs, plans, researches, compiles, and edits the volumes in the series. This documentary editing proceeds in full accord with the generally accepted standards of historical scholarship. Official regulations codifying specific standards for the selection and editing of documents for the series were first promulgated by Secretary of State Frank B. Kellogg on March 26, 1925. These regulations, with minor modifications, guided the series through 1991.

A new statutory charter for the preparation of the series was established by Public Law 102–138, the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1992 and 1993, which was signed by President George Bush on October 28, 1991. Section 198 of P.L. 102–138 added a new Title IV to the Department of State’s Basic Authorities Act of 1956 (22 USC 4351, et seq.).

The statute requires that the Foreign Relations series be a thorough, accurate, and reliable record of major United States foreign policy decisions and significant United States diplomatic activity. The volumes of the series should include all records needed to provide comprehensive documentation of major foreign policy decisions and actions of the United States Government. The statute also confirms the editing principles established by Secretary Kellogg: the Foreign Relations series is guided by the principles of historical objectivity and accuracy; records should not be altered or deletions made without indicating in the published text that a deletion has been made; the published record should omit no facts that were of major importance in reaching a decision; and nothing should be omitted for the purposes of concealing a defect in policy. The statute also requires that the Foreign Relations series be published not more than 30 years after the events recorded. The editors are convinced that this microfiche supplement, which was compiled in 1990–1992, meets all regulatory, statutory, and scholarly standards of selection and editing.

IV Preface

Structure and Scope of the Foreign Relations Series

This supplement is part of a subseries of the Foreign Relations series for the years 1961–1963. The subseries presents in 25 print volumes and 5 microfiche supplements a documentary record of major foreign policy decisions and actions of President Kennedy's administration. The record of U.S. policy toward Cuba and its international ramifications, including the events and policy discussions attending the failed invasion at the Bay of Pigs in 1961 and the Cuban missile crisis of October 1962, is presented in Foreign Relations, 1961–1963, volume X, Cuba, 1961–1962 and volume XI, Cuban Missile Crisis and Aftermath. Foreign Relations, 1961–1963, volume XII presents the record of U.S. foreign policy toward Argentina, Brazil, British Guiana, Dominican Republic, Haiti, Panama, and Peru as well as documentation on U.S. involvement in the establishment of the Alliance for Progress and U.S. policies regarding Latin American security issues.

The microfiche publication presents additional documents that supplement the printed record on policies with respect to Cuba. The publication also includes documents on U.S. policies toward Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Jamaica, Mexico, and Venezuela that deserve to be published in the Foreign Relations series but because of space limitations cannot be included in the printed volume. Of particular importance are 1960 documents on the planning for the Bay of Pigs operation that were not included in the 1958–1960 Cuba volume, notes based on meetings of President Kennedy and the Joint Chiefs of Staff during the missile crisis, additional intelligence on the missile crisis and aftermath, and the formal appraisal of the Bay of Pigs operation by the CIA Inspector General including the internal commentary that it generated within the Central Intelligence Agency.

Sources for the Foreign Relations Series

The Foreign Relations statute requires that the published record in the Foreign Relations series include all records needed to provide comprehensive documentation on major foreign policy decisions and actions of the U.S. Government. It further requires that government agencies, departments, and other entities of the U.S. Government cooperate with the Department of State Historian by providing full and complete access to records pertinent to foreign policy decisions and actions and by providing copies of selected records. In preparing the documentation in this microfiche regarding policies toward Cuba, the editors benefited from unprecedented access to the records of the CIA as well as from the assistance of the CIA's Center for the Study of Intelligence. The preparation of the other portions of this microfiche documenting aspects of U.S. policy toward 11 Western Hemisphere nations was carried out prior to the expansion of access for State Department historians in CIA records developed in cooperation with the CIA History Staff. That portion of the microfiche therefore does not reflect the range of intelligence activities and information comparable to that presented with respect to Cuba.

The editors had complete access to all the retired records and papers in the Department of State including certain intelligence-related files maintained in the Bureau of Intelligence and Research for the Cuba supplement.

The editors of the Foreign Relations series also had access to the papers of President Kennedy and other White House foreign policy records at the John F. Kennedy Library. The records maintained and preserved there include some of the most significant foreign affairs-related documentation from other federal agencies. Department of State historians also had full access to records of the Department of Defense, particularly the records of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Secretary of Defense and his major assistants.

The Central Intelligence Agency currently provides access for Department historians to high-level and working-level intelligence documents from those records still in the custody of that Agency. Department historians' access is arranged by the History Staff of the Center for the Study of Intelligence, Central Intelligence Agency. The development of this access arrangement coincided with the research of many of the volumes for the 1961–1963 triennium. The documents included here for volumes X and XI reflect this expanded access to intelligence records, which was undertaken with the invaluable cooperation of the Central Intelligence Agency History Staff of the Center for the Study of Intelligence. The research of documents for the microfiche supplement for volume XII was completed before such expanded access was achieved. The editors decided to proceed to publication with what documentation had already been acquired rather than delay the supplement's publication further beyond the 30-year line.

The List of Sources (pages 1–11) lists the files consulted both in government repositories and in private collections for the print volumes and the microfiche supplement.

Principles of Document Selection for the Foreign Relations Series

In preparing each volume of the Foreign Relations series, the editors are guided by some general principles for the selection of documents. Each editor, in consultation with the General Editor and other senior editors, determines the particular issues and topics to be documented either in detail, in brief, or in summary. Some general decisions are also made regarding issues that cannot be documented in the volume but will be addressed in a microfiche supplement or in bibliographical notes.

Scope and Focus of Documents Researched and Selected for the Microfiche Supplement to Foreign Relations, 1961–1963, Volumes X, XI, and XII

The research for print volumes X and XI was completed in 1996. The research for volume XII and the American Republics compilations in the microfiche supplement was completed in 1992. The principles of selection followed by the editors for the print volumes are described in the prefaces of those volumes. The volumes may be used without this supplement, but the supplement should be used in conjunction with the printed volumes.

The documents selected for this microfiche publication by the editors of volumes X and XI provide additional details on the major issues covered, as well as selected documents of less than major significance not chosen for inclusion in the print volumes. This supplement also includes several lengthy attachments to printed documents for which there was no space in the respective volumes. The microfiche supplement to volume XII is different in that it includes the primary selections for U.S. policy toward countries that were not included in the print volume. The Office of the Historian determined that the documentary record of certain episodes in U.S. relations with and policies taken during the Kennedy Presidency toward Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Jamaica, Mexico, and Venezuela were important for a complete and accurate record of policies with regard to the Western Hemisphere and would be adequately available to users of the Foreign Relations series published in a microfiche supplement. The determination by no means implies that these 11 nations were any less important to the United States and its interests abroad. It means only that in the Kennedy Presidency foreign policy problems and episodes elsewhere in the hemisphere were more urgent and took more of the President's time and attention and that of his advisers. For this reason the editors decided to focus on publishing the documentary record of these events and policies in the print volume. The documents assembled in this fiche publication regarding policies for the 11 countries were compiled as if they were to be published in printed form. They have, however, not been edited or annotated in any way.

The List of Documents, which includes for each document a title, date, participants (for memoranda of conversation), from/to information, classification, number of pages, and source citation, as well as a one-sentence summary, is part of this printed guide and appears on the first two microfiche cards. The printed guide also includes Lists of Sources, Abbreviations, and Persons.

Advisory Committee on Historical Diplomatic Documentation

The Advisory Committee on Historical Diplomatic Documentation, established under the Foreign Relations statute, reviews records, advises, and makes recommendations concerning the Foreign Relations series. The Advisory Committee monitors the overall compilation and editorial process of the series and advises on all aspects of the preparation and declassification of the series. Although the Advisory Committee does not attempt to review the contents of individual volumes in the series, it does monitor the overall process and makes recommendations on particular problems that come to its attention. The Advisory Committee did not review this microfiche supplement.

Declassification Review

The final declassification review of this microfiche supplement resulted in the decision to withhold 1 percent from volume X (no documents denied), 2 percent from volume XI (2 documents denied), and 1 percent from volume XII (4 documents denied). The remaining documents, together with the documents published in the printed volumes, provide an accurate account of the foreign policy issues confronting, and the policies undertaken by the U.S. Government concerning Cuba and the American Republics during this period.

The former Division of Historical Documents Review of the Office of Freedom of Information, Privacy, and Classification Review, Bureau of Administration, Department of State, conducted the declassification review of the documents published in this volume. The review was conducted in accordance with the standards set forth in Executive Order 12356 on National Security Information, which was superseded by Executive Order 12958 on April 20, 1995, and applicable laws.

Under Executive Order 12356, information that concerns one or more of the following categories, and the disclosure of which reasonably could be expected to cause damage to the national security, requires classification:

- 1) military plans, weapons, or operations;
- 2) the vulnerabilities or capabilities of systems, installations, projects, or plans relating to the national security;
- 3) foreign government information;
- 4) intelligence activities (including special activities), or intelligence sources or methods;

- 5) foreign relations or foreign activities of the United States;
- 6) scientific, technological, or economic matters relating to national security;
- 7) U.S. Government programs for safeguarding nuclear materials or facilities;
- 8) cryptology; or
- 9) a confidential source.

The principle guiding declassification review is to release all information, subject only to the current requirements of national security as embodied in law and regulation. Declassification decisions entailed concurrence of the appropriate geographic and functional bureaus in the Department of State, other concerned agencies of the U.S. Government, and the appropriate foreign governments regarding specific documents of those governments.

Acknowledgements

The editors wish to acknowledge the assistance of the federal agencies, particularly the National Archives and Records Administration, for their cooperation in granting access to their records. They also thank officials at the John F. Kennedy Library, in particular Suzanne Forbes, and the officials at the Lyndon B. Johnson Library of the National Archives and Records Administration, the History Staff at the Central Intelligence Agency, especially Mary McAuliffe, Vivienne Manber at the U.S. Mission to the United Nations, and other officials of specialized repositories who assisted in the collection of documents for this volume.

Louis J. Smith did the research for the supplement to volumes X and XI, and he and Charles S. Sampson selected the documents through the Cuban missile crisis. Edward C. Keefer selected the documents beginning with November 1962 through to the end of 1963. W. Taylor Fain III did the research for volume XII, and he, Edward C. Keefer, and David W. Mabon made the selections for the individual compilations. Taylor Fain selected documents for Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Jamaica, Mexico, and Venezuela; Edward Keefer selected documents for El Salvador and Honduras; and David Mabon selected documents for Guatemala. All editors worked under the general supervision of then Editor in Chief John P. Glennon. Vicki E. Futscher prepared the List of Documents.

X Preface

William Z. Slany
The Historian
Bureau of Public Affairs

July 1998

Contents

Preface.....	III
List of Sources	1
List of Abbreviations	12
List of Persons	23
Summary of Print Volume X.....	31
Summary of Print Volume XI.....	50
List of Documents.....	66

List of Sources

Department of State

Decimal Central Files. Through January 1963 the Department of State continued to use the decimal central files system. All the following Central File records are part of Record Group 59 and are located in National Archives and Records Administration II in College Park, Maryland.

- 152: special missions to Central and South America
- 601.6111: diplomatic representation between the United States and Soviet Union
- 611.12: U.S. relations with Mexico
- 611.1231: U.S. boundaries with Mexico
- 611.12322: U.S.-Mexico, diversion of international waters
- 611.12323: U.S.-Mexico, international waterways
- 611.14: U.S. relations with Guatemala
- 611.16: U.S. relations with El Salvador
- 611.18: U.S. relations with Costa Rica
- 611.21: U.S. relations with Colombia
- 611.24: U.S. relations with Bolivia
- 611.25: U.S. relations with Chile
- 611.31: U.S. relations with Venezuela
- 611.37: U.S. relations with Cuba
- 611.3722: U.S. blockade of Cuba
- 611.61: U.S.-Soviet Union political relations
- 712.00: political affairs and conditions in Mexico
- 712.5621: sale of naval vessels to Mexico
- 714.00: political affairs and conditions in Guatemala
- 714.5622: sale of aircraft to Guatemala
- 715.00: political affairs and conditions in Honduras
- 715.04: Honduras' flag
- 715.11: chief executive of Honduras
- 715.5: Honduras' defense affairs
- 716.0: political affairs and conditions in El Salvador
- 716.02: recognition of the Government of El Salvador
- 718.00: political affairs and conditions in Costa Rica
- 721.11: chief executive of Columbia
- 721.5-MSP: U.S. military assistance to Columbia
- 722.00: political affairs and conditions in Ecuador
- 722.5-MSP: U.S. military assistance to Ecuador

722.58: visits of Ecuador military
724.00: political affairs and conditions in Bolivia
725.00: political affairs and conditions in Chile
725.5–MSP: U.S. military assistance to Chile
731.00: political affairs and conditions in Venezuela
737.00: political affairs and conditions in Cuba
737.5211: U.S. intelligence activities in Cuba
737.56311: U.S. bases in Cuba
737.56361: Soviet bases in Cuba
760.551: Eastern European military personnel
761.00: political conditions in the Soviet Union
782.56311: U.S. bases in Turkey
811.10: U.S. economic relations with the Western Hemisphere
815.16: land ownership in Honduras
816.10: El Salvador financial matters
818.00: economic conditions in Costa Rica
818.10: financial matters in Costa Rica
818.13: Costa Rica's monetary system
818.18: Costa Rican immigration and emigration
818.235: Costa Rican sugar
822.10: economic conditions in Ecuador

Central Files: In February 1963 the Department of State changed its decimal central files to a subject-numeric central file system. The following Central Files are located in Record Group 59 at National Archives and Records Administration II, College Park, Maryland.

AID (US) BOLIVIA: U.S. economic assistance to Bolivia
POL COL: general political affairs in Colombia
POL COSTA RICA-CUBA: general Costa Rican-Cuban relations
POL CUBA: general policy towards Cuba
POL CUBA-USSR: Soviet Union-Cuba relations
POL EL SAL: general political affairs in El Salvador
POL GUAT: general political affairs in Guatemala
POL GUAT-US: general U.S.–Guatemalan relations
POL 2 GUAT: general reports on Guatemala
POL 12 CHILE: political parties in Chile

POL 14 CHILE: elections in Chile
POL 15 GUAT: Government of Guatemala
POL 15 HOND: Government of Honduras
POL 15-1 COSTA RICA: head of state of Costa Rica
POL 15-1 US/KENNEDY: documentation relating to President Kennedy
POL 17 COL: U.S. diplomatic and consular representation with Colombia
POL 23 COL: internal security in Colombia
POL 26 HOND: coups in Honduras
POL 27 CUBA-US: military operations between the United States and the Soviet Union
POL 30-2 CUBA: Cuban exile political activities
POL 32-1 MEX-US: Mexican territorial disputes with the United States
POL 33-1 MEX-US: Mexican-U.S. rivers
POL 36 CUBA: travel control to and from Cuba

Lot Files: These are the special decentralized files of the policymaking level of the Department of State, including the Executive Secretariat, overseas Foreign Service posts, and U.S. special missions. The following Lot Files are located in Record Group 59 at National Archives and Records Administration II, College Park, Maryland.

ARA Files: Lot 62 D 24

Files of the Special Assistant, Bureau of Inter-American Affairs for 1961.

ARA/CCA Files: Lot 63 D 402

Files of the Officer in Charge of Cuban Affairs for 1961.

ARA/CCA Files: Lot 65 D 256

Files of the Officer in Charge of Cuban Affairs for 1962.

ARA/CCA Files: Lot 66 D 501

Files of the Coordinator of Cuban Affairs for 1964 including top secret material from 1961-1963.

Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272

Files of Under Secretary of State George Ball, 1961-1966, including transcripts of his telephone conversations.

INR/IL Historical Files

Files of the Office of Intelligence Coordination, containing records from the 1940s through the 1980s, maintained by the Office of Intelligence Liaison, Bureau of Intelligence and Research

INR/SEE Files: Lot 90 D 321

Latin American files of the Office of Soviet and East European Analysis, Bureau of Intelligence and Research, for the years 1960–1985.

Presidential Correspondence: Lot 66 D 204

Exchanges of correspondence between the President and heads of foreign governments, as well as certain correspondence of the Secretary of State, for 1953–1964 as maintained by the Executive Secretariat.

Presidential Correspondence: Lot 77 D 163

Exchanges of correspondence between the President with the leaders of the Soviet Union, 1961–1964, the so-called “Pen Pal” correspondence. Also contains drafts of messages and memoranda to the President and Secretary of State about the correspondence.

President’s Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149

A chronological record of cleared memoranda of conversations with foreign visitors for 1956–1964 as maintained by the Executive Secretariat.

Rusk Files: Lot 72 D 192

Files of Secretary of State Dean Rusk, 1961–1969, including texts of speeches and public statements, miscellaneous correspondence files, White House correspondence, chronological files, and memoranda of telephone conversations.

Secretary’s Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 330

Memoranda of the Secretary’s and Under Secretary’s conversations for 1961–1964 as maintained by the Executive Secretariat.

Secretary's Staff Meetings: Lot 66 D 147

Records of the Secretary of State's staff meetings, 1961–1963, and additional ad hoc meetings, reports, papers, and memoranda of Chester Bowles' telephone conversations.

S/P–NSC Files: Lot 62 D 1

Serial and subject master file of National Security Council documents and correspondence for the years 1945–1961, maintained by the Policy Planning Staff.

S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438

Principal Department of State lot file on the Cuban missile crisis, October 1962–January 1963, as maintained by the Executive Secretariat. Also contains background material from 1961 and 1962, including documentation on Operation Mongoose.

S/S Files: Lot 70 D 265

National Security Council meetings, policy papers, position papers, and administrative documents for the years 1961–1965, maintained by the Executive Secretariat.

S/S–NSC Files: Lot 72 D 316

Department of State copies of National Security Action Memorandum (NSAM's) and related materials.

S/S–NSC (Miscellaneous) Files: Lot 66 D 95

Administrative and miscellaneous National Security Council files, including NSC Records of Action, for the years 1947–1963, maintained by the Executive Secretariat.

State/JCS Meetings: Lot 70 D 328

Records of meetings between representatives of the Department of State and the members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff for the years 1959–1963, maintained by the Executive Secretariat.

U. Alexis Johnson Files: Lot 90 D 410

Official and personal files covering the years 1958–1973. Includes files dealing with Johnson's tenure as Deputy Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs, 1961–1966.

U.S. Mission to the United Nations Files

NYFRC 84–84–001/002, Secret and Top Secret records of the U.S. Mission to the United Nations with extensive material on the post-missile crisis negotiations.

Central Intelligence Agency

Cuban Files, Job 80–D0167R

DCI Files: Job 54–00499R

Files of the History Staff.

DCI Files: Job 85–00664R

Files of the History Staff, an extensive collection dealing with the Bay of Pigs invasion.

DCI Files: Job 91–00741R

Files of the Office of the Director of Central Intelligence.

DCI (Dulles) Files: Job 80–B0176R

Files of Allen W. Dulles as Director of Central Intelligence, 1953–1961.

DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B1285A

Files of John C. McCone as Director of Central Intelligence, 1961–1965.

DDI Files: Job 79–R1012A

The Deputy Directorate for Intelligence's registry of National Intelligence and Special Intelligence estimates.

DDI Files: Job 80–R01386R

Files of the Office of the Deputy Director for Intelligence.

DDI Files: Job 89–T01385R

Files of the Office of the Deputy Director for Intelligence.

DDO/DDP Files: Job 64–00352R

Files of the Office of the Deputy Director for Plans covering 1960.

DDO/DDP Files: Job 67–01083R

Chronological files of C. Tracy Barnes, 1959–1964.

DDO/DDP Files: Job 78–01450R

Files of the Office of the Deputy Director for Plans covering 1961.

DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 52–00679R

Files of the Covert Collection Staff of the Western Hemisphere Division, including materials prepared for the Taylor Committee and records of Special Group meetings relating to Cuba.

DDO/WH Files: Job 73–00853R

Files dealing with liaison between the Western Hemisphere Division and the Department of State, 1955–1966.

HS/HC Files: Job 84–00499R

Central Intelligence Agency History Staff's source collection.

ODDI Registry NIEs and SNIEs: Job 79–R01012A

Copies of National Intelligence Estimates and Special National Intelligence Estimate.

O/D/NFAC Files: Job 80–R1386R

Files of the Deputy Directorate for Intelligence.

Department of Defense

Office of the Historian, Historian's Office, Secretary of Defense's Cable Files

Telegrams to and from the Secretary of Defense as maintained by the Office of the Historian, Department of Defense.

Dwight D. Eisenhower Library, Abilene, Kansas

Herter Papers

Records of Christian A. Herter for 1957–1961.

Project Clean Up Records

Project Clean Up collection. Records of Gordon Gray, Robert Cutler, H. Romer McPhee, and Andrew J. Goodpaster.

White House Office Files

Several White House office collections, including files of the Office of the Staff Secretary, and Project Clean Up, and files of the Office of the Special Assistant for National Security Affairs.

Whitman File

Papers of Dwight D. Eisenhower as President of the United States, 1953–1961, maintained by his personal secretary, Ann Whitman. The Whitman File includes the following elements: Name series, Dulles–Herter series, Eisenhower Diaries, Ann Whitman (ACW Diaries), National Security Council Records, Miscellaneous Records, Cabinet Papers, Legislative Meetings, International Meetings, Administrative Series, and International File.

Lyndon B. Johnson Library, Austin, Texas

National Security File, Country File, Cuba

Rusk Appointment Books

Vice Presidential Security File

John F. Kennedy Library, Boston, Massachusetts

National Security Files:

Brubeck Series

Chester V. Clifton Series

Countries Series: Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Jamaica, Mexico, Venezuela, USSR

Meetings and Memoranda Series: National Security Council Meetings, Executive Committee Meetings, Standing Group Meetings, National Security Action Memoranda

Regional Series

President's Appointment Books

President's Office Files: Countries

Presidential Recordings

Staff Memoranda

Papers of George Ball

Papers of Roger Hilsman

Papers of Robert F. Kennedy

Papers of Arthur Schlesinger, Jr.

Papers of Theodore Sorensen

National Defense University, Fort McNair, Washington, D.C.

Lemnitzer Papers

Papers of General Lyman L. Lemnitzer, Chief of Staff of the Army, 1959–1960; Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, 1961–1962.

Taylor Papers

Papers of General Maxwell D. Taylor, Chief of Staff of the Army, 1955–1959; Military Advisor to the President 1961–1962; Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, 1962–1964.

United States Mission to the United Nations, New York

USUN Files: NYFRC 84–84–002

Files of the U.S. Mission to the United Nations, 1950 to date.

National Archives and Records Administration, Washington, D.C.

Record Group 59, Records of the Department of State

S/P Files: Lot 67 D 548

Records of the Policy Planning Staff for 1957–1961.

S/S Files: Lot 67 D 396

Master file of Guidelines for Policy and Operations prepared by S/P from November 1961 to May 1966.

Task Force on Latin American Files: Lot 61 D 298

Minutes of the Task Force on Latin America for 1961.

Record Group 323, JFK Collection

Washington National Records Center, Suitland, Maryland

Record Group 330, Records of the Office of the Secretary of Defense

McNamara Files: FRC 71 A 3470

Files of Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara, 1961–1968.

OASD (C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896

Principal file on the Cuban missile crisis as maintained by the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Administration. Includes files of the Secretary of Defense, the Deputy Secretary of Defense, and the Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs. Contains some background documents from the pre-crisis period.

OASD/ISA Files: FRC 64 A 2382

General and country files of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs for 1961.

OASD/ISA Files: FRC 69 A 3501

General and country files of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs for 1962.

OSD Files: FRC 65 A 3464

Files of the Secretary and Deputy Secretary of Defense and their Special Assistants for 1961.

OSD Files: FRC 66 A 3542

Files of the Secretary and Deputy Secretary of Defense and their Special Assistants for 1962.

OSD Files: FRC 77–0131

Office of the Secretary of Defense, Foreign Policy Files, 1962–1972

Princeton University, Princeton, New Jersey

Allen Dulles Papers
Stevenson Papers

Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut

Bowles Papers

Naval Historical Center, Washington, D.C.

Area Files

Bumpy Road Materials: Papers of Admiral Arleigh
Burke, Chief of Naval Operations, 1955–1961.

List of Abbreviations

AA, aircraft artillery
AAA, anti-aircraft artillery
AAM, air-to-air missiles
Abn Div, Airborne division
ACDA, Arms Control and Disarmament Agency
ACSI, Assistant Chief of Staff, Intelligence
AEC, Atomic Energy Commission
AEW, Aircraft Early Warning Station
AEW&C Det, Airborne Early Warning and Control Detachment
AF, Bureau of African Affairs, Department of State
AFB, Air Force Base
AFCIN, Air Force Intelligence
AFL-CIO, American Federation of Labor–Congress of Industrial Organizations
A-4D, Skyhawk, U.S. single engine turbojet attack aircraft
AFP, Alliance for Progress
AFTF, Air Force Task Force
AG, Attorney General
AID, Agency for International Development
AJOC, Alternative Joint Communications Center (Air Force)
AJR, Asociación de Juventud Rebelde (Association of Rebel Youth)
ALTCOMLANT, Alternate Commander, Atlantic (Navy)
Amb., Ambassador
ammo, ammunition amphib, amphibious
ANG, Air National Guard
AR, American Republics
ARA, Bureau of Inter-American Affairs, Department of State
ARA/CCA, Office of the Coordinator for Cuban Affairs, Bureau of Inter-American Affairs, Department of State
ARA/CMA, Office of Caribbean and Mexican Affairs, Bureau of Inter-American Affairs, Department of State
ARA/RPA, Office of Inter-American Regional Political Affairs, Bureau of Inter-American Affairs, Department of State
ARC, American Red Cross
Armd Cav Regt, Armored Cavalry Regiment

ARS, aerial reconnaissance and security
ASAP, as soon as possible
ASW, Anti-Submarine Warfare
AWOL, absent without leave

BLT, Battalion Landing Team
Bn, battalion
Brig Hq., Brigade Headquarters
BW/CW, Biological Warfare/Chemical Warfare

CA, Central America
CAB, Civil Aeronautics Board
CAP, Combat Air Patrol
CCA, Office of the Coordinator of Cuban Affairs
CEF, Cuban Expeditionary Force
CENTO, Central Treaty Organization
CF, Central Files of the Department of State
CGCONARC, Commanding General, Continental Army Command
CGUSACARIB, Commanding General, U.S. Army, Caribbean
CGUSARLANT, Commanding General, U.S. Army, Atlantic
CGUSCONARC, Commanding General, U.S. Continental Army Command
ChiCom, Chinese Communist
CI, counter-intelligence; counter insurgency
CIA, Central Intelligence Agency
CINCAFLANT, Commander in Chief, U.S. Air Force, Atlantic
CINCARIB, Commander in Chief, U.S. Army, Caribbean
CINCARLANT, Commander in Chief, U.S. Army, Atlantic
CINCEUR, Commander in Chief, U.S. Forces, Europe
CINCLANT, Commander in Chief, U.S. Forces, Atlantic CINCLANTFLT, Commander in Chief, Atlantic Fleet
CINCONAD, Commander in Chief, Continental Air Defense Command
CINCPAC, Commander in Chief, Pacific
CINCSTRIKE, Commander in Chief, Strike Command
CJTF, Commander, Joint Task Force
CMA, Office of Caribbean and Mexican Affairs, Bureau of Inter-American Affairs, Department of State
CMC, Commandant, United States Marine Corps

CNO, Chief of Naval Operations
C.O., Commanding Officer
COAS, Council of the Organization of American States
COCOM, Coordinating Committee of the Paris Consultative Group of Nations
COMAFTASKOR, Commander, Air Force Task Force
COMANTDEFCON, Commander, Antilles Defense Command
COMCARIBSEAFRON, Commander, Caribbean Sea Frontier
COMFAIRJAX, Commander, Fleet Air, Jacksonville, Florida
COMINT, Communications Intelligence
COMJTF, Commander, Joint Task Force
COMKWESTFOR, Commander, Key West Forces
COMNAVBASE GTMO, Commander, Naval Base, Guantanamo
COMNAVTF, Commander, Naval Task Force
COMOR, Committee on Overhead Reconnaissance
COMSECONDFLT, Commander, Second Fleet
COMSTS, Commander, Sea Transportation Service
COMTAC, Commander, Tactical Air Command
CONAD, Continental Air Defense Command
Contel, Consulate telegram
CONUS, continental United States
COSAC, Commanding Officer, Strategic Air Command
CRC, Consejo Revolucionario Cubano, Cuban Revolutionary Council
CTC, Confederacion de Trabajadores Cubanos, Confederation of Cuban Workers
CTG, Commander, Special Task Group
CVA, attack aircraft carrier
CW, chemical warfare

DCI, Director of Central Intelligence
DCM, Deputy Chief of Mission
DD/P, Office of the Deputy Director for Plans, Central Intelligence Agency
DEFCON(s), Defense condition(s)
Dels, Delegations
Depcirtel, Department of State circular telegram
Dept, Department of State

Deptel, Department of State telegram
DIA, Defense Intelligence Agency
DIO, District Intelligence Officer
DIRNSA, Director, National Security Agency
Div, Division
DLF, Development Loan Fund
DO, destroyer
DOD, Department of Defense
DOS, Department of State
DR, Directorio Revolucionario, Revolutionary Directorate
DRE, Directorio Revolucionario Estudiantil, Student Revolutionary Directorate
DTG, date-time group (date and exact time on telegrams)
DZ, drop zone

ECE, Economic Commission for Europe
ECLA, United Nations Council on Latin America
ELINT, electronic intelligence
Embdes, Embassy despatch
Embtel, Embassy telegram
EMC, electronic countermeasures
ETA, estimated time of arrival
EUR, Bureau of European Affairs, Department of State
EUR/BNA, Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs, Bureau of European Affairs, Department of State
EUR/SOV, Office of Soviet Union Affairs, Bureau of European Affairs, Department of State
EW, early warning
ExCom, Executive Committee
Eyes Only, document to be read only by individuals with a need-to-know

FA, Field Artillery
FAA, Federal Aviation Agency
FA Bn, Field Artillery Battalion
FBI, Federal Bureau of Investigation
FBIS, Foreign Broadcast Information Service
FMF, Fleet Marine Force
FMFLANT, Fleet Marine Force, Atlantic fol, following

FonMin, Foreign Minister

FonOff, Foreign Office

FRC, Federal Records Center

FRO, Frente Revolucionario Democrático, Democratic Revolutionary Front

FROGS, Free Over Ground tactical rockets (Soviet luna rockets)

FY, fiscal year

FYI, for your information

G-2, Army General Staff section dealing with intelligence at the divisional level or higher

GA, United Nations General Assembly

GNP, gross national product

GOA, Government of Argentina

GOB, Government of Brazil; Government of Bolivia

GOC, Government of Cuba; Government of Chile; Government of Colombia; Good Offices Committee

GOCR, Government of Costa Rica

GOE, Government of Ecuador

GOES, Government of El Salvador

GOF, Government of France

GOG, Government of Guatemala

GOH, Government of Haiti; Government of Honduras

GOJ, Government of Jamaica

GOM, Government of Mexico

GOT, Government of Turkey

GOV, Government of Venezuela

govt, government

GSA, General Services Administration

GTI, Office of Greek, Turkish, and Iranian Affairs, Bureau of European Affairs, Department of State

Gtmo, Guantanamo

Guat, Guatemala

GUS, Government of the United States

HEW, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare

HMG, Her Majesty's Government

IA, Inter-American

IA-ECOSOC, Inter-American Economic and Social Council of the United Nations

IADB, Inter-American Development Bank
ICA, International Cooperation Administration
ICBM, intercontinental ballistic missile
ICRC, International Committee of the Red Cross
IDB, Inter-American Development Bank
ILA, International Longshoreman's Association
ILO, International Labor Organization
IL-28, Soviet jet light bomber
Inf Bde, Infantry Brigade
info, information
INR, Bureau of Intelligence and Research, Department of State
INS, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Justice
IO, Bureau of International Organization Affairs, Department of State
IO/UNP, Office of United Nations Political and Security Affairs, Bureau of International Organization Affairs, Department of State
IRBD, International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (World Bank)
IRBM, intermediate-range ballistic missile
Ironbark, special information handling channel for intelligence generated by Colonel Oleg Penkovsky
ISA, Office of International Security Affairs, Department of Defense

JCS, Joint Chiefs of Staff
JCSM, Joint Chiefs of Staff memorandum
JTF, Joint Task Force
JURE, Revolutionary Junta

KLM, Royal Dutch Airlines
KOMAR, Soviet missile carrying patrol boat kts, knots, one nautical mile per hour
KW, kilowatt

L, Office of the Legal Adviser, Department of State
LA, Latin America
LAAM, light antiaircraft missile
LAFTA, Latin American Free Trade Association

LANTCOM, Atlantic Fleet Command

lat, latitude

LCI, landing craft, infantry

LCT, landing craft, tank

LCU, landing craft, utility

LCVP, landing craft, vehicle, personnel

LICROSS, League of International Red Cross Societies

long, longitude

LOU, Limited Official Use

LPH, Landing Platform Helicopter

LS, Division of Language Services, Department of State

LSD, landing ship, deck

LST, landing ship, tank

MAAG, Military Assistance Advisory Group

MAG, Marine Aviation Group

MAP, Military Assistance Program

MAR, Movimiento de Recuperacion Revolucion, Movement
To Recover the Revolution

MarCorps, Marine Corps

MATS, Military Air Transport Service

MC, memorandum of conversation

MDC, Movimiento Democratico Cristiano, Christian Democratic Movement

MEB, Marine Expeditionary Brigade

MEF, Marine Expeditionary Force

MFA, Ministry of Foreign Affairs

MFM, Meeting of Foreign Ministers

MIG, Soviet-made fighter aircraft

MLF, multilateral force

mort., mortar

MP, Member of Parliament (British)

MRBM, medium-range ballistic missile

MRP, Movimiento Revolucionario del Pueblo, People's Revolutionary Movement

MSTS, Military Sea Transport Service

MTB, motor torpedo boat

mtg, meeting

NAC, North Atlantic Council

NAD, Naval Air Detachment

NAS, Naval Air Station
NATO, North Atlantic Treaty Organization
NavAide, Naval Aide
NDU, National Defense University
NEA, Bureau of Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs, Department of State
niact, night action, telegram indicator requiring immediate action
Nic, Nicaragua
NIE, National Intelligence Estimate nm, nautical miles
Nofor, no foreign distribution
NORAD, North American Air Defense Command
NPIC, National Photographic Interpretation Center
NRO, National Reconnaissance Office
NSA, National Security Agency
NSAM, National Security Action Memorandum
NSC, National Security Council
NSF, National Security Files
NY, New York
NYFRC, New York Federal Records Center

OAD, Organization of American States
OARS, Ocean Area Reconnaissance Satellite
OAS, Organization of American States
OASD, Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense
OCB, Operations Coordinating Board
OCI, Office of Current Intelligence, Central Intelligence Agency
OD, operating directive
OECD, Organization of Economic Cooperation and Development
OEP, Office of Emergency Planning
ONE-OCI, Office of National Estimates/Office of Current Intelligence
OP, Office of the Chief of Naval Operations; operations plan
OPLAN, operations plan
OSD, Office of the Secretary of Defense

P, Bureau of Public Affairs, Department of State
PAA, Pan American Airways

PACOM, Pacific Command
PC, Patrol Craft, Submarine chaser
P.L.-480, Public Law 480, Food for Peace
PM, Prime Minister; paramilitary
PNG, persona non grata
POE, port of embarkation
POL, petroleum, oil, and lubricants
Polto, series indicator for telegrams from the U.S. Permanent Representative to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and European Regional Organizations to the Department of State
POW, prisoner of war
Pres, President
PSP, Partido Socialista Popular, Popular Socialist Party (Cuban Communist Party)
PT, motor torpedo boat

R, resolution; Republican re, regarding recco, reconnaissance reps, representatives res, resolution
RLT, Regimental Landing Team
RPA, Office of Inter-American Regional Political Affairs, Bureau of Inter-American Affairs, Department of State
RPM, Office of Atlantic Political and Military Affairs, Department of State

SA, Sterling Area
SA-2, Soviet surface-to-air missile (SAM)
SAC, Strategic Air Command
SACEUR, Supreme Allied Commander, Europe
SAM, surface-to-air missile
SAR, search and rescue
SATS, short airfield for tactical support
SC, Security Council of the United Nations
SCCS, Special Consultative Committee on Security (OAS)
SEATO, Southeast Asia Treaty Organization
SecDef, Secretary of Defense
SecNav, Secretary of the Navy
Secto, series indicator for telegrams from the Secretary of State or his party to Washington

SIGINT, Signals Intelligence
SNIE, Special National Intelligence Estimate
S/O, Operations Center, Department of State
Sov, Soviet
S/P Policy Planning Council/Staff
S/S, Executive Secretariat, Department of State
SS-4, Soviet medium-range ballistic missile
SS-5, Soviet intermediate-range ballistic missile
SSM, surface-to-surface missile
Stat., United States Statutes at Large
SW, surface warfare
SYG, Secretary General of the United Nations

TAC, Tactical Air Command
TAD, Tactical Air Defense
TAF, Tactical Air Force
TASS, Telegraphnoye Agentstvo Sovyetskogo Soyuza (Telegraph Agency of the Soviet Union)
TCS, Tactical Control Squadron telcon, telephone conversation
TF, Task Force
TFS, Tactical Fighter Squadron
TG, Task Group
T/O, Table of Organization
T/O&E, Table of Organization and Estimates
Topol, series indicator for telegrams to the U.S. Permanent Representative to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization
TRS, Tactical Reconnaissance Squadron

U, Office of the Under Secretary of State
U-2, U.S. high-altitude reconnaissance aircraft
UAR, United Arab Republic
UDT, Underwater Demolition Team
UDU, Underwater Demolition Unit
UK, United Kingdom
UN, United Nations
UNESCO-ECLA, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization-Economic Commission for Latin America
UNGA, United Nations General Assembly
UNMIS, United Nations Mission

UNSC, United Nations Security Council
UR, Unidad Revolucionario (Cuban political movement) urtel, your telegram
USA, United States Army
USAF, United States Air Force
USDel, United States Delegation
USG, United States Government
USIA, United States Information Agency
USIB, United States Intelligence Board
USMC, United States Marine Corps
USN, United States Navy
USRO, United States Mission to European Regional Organization in Paris
USS, United States Ship
USSR, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
USSTRICOM, United States Strike Command
UST, United States Treaties and other International Agreements
USUN, United States Mission to the United Nations
UW, unconventional warfare

VOA, Voice of America
VS, Search Plane; Shore-based Search Squadron

WH, White House
W/T, wireless transmitter
WNRC, Washington National Records Center

List of Persons

- Alessandri Rodríguez, Jorge, President of Chile
- Allende Gossens, Salvador, Senator (Socialist Party, Chile) and candidate of the Frente de Accion Popular for President in the 1964 elections
- Amory, Robert, Deputy Director for Intelligence, Central Intelligence Agency
- Anderson, Admiral George W., USN, Chief of Naval Operations until August 1, 1963
- Arosemena Monroy, Carlos Julio, President of Ecuador November 1961–July 1963
- Attwood, William, Ambassador to Guinea March 29, 1961–May 27, 1963
- Ball, George W., Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, February–December 1961; thereafter Under Secretary of State
- Barnes, C. Tracy, Assistant Deputy Director (Plans) for Covert Action, Central Intelligence Agency
- Battle, Lucius D., Special Assistant to the Secretary of State and Executive Secretary March–May 1962
- Beerli, Colonel Stanley W., Chief of Air Operations, Branch 4, Western Hemisphere Division, Directorate for Plans, Central Intelligence Agency
- Bell, John O., Ambassador to Guatemala after November 10, 1961
- Berbaum, M. Maurice, Ambassador to Ecuador
- Berle, Adolph A., Chairman of the Department of State Task Force on Latin America
- Betencourt, Rómulo, President of Venezuela
- Bissell, Richard M., Jr., Deputy Director for Plans, Central Intelligence Agency, until February 1962
- Bohlen, Charles E., Ambassador to France after September 4, 1962
- Bowles, Chester A., Under Secretary of State, January–December 1961; thereafter Special Representative and Adviser on African, Asian, and Latin American Affairs
- Brubeck, William H., Deputy Executive Secretary of the Department of State, August 1961–May 1962; Special Assistant to the Secretary of State and Executive Secretary, May 1962–July 1963
- Bundy, McGeorge, Special Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs

Bundy, William P., Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs

Burke, Admiral Arleigh A., Chief of Naval Operations until August 1961

Burris, Colonel Howard L., Military Aide to Vice President Johnson

Burrows, Charles R., Ambassador to Honduras

Bustamante, Sir Alexander, Premier of the British Colony of Jamaica after April 10, 1962; Prime Minister of independent Jamaica after August 6, 1962

Cabell, General Charles P., Deputy Director of Central Intelligence until January 1962

Carroll, Joseph F., USAF, Director, Defense Intelligence Agency

Carter, Lieutenant General Marshall S., USA, Deputy Director of Central Intelligence from April 1962

Castro Ruz, Fidel, Prime Minister of Cuba

Castro Ruz, Raul, Minister of the Armed Forces of Cuba

Chase, Gordon, National Security Council Staff member

Chayes, Abram J., Legal Advisor, Department of State from February 1961

Clark, Rear Admiral John E., Commander of Special Task Group 81.8

Cleveland, J. Harlan, Assistant Secretary of State for International Organization Affairs

Clifton, General Chester V., USA, Military Aide to President Kennedy

Cline, Ray S., Deputy Director for Intelligence after April 23, 1962

Coerr, Wymberley DeR., Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs

Cole, Charles W., Ambassador to Chile after September 22, 1961

Cottrell, Sterling J., Deputy Assistant Secretary, Bureau of Inter-American Affairs, and Coordinator of Cuban Affairs, Department of State after January 1963

Craig, Brigadier General William H., Department of Defense Project Officer for Operation Mongoose until June 1962

Crimmins, John H., Deputy Director of the Office of Caribbean and Mexican Affairs, Bureau of Inter-American Affairs, Department of State, until February 1962; thereafter Director of the Office

- Dearborn, Henry, Counselor at the Embassy at Bogota
- Decker, General George H., Army Chief of Staff
- de Gaulle, General Charles, President of France
- Dennison, Admiral Robert L., USN, Commander in Chief, Atlantic
- Dillon, C. Douglas, Secretary of the Treasury
- Dobrynin, Anatoliy F., Soviet Ambassador to the United States after March 1962
- Donovan, James B., New York lawyer involved in efforts to secure the release of prisoners captured at the Bay of Pigs
- Dulles, Allen W., Director of Central Intelligence until November 1961
- Dungan, Ralph A., Special Assistant to the President
- Durán Neumann, Julio, Senator (Radical Party, Chile) and candidate of the Democratic Front for President in the 1964 elections
- Earman, J. S., Executive Assistant to the Director of Central Intelligence until April 1962
- Echandi Jiménez, Mario, President of Costa Rica until May 8, 1962
- Eisenhower, Dwight D., President of the United States until January 20, 1961
- Elder, Walter, Executive Assistant to the Director of Central Intelligence from April 1962
- Esterline, J. D., Chief of Branch 4, Western Hemisphere Division, Directorate for Plans, Central Intelligence Agency
- Finletter, Thomas K., Ambassador to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization
- FitzGerald, Desmond, Directorate of Plans, Central Intelligence Agency
- Fomin, Aleksandr S., Counselor to Soviet Embassy in the United States
- Freeman, Fulton, Ambassador to Colombia after May 4, 1961
- Frei Montalva, Eduardo, Senator (Christian Democrat party, Chile) and Christian Democratic candidate for President in the 1964 elections
- Gilpatric, Roswell L., Deputy Secretary of Defense from January 1961
- Glenn, Edmund S., Language Services, Department of State

Goodwin, Richard N., Assistant Special Counsel to the President until November 1961; thereafter Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs

Gray, Major General David W., Chief of the Subsidiary Activities Division, Plans and Policy, Joint Staff, Joint Chiefs of Staff

Gromyko, Andrei, Minister of Foreign Affairs, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics

Guevara de la Serna, Major Ernesto (Che), Cuban Minister of Industry

Hamilton, Fowler, Administrator of the Agency for International Development, September 30–December 20, 1961

Harriman, W. Averell, Ambassador at Large, February–December 1961; Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs December 1961–April 1963; Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs from April 1963

Harris, Brigadier General Benjamin T., Department of Defense Project Officer for Operation Mongoose from June 1962

Harvey, William K., Chief of Task Force W, Directorate for Plans, Central Intelligence Agency; Project Officer for Operation Mongoose

Hawkins, Colonel Jack, Chief of Paramilitary Operations, Branch 4, Western Hemisphere Division, Directorate for Plans, Central Intelligence Agency

Helms, Richard M., Chief of Operations, Directorate for Plans, Central Intelligence Agency, until February 1962; thereafter Deputy Director for Plans

Hilsman, Roger, Jr., Director of the Bureau of Intelligence and Research, Department of State, from February 1961

Howard, Lisa, correspondent, American Broadcasting Company

Hurwitch, Robert A., Officer in Charge of Cuban Affairs, Office of Caribbean and Mexican Affairs, Bureau of Inter-American Affairs, Department of State, until February 1962; Deputy Director, Office of Caribbean and Mexican Affairs, February–June 1962; Special Assistant for Cuban Affairs, June 1962–June 1963; Deputy Coordinator for Cuban Affairs, Department of State, January 1963–August 1963

Johnson, Lyndon B., Vice President of the United States until November 22, 1963; thereafter President

Johnson, U. Alexis, Deputy Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs

- Katzenbach, Nicholas deB., Assistant Attorney General 1961–1962; thereafter Deputy Attorney General
- Kaysen, Carl, member, National Security Council Staff, June–December 1961; thereafter Deputy Special Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs
- Kennedy, John F., President of the United States until his assassination on November 22, 1963
- Kennedy, Robert F., Attorney General of the United States from January 1961
- Kent, Sherman, Chairman of the Board of National Estimates, Central Intelligence Agency
- Khrushchev, Nikita S., Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
- King, Colonel J. C., Chief, Western Hemisphere Division, Directorate for Plans, Central Intelligence Agency
- Kohler, Foy D., Ambassador to the Soviet Union from September 1962
- Komer, Robert W., member, National Security Council Staff
- Kuznetsov, Vasiliy V., First Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
- Lansdale, Brigadier General Edward G., Deputy Assistant for Special Operations to the Secretary of Defense until May 1961; thereafter Assistant for Special Operations; also Chief of Operations for Operation Mongoose after November 1961
- Lechin, Juan, Vice President of Bolivia
- Legere, Colonel Lawrence J., Assistant to the President's Military Representative
- LeMay, General Curtis, Chief of Staff, U.S. Air Force
- Lemnitzer, General Lyman L., Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to September 1962
- Lleras Camargo, Alverto, President of Colombia until August 7, 1962
- López Arellano, Oswaldo, Head of the Military Junta of Honduras after October 4, 1963
- López Mateos, Alfonso, President of Mexico
- Lundahl, Arthur C., Director, National Photographic Interpretation Center, Central Intelligence Agency
- McCloy, John J., Presidential advisor and Chairman of the Coordinating Committee for U.S.-Soviet Negotiations Over Cuba at the United Nations
- McCone, John A., Director of Central Intelligence from November 1961

Macmillan, Harold, British Prime Minister until October 20, 1963

McNamara, Robert S., Secretary of Defense from January 1961

Manley, Norman, Premier of the British Colony of Jamaica until April 10, 1962

Mann, Thomas C., Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs until April 1961; Ambassador to Mexico from May 1961

Martin, Edwin M., Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs until May 1962; thereafter Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs

Mendelevich, Lev I., Head, Latin American Department, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics

Mikoyan, Anastas I., First Deputy Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics

Miró Cardona, José, President of the Cuban Revolutionary Council

Morales-Carrion, Arturo, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs from February 1961

Muccio, John J., Ambassador to Guatemala until November 10, 1961

Murrow, Edward R., Director, United States Information Agency

Nitze, Paul H., Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs January 1961–November 29, 1963; thereafter Secretary of the Navy

O'Donnell, P. Kenneth, Special Assistant to the President

Orlich Bolmarcich, Francisco José, President of Costa Rica after May 8, 1962

Parrott, Thomas A., Executive Secretary, Special Group, National Security Council

Paz Estenssoro, Victor, President of Bolivia

Perelta, Azurcha, Colonel Enrique, Head of the Military Junta of Guatemala after March 31, 1963

Plimpton, Francis T.P., Deputy Representative to the United Nations and the Security Council

Rivera Carballo, Julio Adalberto, President of El Salvador after July 1, 1962

Roa Garcia, Raul, Cuban Minister for External Relations

Rostow, Walt W., Deputy Special Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs until December 1961; thereafter Counselor of the Department of State and Chairman of the Policy Planning Council

Rusk, Dean, Secretary of State from January 1961

San Roman, Jose Perez, Commander of the Cuban Expeditionary Force Brigade

Scali, John, correspondent, American Broadcasting Company

Schlesinger, Arthur M., Jr., Special Assistant to the President

Scott, Joseph W., Special Assistant to the Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs

Shoup, General David M., Commandant of the Marine Corps

Smith, Bromley, Acting Executive Secretary of the National Security Council until August 1961; thereafter Executive Secretary

Somoza Debayle, General Anastasio, Commander in Chief of the National Guard of Nicaragua

Somoza Debayle, Luis, President of Nicaragua until May 1963

Sorensen, Theodore C., Special Counsel to the President

Stephansky, Ben S., Ambassador to Bolivia, June 14, 1961–October 15, 1963

Stevenson, Adlai E., Permanent Representative to the United Nations from January 1961

Strom, Carl W., Ambassador to Bolivia until May 8, 1961

Taylor, General Maxwell D., USA, Chairman of the Cuba Study Group, April–June 1961; President's Military Representative, July 1961–October 1962; thereafter Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff

Telles, Raymond, Ambassador to Costa Rica after April 6, 1961

Thant, U, Secretary-General of the United Nations

Thompson, Llewellyn E., Ambassador to the Soviet Union until July 1962; Ambassador at Large, Department of State, after October 3, 1962

Tyler, William R., Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs

Valencia, Guillermo León, President of Colombia after August 7, 1962

Vance, Cyrus R., General Counsel of the Department of Defense, January 29, 1961–June 30, 1962; Secretary of the Army after July 5, 1962

Velasco Ibarra, José Maria, President of Ecuador until November 7, 1961

Villeda Morales, José Ramón, President of Honduras until October 4, 1963

Wheeler, General Earle G., Chief of Staff, U.S. Army

White, General Thomas D., Chief of Staff of the Air Force until June 1961

Williams, Murat W., Ambassador to El Salvador after January 17, 1961

Wilson, Donald, Acting Director of the U.S. Information Agency

Woodward, Robert F., Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, July 1961–March 1962

Ydigoras Fuentes, General Miguel, President of Guatemala until March 31, 1963

Yost, Charles W., Deputy Representative to the United Nations Security Council

Zorin, Valerian, Soviet Ambassador to the United Nations

Summary of Print Volume X

Following is a summary of the contents of print volume X, Cuba, 1961–1962. Parenthetical citations are to the numbered documents in the text. Volume X, published in 1997, is available from the U.S. Government Printing Office.

By the time John F. Kennedy assumed the Presidency on January 20, 1961, U.S.-Cuban relations had become locked in a state of mutual hostility. The final act of the Eisenhower administration with regard to Cuba was to sever diplomatic relations. (2, 4, 6, 7, 8) The Kennedy administration expanded upon and continued this policy by seeking to isolate, contain, undermine, and overthrow the government of Fidel Castro. The Castro government was seen in Washington as a client of the Soviet Union, with the dangerous potential of fostering Communist subversion and spreading Soviet influence throughout Latin America.

Background

Following his election in November 1960, President Kennedy had been briefed in general terms about the CIA covert plan to support an attempt by Cuban émigrés to overthrow the Castro government. The plan was authorized by President Eisenhower and developed by the CIA during 1960. (See Foreign Relations, 1958–1960, Volume VI) On January 19, 1961, President Eisenhower met with President-elect Kennedy, and briefed him on various foreign policy concerns. Eisenhower made reference to the small force of Cuban émigrés that was being trained by the CIA in Guatemala, and recommended that the effort be continued and accelerated. Eisenhower added that, in his opinion, the United States could not allow the Castro government to continue to exist in Cuba. (22)

CIA Invasion Plan and Its Critics

The Joint Chiefs of Staff briefed several members of the new administration on the CIA's Cuba project on January 22, and the JCS met with President Kennedy on January 25 to discuss the implications of the proposed covert operation against Cuba. (24, 26) General Lyman Lemnitzer, Chairman of the JCS, advised the President that time was working against the United States in Cuba, where Castro was tightening police state controls. Existing U.S. plans, he stated, called for the establishment of a government in exile, the introduction of anti-Castro guerrilla forces into Cuba, and subsequent support of the guerrilla forces by U.S. military forces. Plans were ready, he told the President, for such action. (26) On January 27, however, the Joint Chiefs provided Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara an assessment of the CIA's plan to overthrow the Castro government in which they stated that the plan "does not assure the accomplishment of the objective nor has there been detailed follow-up planning to exploit that plan if it succeeds or for any direct action that might be required if the plan is found to be inadequate." (28)

McNamara and General Lemnitzer took up the JCS concerns in a meeting with the President on January 28, attended by a number of other concerned officials. (30, 31) During the meeting, Secretary of State Dean Rusk indicated that the Department of State saw grave political dangers for the U.S. position throughout the Western Hemisphere if the Kennedy administration approved overt military action not authorized and supported by the Organization of American States. As a result of the January 28 meeting at the White House, President Kennedy requested a reassessment of the existing plans for an effort to overthrow the Castro government, the first of several reassessments required by the President.

Secretary McNamara and General Lemnitzer expressed skepticism about the CIA plan following the January 28 meeting. Both agreed that the plan required careful study. (32) On February 3, the JCS submitted to McNamara a military evaluation of the CIA Para-Military plan, which was then focused on introducing a Cuban émigré brigade around the port of Trinidad. (35) The JCS judged that the Trinidad beach-head offered the best area in Cuba for the accomplishment of the stated objective. But they noted: "Since the success of this operation is dependent on the degree of local Cuban support, this factor should be a matter of continuous evaluation until a decision to execute the operation is made." The JCS concluded that, if significant local support for the assault forces developed within the first 2 days, "timely execution of the plan has a fair chance of ultimate success." They noted, however, that their information regarding the capabilities of the proposed assault force came from second and third hand sources. In order to advise the President properly, they felt that a team of military officers should be dispatched to Guatemala to assess the preparations.

The JCS evaluation was discussed by President Kennedy and his closest advisers on February 8. (40) Kennedy focused on a fall-back option incorporated in the planning for the invasion. That option stipulated that if the invasion failed in its initial phase to unseat the Castro government, the invaders could fade into the Escambray mountains and join other guerrilla groups fighting against Castro. The fall-back option was specifically cited in the February 8 meeting and made the invasion proposal more palatable for the President. But he still pressed for alternatives to a full-fledged invasion supported by U.S. planes, ships, and supplies. It became increasingly clear in the course of the numerous reviews of the plan prepared for the President that he was leery of a proposal that threatened to draw the United States openly into war. But he was eager to see the Castro government overthrown, and did not want to have [illegible in the original] the political embarrassment of disbanding the Cuban [illegible in the original] army and being accused of throwing away perhaps the last good opportunity of preventing Cuba from being lost to Communist control.

CIA officials contended that the Agency's plan was sound. On February 17, Richard Bissell, Deputy Director of Plans of the CIA and the motive force behind the planning for the invasion, prepared a memorandum that argued for the program planned by the CIA for a landing in force in the Trinidad area. He noted that Castro's position in Cuba was becoming stronger every day, and contended that soon it would be impossible to unseat him without drastic and politically untenable actions such as an all-out embargo or the use of overt military force. (46) Bissell argued his position in a meeting at the White House on February 18. He was opposed by Secretary of State Rusk, who contended that it would be better to delay any action and attempt to build up OAS support. (48) The President required further work on the plan.

Revised Invasion Plans

Reevaluation led to significant changes in the invasion plan. On March 10, the JCS submitted an evaluation prepared by three officers who went to Guatemala to inspect the combat-capability of the émigré army. Their findings were generally positive in terms of equipment, training, and morale. The small army of approximately 1,000 men would be heavily out-numbered, however, and the logistics specialist concluded that logistic preparations were not adequate. Nonetheless, the team concluded that the invasion army could be ready to fight by April 1. (56) Bissell followed with a memorandum on March 11 that argued that it would be “infeasible to hold all these forces together beyond early April.” (58) At a meeting at the White House on March 11, however, President Kennedy indicated that, although he was willing to take the chance of going ahead, he could not endorse a plan that involved the United States so openly. He directed the development of a plan where U.S. assistance would be less obvious. (59)

Working under intense time pressure, the CIA produced a plan on March 15 targeted upon a sparsely populated area of swampland along the south coast of Cuba at a place called the Bay of Pigs, approximately 100 miles west of Trinidad. The change of target was necessary in order to encompass an airstrip adequate for B-26 bombers, so that air support for the invasion would seem to come from within Cuba. The plan relied on a landing begun under cover of darkness, and completed in the early hours after dawn. (61) The JCS evaluated the prospects for the success of a landing at the Bay of Pigs and concluded that, although prospects for the Trinidad plan were better, the Bay of Pigs alternative was considered “feasible.” They noted, however, that “inaccessibility of the area may limit the support anticipated from the Cuban populace.” (62) At a meeting on March 15, President Kennedy directed that the entire landing operation should be completed before dawn, so that the ships could be well away from shore by dawn, and the operation could be represented as a domestic guerrilla uprising. (65) The revisions of this plan, code-named Zapata, were completed by the CIA on March 16, and the President approved the revised plan, but reserved the right to call it off up to 24 hours prior to the landing. (66)

During a meeting at the White House on March 29, a tentative date for the invasion was set for April 10. President Kennedy asked whether, in the event the invasion failed, the invading force could melt into the surrounding countryside and function as guerrillas, as had been assumed with earlier versions of the plan. Bissell replied that in the event of failure at the Bay of Pigs the entire invading force would have to be withdrawn. (74) On April 4, Senator William Fulbright was invited to a meeting to discuss the plan. Senator Fulbright spoke out against the enterprise but the President's other advisers in the meeting supported it. (80) On April 6, the time for the invasion was rescheduled for April 17, with the President retaining the option of canceling the operation 24 hours before it began. (84)

The JCS issued instructions on April 7 to Admiral Dennison, Commander in Chief, Atlantic, concerning destroyer escort and combat air patrol to protect the Cuban Expeditionary Force (CEF), which was preparing to sail for Cuba. (85) Dennison, in turn, issued his Operation Order for the operation on April 10 to Rear Admiral John E. Clark, who commanded Special Task Group 81.8 (STG 81.8), which was assigned to support the CEF. (87) Clark was instructed: "DD's [destroyers] will not be used to support the landing operation and will not close within 20 miles of the objective area." With those limitations, and similar instructions concerning the necessity to avoid involving U.S. air cover in open combat with Castro's air force, the CEF was left to fight essentially alone, with only cover from the B-26 bombers of the small émigré air force, launched from a base in Nicaragua in support of the landings.

President Kennedy's lingering doubts concerning the success of the Cuban invasion force were largely allayed by a telegram on April 13 from Marine Colonel Jack Hawkins, the principal military adviser assigned to help prepare the Cuban brigade in Guatemala. Hawkins expressed no doubts when asked to evaluate the brigade's chances: "My observations the last few days have increased my confidence in the ability of this force to accomplish not only initial combat missions but also the ultimate objective of Castro's overthrow." He described the brigade leaders as very confident, and added: "I share their confidence." (98) Based on the confidence of the CIA officials managing the operation, President Kennedy allowed it to go forward as scheduled.

The Invasion

On April 15, a preliminary air strike was launched against Cuban airfields by B-26 bombers bearing the markings of the Cuban Air Force. The object of this attack by the Cuban émigré air force was to destroy Castro's air force on the ground before the invasion was launched. (103) This air strike only partially succeeded, and it had the effect of removing much of the element of surprise from the subsequent invasion. A critical decision affecting the possibility of success for the Bay of Pigs operation was taken on April 16 when President Kennedy decided, on the basis of advice from Secretary of State Rusk, that the air strikes scheduled for the morning of April 17 to support the invasion, would have to be postponed until the airfield at the Bay of Pigs could be secured and the strikes launched from there. CIA Deputy Director General C.P. Cabell, along with Richard Bissell, protested the decision to McGeorge Bundy, who told them that they would have to discuss the matter with Rusk. Secretary Rusk explained the political considerations underlying the decision and offered to let them speak directly to the President about the matter. The CIA officials decided that there was no point in pressing the matter that far. (108) The second strike against Cuban air fields, planned to eliminate the remainder of Castro's air force, did not take place as planned. When the invasion began at the Bay of Pigs on the morning of April 17, the Cuban Government still had the air power to cripple it.

The invasion of Cuba by the Cuban brigade at the Bay of Pigs was in trouble almost from the beginning. After Action reports by Grayston Lynch and William Robertson of the CIA, who were directly involved in the invasion, provide a graphic picture of the breakdown of the invasion, after initial, limited success on the morning of April 17. (109, 110) The lack of effective air support left the Cuban brigade, and the supporting transports of the CEF easy prey for the remaining planes of the Cuban Air Force. T-33 jet training planes were particularly effective against the B-26 bombers of the CEF's air force when they appeared over the beach. Meanwhile, the instructions from the JCS to Admiral Dennison were to keep fleet units well off the Cuban coast, and to provide an air cap for CEF shipping only when it was outside Cuban territorial waters. (111) As a result, the CIA had to report to the JCS at 10:17 a.m. on April 17 that two of the ships of the CEF, the Rio Escondido and the Houston, had been sunk, and that a third, the Blagar, was under heavy attack. (112) By the afternoon of April 17, the CIA reported that the Barbara J and the Atlantico were also under attack off the coast of Cuba, and that the Barbara J was on fire. (116) Much of the necessary supplies and ammunition for the Cuban brigade were lost in the ships sunk at the Bay of Pigs. The remaining vessels of the CEF fled out to sea, and were only regrouped with difficulty.

Reports from the Cuban brigade ashore constituted a steady stream of pleas for air cover, ammunition, and supplies to ward off mounting pressure on the beachhead from Castro forces, supported by tanks and jets. During the morning hours of April 18, messages from the brigade commander became increasingly desperate. "Request jet support or cannot hold." "Have no ammo left for tanks and very little left for troops." "Enemy just launched heavy land attack supported by tanks. Cannot hold for long." "Red Beach wiped out. Request air strikes immediately." (125) By that afternoon, the brigade commander radioed that without jet cover his force could not survive: "Please don't desert us. Am out of tank and bazooka ammo. Tanks will hit me at dawn. I will not be evacuated. Will fight to the end if we have to." (135)

During the early morning hours of April 19, an assessment of the disaster occurring at the Bay of Pigs took place at the White House. After the meeting with the President, the JCS sent instructions to Admiral Dennison to furnish U.S. air cover by six unmarked jet fighters over the CEF forces during the period 0630 to 0730 local time. The U.S. fighters were not authorized to attack ground targets, but were given latitude to destroy the Cuban Air Force if it appeared and engaged. (140) The air cover would permit CEF transport aircraft to fly in desperately needed supplies, and to attack the tanks and ground forces mustered by Castro around the beachhead. Unfortunately, the order sent to the CEF air base in Nicaragua also stipulated local time for the strike by CEF bombers, but local time in Nicaragua was one hour earlier than at the Bay of Pigs. (150) The CEF planes passed over Admiral Clark's Task Group just as he was preparing to put the authorized air cover into the air. The Navy jets followed the CEF bombers to the beachhead as quickly as possible, but by the time they arrived, jets from Castro's air force had already broken up and driven off the CEF attack. That represented the last opportunity to try to salvage the Bay of Pigs invasion. Ironically, intelligence reports subsequently indicated that Fidel Castro himself was leading the tank column pressing the attack on the Cuban brigade. (236) Instead, the morning of April 19 concluded with a last desperate signal from the brigade commander at the Bay of Pigs: "Out of ammunition. Men fighting in water. If no help given Blue Beach lost." (146)

The Taylor Study Group

The collapse of the Bay of Pigs invasion forced the Kennedy administration to take responsibility for an embarrassing and damaging failure, while U.S. Naval forces off the Bay of Pigs scrambled to try to rescue as many survivors from the Cuban brigade as possible. (151, 156, 177) The failure was followed by a determined effort in Washington to find out what went wrong. President Kennedy asked General Maxwell D. Taylor, retired Army Chief of Staff, to head a committee composed of Attorney General Robert Kennedy, Director of Central Intelligence Allen Dulles, and Chief of Naval Operations Admiral Arleigh Burke, to investigate the failure, and to make recommendations concerning future U.S. capability of conducting similar operations. Taylor's Cuban Study Group conducted an intensive investigation, which involved gathering information and interviewing key participants across a period of a month and a half following the collapse of the Bay of Pigs invasion. The interviews offered detailed insight into the lack of adequate planning, coordination, and oversight which helped to undermine the operation. (169, 174, 175, 176, 187, 193, 199, 200, 201, 209, 210, 221)

The Study Group met with President Kennedy on May 16 to give him a preliminary report concerning the investigation. (218, 219) The Study Group submitted its formal report to the President on June 13. (229–234) The Group found in its conclusions that, contrary to the President's much-quoted statement to the press in taking responsibility for the collapse at the Bay of Pigs, this failure was not in fact an orphan, but had a variety of fathers. The Study Group felt that before the operation became the responsibility of the Kennedy administration, it should have been canceled by the Eisenhower administration or converted into an amphibious operation under the direction of the Department of Defense. When it was presented to the Kennedy administration as a well-advanced project, those in charge of the operation "did not always present their case with sufficient force and clarity to the senior officials of the Government to allow the latter to appreciate the consequences of some of their decisions." In approving the operation, the Group noted, the President and his senior officials were "greatly influenced by the understanding that the landing force could pass to guerrilla status, if unable to hold the beachhead." That projection proved to be false. The Joint Chiefs of Staff did not do an adequate job in assessing the military feasibility of the operation for the President, and gave the impression of approving the Zapata plan, despite reservations. And the Group concluded that it was a mistake to try to run the operation from Washington, rather than entrusting responsibility to a commander closer to the point of combat. (233)

Reassessment of Cuba Policy

While the Taylor Study Group was conducting its investigation into the causes of the failure of the Bay of Pigs invasion, the Kennedy administration reassessed its Cuba policy in light of the failure. The process began on April 20 with a grim Cabinet meeting in which the President and his advisers took stock of the shambles of their effort to unseat Fidel Castro. Under Secretary of State Chester Bowles attended and recorded: "The President was really quite shattered . . . Here for the first time he faced a situation where his judgment had been mistaken, in spite of the fact that week after week of conferences had taken place before he gave the green light." The mood in the Cabinet was "almost savage" Bowles observed, "as everyone appeared to be jumping on everyone else." (158) The cabinet meeting was followed on April 22 by an angry NSC meeting. Bowles recorded that Robert Kennedy took the lead in the meeting, "slamming into anyone who suggested that we go slowly and try to move calmly and not repeat previous mistakes." The atmosphere, Bowles noted, "was almost as emotional as the Cabinet meeting two days earlier, the difference being that on this occasion the emphasis was on specific proposals to harass Castro." (166) The upshot was a series of decisions by President Kennedy which spoke of his desire to find a new approach to undermine Castro's control of Cuba, and prevent the spread of the Cuban revolution to Latin America. The President asked for a reassessment of U.S. support for guerrilla activities in Cuba. He instructed the Departments of State and Defense to study the question of training Cuban soldiers within the United States armed forces. He authorized the creation of an interdepartmental study group to consider an increase in U.S. assistance to Latin American countries for internal security and counter-guerrilla activities, and, in the same vein, directed that the possibility of creating a Caribbean Security Agency be studied, to provide a pool of forces to counter Cuban subversion. (167) The effect of the President's directives was to put in train a comprehensive review of Cuba policy.

The policy review culminated in a paper prepared for the National Security Council on May 4 by an Interagency Task Force. (202) The paper, entitled "Cuba and Communism in the Hemisphere," formed the basis for an NSC discussion on May 5. (204) The result of the discussion was an NSC Record of Action that outlined Cuba policy in the wake of the Bay of Pigs failure. The fundamental object of policy was listed first: "Agreed that U.S. policy toward Cuba should aim at the downfall of Castro, and that since the measures agreed below are not likely to achieve this end, the matter should be reviewed at intervals with a view to further action." Among the agreed measures was the conclusion that the United States should not take military action against Cuba for the present, "but should do nothing that would foreclose the possibility of military intervention in the future." It was noted that the President was concerned to receive timely intelligence concerning Cuban military capabilities, and the enhancement of those capabilities by military assistance from the Sino-Soviet Bloc, "so that U.S. capabilities for possible intervention may be maintained at an adequate level." The President directed the CIA to make a detailed study of "possible weaknesses and vulnerabilities in the elements which exert control in Cuba," and he agreed that relations with the Cuban émigré Revolutionary Council "should be improved and made more open." No separate Cuban military force could be organized in the United States, but Cuban nationals would be encouraged to enlist in the U.S. armed forces. And it was agreed that the United States "should at once initiate negotiation to enlarge the willingness of the other American states to join in bilateral, multilateral and OAS arrangements against Castro." (205) Castro may have won the battle of the Bay of Pigs, but the Kennedy administration was determined that he would not win the war to introduce and expand Communist influence and control in Latin America.

Operation Mongoose

The reassessment of Cuba policy begun in May eventuated in the authorization by President Kennedy on November 3, 1961, of the development of a new program designed to undermine the Castro government in Cuba. The program was codenamed Operation Mongoose. Overall control of the operation was entrusted to a new group established for the purpose, called the Special Group (Augmented), a slightly expanded version of the NSC 5412 Special Group, which oversaw covert operations. The Special Group (Augmented) consisted of regular Special Group members McGeorge Bundy, U. Alexis Johnson, Roswell Gilpatric, John McCone, and General Lyman Lemnitzer, augmented by Robert Kennedy and General Maxwell Taylor. Although Secretary of State Rusk and Secretary of Defense McNamara were not regular members of the group, they occasionally attended meetings. President Kennedy appointed Taylor as chairman of the group, but Robert Kennedy was the principal motive force within the group and the informal link between the group and the President. Air Force Brigadier General

Edward Lansdale was appointed Chief of Operations and coordinated the CIA's Mongoose operations with those within the Departments of State and Defense. Within the CIA, the Mongoose operation was run by Task Force W, under the direction of William Harvey, with overall guidance from Lansdale and the Special Group (Augmented). (270)

Initial discussions within the Special Group (Augmented) on the scope and direction of Operation Mongoose led to decisions confirmed by the President on November 30. (272, 275, 278) The decisions confirmed Lansdale's role as Chief of Operations, and provided the green light from the President to go ahead with the operation as conceived on November 3, "in order to help Cuba overthrow the communist regime." The first review of progress on the project was set for two weeks from the date of the November 30 memorandum of decision. In a meeting on December 1, called to discuss Mongoose plans, Attorney General Kennedy stressed that the President had reached a decision to accord higher priority to the Cuba problem. General Lansdale reported that he had surveyed all of the resources available for the project. He concluded that there were sizable active and potential resources available, but there was "a very difficult job ahead." He stressed the importance of coming to an agreement as to the future of Cuba after Castro, so that appeals to potential resistance groups could be geared to a positive long-range program. (280)

A measure of the Kennedy administration's renewed determination to eliminate Castro was the reauthorization of assassination attempts on the Cuban Premier. Efforts had been made to assassinate Castro before the Bay of Pigs invasion in coordination with underworld figures from the Mafia, but those efforts had been suspended during the reassessment of Cuba policy following the Bay of Pigs. (337)

During the course of his summary remarks to the National Security Council on January 18, 1962, concerning foreign policy and national security problems, President Kennedy said: "The time has not yet come when we must force a solution to the Cuban problem." (290) On the same day, however, General Lansdale circulated a program review of the "Cuba Project" to the Special Group (Augmented) which stated: "The U.S. objective is to help the Cubans overthrow the Communist regime from within Cuba and institute a new government with which the United States can live in peace.” (291) The Mongoose Operation, as outlined by Lansdale in this document, looked to the development of a “political action organization” in being in key localities in Cuba to facilitate a popular uprising against Castro when it occurred. Lansdale noted that the failure of the Bay of Pigs operation had eroded severely the confidence of the Cuban resistance movement in United States competence and intentions, and that confidence would have to be reestablished. Lansdale anticipated that the revolt, when it came, would come from “an angry reaction of the people to a government action (sparked by an incident), or from a fracturing of the leadership cadre within the regime, or both.” He added that it would be a major goal of the project to bring this about. For the initial phase of the project, Lansdale called upon the agencies which were involved—State, Defense, CIA, and USIA—to draw up plans to begin to move toward the goal of fomenting revolt in Cuba. On January 19, Attorney General Kennedy met with Lansdale and the Mongoose operations officers in the CIA and Defense to stress the importance of the project. He said that the project carried “the top priority in the United States Government—all else is secondary—no time, money, effort, or manpower is to be spared.” The Attorney General quoted the President as saying that “the final chapter on Cuba has not been written.” (292)

On February 20, Lansdale circulated a second review of planning for the Mongoose operation in which he noted: “Time is running against us.” The Cuban people, he noted, felt helpless and were “losing hope fast.” Accordingly, Lansdale outlined a program of action which he felt it was essential to push forward according to a timetable he outlined. The timetable called for preliminary action on the project to begin in March, leading to guerrilla operations in August and September, followed by open revolt during the first two weeks of October. A decision critical to the success of such a program was still to be made, and Lansdale urged the Special Group (Augmented) to consider it: “If conditions and assets permitting a revolt are achieved in Cuba, and if U.S. help is required to sustain this condition, will the U.S. respond promptly with military force to aid the Cuban revolt?" (304) That was the fundamental question which confronted the Kennedy administration throughout the Mongoose exercise.

Phase I

The Special Group (Augmented) considered Lansdale's proposed plan on February 21, discussed it again with McNamara on February 26, and finally concluded on March 1 that it was essential to conduct an initial intelligence collection program before deciding whether to proceed with the operational proposals outlined by Lansdale. A target date of the end of May was established for a review of the situation in light of the intelligence efforts. A decision as to the next phase would be made at that time. (309) On March 14, this decision was confirmed in guidelines for Operation Mongoose approved by the President. The guidelines stipulated that the "immediate priority objective of U.S. efforts during the coming months will be the acquisition of hard intelligence on the target area." Political, economic, and covert actions were authorized "short of those reasonably calculated to inspire a revolt within the target area, or other development which would require U.S. armed intervention." Those rather cautious guidelines were prefaced, however, by an initial assumption which stated that: "In undertaking to cause the overthrow of the target government, the U.S. will make maximum use of indigenous resources, internal and external, but recognizes that final success will require decisive U.S. military intervention." That stated assumption, in guidelines drafted by General Taylor and approved by the President, makes it appear that the Kennedy administration had decided, by mid-March, to intervene militarily in Cuba to ensure the overthrow of the Castro government. That impression is reinforced later in the guidelines by an instruction to the JCS to "continue the planning and essential preliminary actions to assure a decisive U.S. military capability for intervention." A handwritten covering memorandum by U. Alexis Johnson, dated March 16, found attached to a copy of the guidelines in Department of State files, throws a different light on the guidelines, however. Johnson, who attended the meeting at which the President approved the guidelines, wrote: "The President also expressed skepticism that in so far as can now be foreseen circumstances will arise that would justify and make desirable the use of American forces for overt military action. It was clearly understood no decision was expressed or implied approving the use of such forces although contingency planning would proceed." (314) Despite the stated assumption at the outset of the guidelines, the President clearly still had not decided whether to use U.S. military force to overthrow Castro.

On March 21, the intelligence community produced NIE 85-62, entitled "The Situation and Prospects in Cuba." The intelligence estimate concluded, in part, that, while there was active resistance in Cuba, it was "limited, uncoordinated, unsupported, and desperate," and that the Cuban regime, "with all the power of repression at its disposal, has shown that it can contain the present level of resistance activity." The estimate also concluded: "The majority of the Cuban people neither support the regime nor resist it, in any active sense. They are grumbling and resentful, but apparently hopeless and passive, resigned to acceptance of the present regime as the effective government in being with which they must learn to live for lack of a feasible alternative." (315)

The intelligence appreciation outlined in NIE 85-62 was viewed as far too negative by Lansdale and others, such as Richard Goodwin of the White House staff, who were involved in the Mongoose exercise. They saw evidence of cracks in the Castro government in Castro's denunciation, on March 26, of Cuban Communist Party leader Anibal Escalante and other Communist "militants". (320) They looked for opportunities to exploit the apparent divisions in Castro's ranks. (334, 339) The intelligence available at the time of the review of Phase I of Operation Mongoose on July 25, suggested, however, that Castro was in the process of consolidating his control over Cuban society. Cuba faced a significant economic crisis, but the Soviet bloc countries were expected to carry Cuba through the crisis, and to continue to contribute to the military build-up in Cuba which was making Castro's position increasingly secure. (349)

In his assessment of Phase I, submitted to the Special Group (Augmented) on July 25, Lansdale took issue with the intelligence appreciations and argued that there were enough able-bodied and motivated Cubans inside Cuba and in exile to initiate a successful revolt against Castro. But he added that they would require strong support from the United States, and he expressed the concern that “time is running out for the U.S. to make a free choice on Cuba.” In Lansdale’s opinion, it was time for the United States to do more than “watch and talk”. If the anti-Castro Cubans did not receive clear leadership from the United States, Lansdale’s feeling was that “they will make other plans for the future.” Lansdale outlined four options for Phase II of Operation Mongoose: the first called for the cancellation of the operation, the second for the application of all pressures on the Castro regime short of the use of U.S. military force, and the final two contemplated the use of military force by the United States. (360)

Phase II

The Special Group (Augmented) responded to Lansdale’s suggestions by instructing him to produce an outline plan of action based upon an enhanced version of the second option, calling for all actions which could be undertaken to undermine the Castro government, short of U.S. military intervention. Lansdale was instructed, however, to try to keep the “noise level” to a minimum. (367, 378) Lansdale submitted an outline plan for Phase II to the Special Group (Augmented) on August 14. (374) In a memorandum to the President on August 17, General Taylor noted that the Special Group (Augmented) had reviewed the results of Phase I, the intelligence gathering phase of Operation Mongoose, and, while not yet satisfied with the level of intelligence achieved, the group was prepared to recommend that the President approve the operational plans outlined by Lansdale for Phase II. The operation would continue to focus on the need for additional intelligence concerning the possibility of a successful revolt against Castro. But it was judged to be time to move forward with efforts designed “to hurt the local regime as much as possible on the economic front and work further to discredit the regime locally and abroad.” The group felt that the new course of action would create added difficulties for the Castro government, and would increase the visibility of its failures, but added “there is no reason to hope that it will cause the overthrow of the regime from within." With the clear understanding that Phase II would still limit Operation Mongoose to activities short of anything likely to draw the United States into active military operations against Cuba, President Kennedy on August 20 gave his approval to proceed. (380)

Toward the Missile Crisis

By August, Operation Mongoose had taken on a new sense of urgency as evidence mounted that the Soviet Union had sharply increased military shipments to Cuba. (382, 383, 390) At an August 10 meeting of the Special Group (Augmented), CIA Director McCone expressed his concern that the Soviet Union would underwrite its investment in Cuba by installing medium-range ballistic missiles on the island. (371) On August 23, President Kennedy considered the new evidence of Soviet bloc activity in Cuba and issued a series of directives incorporated in NSAM No. 181. One of those directives stipulated that Operation Mongoose Plan B plus should be developed "with all possible speed." In addition, the President directed that a study be made of the various alternatives which could be adopted to eliminate any installations in Cuba capable of launching a nuclear attack upon the United States. And he called for another study of the advantages and disadvantages of action to liberate Cuba by blockade or invasion "or other action beyond Mongoose B plus, in the context of an aggravated Berlin crisis." (385, 386)

Aerial photography established on August 29 that the Soviet Union was building surface-to-air missile sites in Cuba. The introduction of surface-to-air missiles raised the stakes in Washington, where there was concern that the purpose of the anti-aircraft missiles might be to protect the subsequent introduction of ballistic missiles. (395) On August 31, McGeorge Bundy assessed for President Kennedy the increased threat that Soviet medium-range missiles would pose for the United States. (401) President Kennedy issued a warning on September 4 that the introduction of offensive weapons into Cuba, such as surface-to-surface missiles, would raise the gravest issues for the United States. (411)

In an effort to assess Soviet intentions, Theodore Sorensen, the President's Special Counsel and close adviser, met with Soviet Ambassador Dobrynin on September 6 for a discussion of outstanding tensions between the United States and the Soviet Union. Dobrynin conveyed a personal message from Chairman Khrushchev to President Kennedy assuring the President that “nothing will be undertaken before the American Congressional elections that could complicate the international situation or aggravate the tension in relations between our two countries.” Sorensen replied that the President felt that recent Soviet actions in Cuba had already caused a significant problem, and that the Chairman’s message seemed, therefore, “hollow and tardy.” Sorensen added that the President took the Soviet military buildup in Cuba as a “deliberate and personal affront” and “could hardly be expected to take a very accommodating attitude in the months ahead.” (415)

On September 11, the Soviet Union warned that any attack by the United States on Cuba or upon Soviet ships bound for Cuba would lead to war between the United States and the Soviet Union. (422) Meanwhile, those tasked with responsibility for Operation Mongoose worked on such assigned tasks as developing post-Castro concepts, leaders, and political groups. (424, 425) At a press conference on September 13, President Kennedy dismissed speculation concerning the possibility of an imminent invasion of Cuba by U.S. forces. Military action by the United States against Cuba would be triggered, Kennedy stated, only if Cuba posed a threat to any other nation in the hemisphere, or if Cuba became an offensive military base for the Soviet Union. (429) On September 19, the intelligence community produced a Special National Intelligence Estimate on “The Military Buildup in Cuba.” (433) The estimate concluded that the Soviet military buildup was essentially defensive in nature, designed to protect Cuba against what the Cubans and the Soviets conceived to be the danger that the United States might attempt to overthrow the Castro government. It was considered unlikely that the Soviet Union would run the risk of attempting to establish a base for offensive weapons, such as medium- and intermediate-range ballistic missiles in Cuba. CIA Director McCone, who was in France on a honeymoon holiday, questioned that conclusion, and reiterated his concern that the Soviet Union was introducing ballistic missiles into Cuba. (420) On September 21, President Kennedy instructed Secretary of Defense McNamara to ensure that military contingency plans with regard to Cuba were kept up-to-date, taking into account the additions to Cuban armaments resulting from the continuous influx of Soviet equipment and technicians. (434)

That same afternoon, Admiral Anderson, Commander in Chief, Atlantic, issued a directive to his command to be prepared to conduct an air and naval blockade of Cuba on command from "higher authority." (435) Also on September 21, the first credible report of the arrival of what appeared to be Soviet medium-range ballistic missiles was received in Washington. Intelligence analysts checked this report against available photography and other reports and, by September 28, developed the hypothesis that MRBM sites were under preparation in Pinar del Rio province. The Joint Staff made arrangements to brief the Secretary of Defense and the Joint Chiefs of Staff on this dangerous development on Monday, October 1. (436) By the end of September 1962, therefore, it was clear that Cuba was on the verge of becoming a more difficult and dangerous problem for the Kennedy administration. It remained to be determined whether the President would respond to that emerging threat by authorizing the use of US military force to move the plans to contain, destabilize, and overthrow the Castro government beyond those envisioned and authorized under Phase II of Operation Mongoose.

Summary of Print Volume XI

Following is a summary of the contents of print volume XI, Cuban Missile Crisis and Aftermath. Parenthetical citations are to the numbered documents in the text. Volume XI, published in 1997, is available from the U.S. Government Printing Office.

Discovery of the Missiles

Before October 1, 1962, U.S. intelligence suspected a Soviet military buildup in Cuba, but it did not know definitively whether these arms included strategic weapons capable of threatening the United States. On October 5, Director of Central Intelligence John McCone predicted that the Soviet military buildup in Cuba “would end up with an established offensive capability in Cuba including MRBMs [medium-range ballistic missiles].” McCone stated this was more a “probability” than a “possibility.” Special Assistant for National Security Affairs McGeorge Bundy disagreed, doubting that the Soviet Union would mount such a brazen challenge. (9) President Kennedy approved a U-2 reconnaissance flight over Cuba to obtain evidence about the development of MRBM sites on the island. The flight, which took place on October 14, provided the first proof of the existence of Soviet MRBM missiles in Cuba. (16) At 8:45 a.m. on October 16, McGeorge Bundy informed Kennedy of the photographs of the missile sites, and the President immediately called a meeting of his principal advisers for 11:45 that morning. At this meeting the administration began its response to the Cuban Missile Crisis, the most dangerous U.S.-Soviet confrontation of the cold war.

Initial Deliberations

During that morning meeting, Secretary of State Dean Rusk suggested that there were two alternatives: a quick unilateral military strike at the missile sites or alerting U.S. allies and the Soviet Union to the fact that the placement of the missiles could lead to war. Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara gave a preliminary estimate of the military options. At the conclusion of the meeting the President asked his advisers to meet with him again that evening, stressing that the missiles had to be taken out. Other related issues for decision were whether to strike targets other than the missile sites and whether to invade the island. (18)

At the evening meeting, Rusk, McNamara, and Chairman of the Joint Chiefs General Maxwell Taylor raised doubts about the efficacy of strictly military actions, pointing to the political fall-out in Latin America and noting that air strikes were unlikely to be completely effective. Despite these reservations, the discussion of the U.S. response still focused on a military riposte. (21) Kennedy's advisers met again on the morning and afternoon of October 17 and raised the possibility of warning both Castro and Khrushchev to remove the missiles. If the response was negative, then the United States would use the military air strike option. McNamara and Taylor both counseled against this idea since it would give time for the missiles to become operational. Former Secretary of State Dean Acheson seconded this view. By the evening of October 17, the military option still held sway, although Ambassador to France Charles Bohlen argued strongly for a diplomatic approach, while Ambassador at Large Llewellyn Thompson and Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs Edwin Martin supported the idea of a blockade coupled with a declaration of war. (23)

By the morning of October 18, Kennedy and his advisers began to explore the idea of blockading Cuba because of the expected negative reaction by U.S. allies to a military solution. Still, the President remained noncommittal about the blockade. He constantly queried his advisers about allied reactions to air strikes. (28) Also on October 18, the Central Intelligence Agency reported sensitive intelligence, based on U-2 flights and its best Soviet source, Colonel Oleg Penkovsky, that mobile medium-range ballistic missiles were already operational and fixed intermediate-range missiles near Havana would be operational by December. (30)

U.S. policy remained far from finalized when Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko called at the White House at 5 p.m. on October 18. Gromyko defended the Soviet Union's supplying arms to Cuba without mentioning the missiles and accused the United States of planning to invade the island. Kennedy responded that the arms supply had had a serious negative impact in the United States. The President pointedly told Gromyko that the United States was basing its policy on the Soviet assertion that the arms supplied to Castro were defensive (Kennedy did not inform Gromyko that he knew about the offensive weapons). Following the meeting, the President's advisers met at the State Department and following that with the President at the White House to discuss options. Although they reached no decision, they were becoming increasingly interested in the blockade as the preferred option. (29)

Meetings on October 19 began at 11 a.m. and lasted until 7 p.m. Discussion centered on the legal aspects of a blockade, which most participants now agreed was a promising option, although for international legal reasons it was to be called a quarantine. Discussion of a military strike continued, however, with Taylor commenting that a blockade meant the abandonment of an air strike. Early in the afternoon, the participants formed two working groups to present alternatives to the President: a blockade scenario and a paper on the military option. Drafts of these reports were discussed at 4 p.m. meetings. McNamara now pointed out that the United States would probably have to give up its missile bases in Italy and Turkey in return for a negotiated removal of the Soviet MRBMs in Cuba. (31) When the meetings ended the two alternatives were still open.

The two options were submitted to the President at the 2:30 p.m. meeting of the National Security Council (NSC) on October 20. McNamara pushed for the blockade, advising the President that to succeed they probably would have to accept withdrawal of U.S. missiles in southern Europe. The pros and cons of the blockade were discussed for 2 hours as were those of the air strike scenario, which at this point was still supported by Bundy, Taylor, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The Attorney General noted that a blockade coupled with an air strike was very attractive to him. McCone opposed the air strikes, but admitted that a blockade did not seem to be a sufficient response. The President expressed his concern that whichever option was chosen, the Soviet Union would respond with a blockade of Berlin. After further discussion, Kennedy was prepared to go with the blockade, but wanted preparations for an air strike completed for either October 21 or 22 just in case. At the close of the NSC meeting, the participants considered how the blockade plan could be incorporated into the President's address to the nation. (34)

On October 21, the NSC thoroughly vetted the President's speech, reviewed military contingency plans, and discussed diplomatic measures. The President rejected UN Ambassador Adlai Stevenson's suggestions for a proposed summit meeting and a neutralization of Cuba or return of Guantanamo as means of easing the Soviet decision to dismantle the missiles. (38)

The Quarantine

At 6 p.m. on October 22, U.S. representatives in Washington and Moscow delivered a letter from the President to Khrushchev stating that the Kennedy administration knew about the missiles and other offensive weapons introduced into Cuba by the Soviet Union and stating that the United States was determined to remove this threat to hemispheric security. (44) Attached to the letter was a copy of the President's address to the nation, given 1 hour later, announcing the quarantine of Cuba and calling on the Soviet Union "to halt and eliminate this clandestine, reckless, and provocative threat to world peace."

On the evening of October 23, Robert Kennedy met with Soviet Ambassador Dobrynin to open up an informal channel to the Russians. Although the Attorney General told the Soviet Ambassador that he was not operating on instructions from the President, Dobrynin could have only believed that the Attorney General spoke with the approval of his brother. Robert Kennedy emphasized the administration's sense of betrayal at Soviet duplicity. (53) The next day, Khrushchev responded by accusing the United States of violating the UN Charter and all the norms of freedom of the seas. He reiterated the standard Soviet line that all the weapons being supplied to Cuba were defensive. (48) Ignoring this self-serving explanation, President Kennedy asked Khrushchev to instruct Soviet vessels headed to Havana to observe the terms of the quarantine, which would go into effect at 9 a.m. on October 24. (52) Khrushchev refused to comply, stating on October 24 that he considered the blockade "an act of aggression which pushes mankind toward the abyss of a world nuclear war." (61) As Soviet ships approached the quarantine line, the Kennedy administration had some sobering moments, but by the afternoon of October 24, the Soviet ships began to turn back. (58)

In a long letter of October 26, Khrushchev repeated that the missiles were strictly defensive and accused the United States of “proclaiming piratical measures” in establishing the blockade. Khrushchev suggested that if Washington would promise not to invade Cuba and remove the blockade, the Soviet Union would declare that its ships bound for the island were not carrying arms. (84) The letter bore Khrushchev’s personal style and the Kennedy administration was encouraged. In addition, there were hints from a Soviet intelligence official, Alexandr Fomin, to John Scali of ABC news that the Soviet Union would accept a public pledge not to invade in return for dismantling the missiles. (80, 85)

The Crisis Averted

On October 27, Khrushchev agreed to remove Soviet missiles from Cuba but only in return for the United States removing its MRBMs from Turkey. The letter from Khrushchev, which the Kennedy administration deemed to have been drafted by committee, also insisted upon mutual pledges by the United States and the Soviet Union to respect the inviolability of Cuban and Turkish borders. (91) Initial discussion by the Executive Committee suggested that the proposed trade was unacceptable. (92, 94) How far was the Kennedy administration prepared to go to remove the missiles from Cuba? There had been preliminary discussion about a possible trade of Italian and Turkish missiles. (56) Recent statements by former Soviet participants in the crisis suggest that Robert Kennedy planted the idea of a missile trade in Dobrynin’s mind at a meeting on the evening of October 26, but no first-hand record of this meeting has been found. Significantly, while most of the President’s advisers opposed a missile trade at an Executive Committee meeting on October 27, the President suggested that a trade, especially if the Turks took the initiative, would be better than an attack on Cuba. (90)

At the suggestion of Llewellyn Thompson, Ted Sorensen, and Robert Kennedy, the President deliberately ignored Khrushchev’s letter of October 27 on the Turkish MRBMs

altogether and responded to the letter of October 26. Kennedy responded on October 27 that the first issue to be dealt with was the removal of Soviet missiles and offensive weapons systems from Cuba. If this was done and properly verified, he promised to lift the quarantine and pledged not to invade Cuba. (95) To make matters worse, a U.S. reconnaissance plane was shot down over Cuba and its pilot was killed. On the evening of October 27, Robert Kennedy informed Dobrynin that time was running out. If the Soviet Union did not remove the missiles, the United States would do it. Robert Kennedy stated there “would be dead Americans but their also would be dead Russians.” Dobrynin asked what Kennedy was offering. The Attorney General mentioned the non-invasion pledge. When Dobrynin asked about the Turkish missiles, Robert Kennedy said there could be no quid pro quo—no deal—since it was a NATO question and NATO would not act under threat. The Attorney General added, at the President’s instruction, that the missiles would be removed within 4 or 5 months. In his report to Rusk, Robert Kennedy crossed out this passage, (96) but as he confirmed later in Thirteen Days, he did make the statement to Dobrynin. Rusk has subsequently suggested that, in the last resort, the Kennedy administration was prepared to trade missiles. In his memoir, As I Saw It, Rusk recalled that Kennedy approved a plan to have the UN arrange the missile trade, if necessary. (99)

However, these plans were not required. On October 28, Khrushchev replied positively to the President’s letter of October 27, saying that instructions had been given to Soviet officials in Cuba to dismantle and crate up for return to the Soviet Union the “arms which you described as offensive.” (102) Khrushchev also informed Kennedy that First Deputy Foreign Minister Kuznetsov would go to New York to negotiate a solution “aimed at eliminating the present dangerous situation.” Kuznetsov arrived the following day and began negotiations with Stevenson, John J. McCloy, and Secretary General U Thant, to establish procedures to verify the removal of the missiles and to end the blockade. (112) There was a storm cloud, however: Fidel Castro insisted that he would never accept United Nations verification on Cuban soil. (123)

Verification of Removal of the Missiles

The Khrushchev letter of October 28 lightened the tension in Washington immensely, but there were still serious problems. Kennedy insisted on continuing low-level air reconnaissance over Cuba until the Soviet Union made good on its promise to allow UN verification. (130, 131) The President was adamant that the withdrawal of the missiles must be verified, a suspected Soviet submarine base eliminated, and Cuba “demilitarized.” (138, 139)

Fomin asked Scali for patience and understanding from Kennedy. (137) Perhaps the missiles could be inspected at sea. McCloy and Stevenson received this same message from their Soviet counterparts at the United Nations. Stevenson informed Kennedy on November 3 that although the Russians might agree to ground inspection, the Cubans would not. Kennedy then insisted that Soviet IL-28 bombers in Cuba must also go. (138)

McCloy met Kuznetsov in Stamford, Connecticut, on November 4. The Soviet negotiator rejected the bombers as offensive weapons. He offered verification of all 42 Soviet missiles at sea but insisted upon a guarantee against a U.S. invasion of Cuba and a prohibition of U.S.-backed subversion against Castro in return. As for the submarine base, Kuznetsov stated it was only a fishing port. (142) In their correspondence on November 3 and 5, Kennedy and Khrushchev jousted over verification. Khrushchev argued that the bombers were not offensive, and furthermore they constituted a new demand. He challenged the President to get on with the deal. (140, 145)

Kennedy began to realize that ironclad verification in Cuba was impossible. John McCone sensed that the tide was running against full verification and submitted a strong dissent. He predicted that Castro would survive, and with bombers and Komars (Soviet missile boats), could threaten the rest of Latin America. To make matters worse according to McCone, the Soviet SAMs (surface-to-air missiles) in Cuba with their ability to shoot down U-2s could provide blanket cover for the reintroduction of offensive missiles. (146)

The dangers of verification became obvious on November 5 when during a meeting with Dobrynin, Robert Kennedy was interrupted by a call from his brother, the President, informing him that a U.S. plane flying reconnaissance over Cuba had been fired upon. Robert Kennedy stressed to Dobrynin that any "arrangements that were made were dependent upon there not being any incidents in the air above Cuba." (144)

In New York on November 6, Stevenson and McCloy learned that Soviet ships would be taking the missiles out of Cuba starting on November 6 and 7. Asked if they would also remove nuclear weapons as well, Kuznetsov replied that if there were nuclear weapons in Cuba they would be removed with the missiles. (151)

With Soviet ships departing with the missiles that day, the Kennedy administration had to work out an ad hoc means of verification. U.S. officials concluded that the best method was for U.S. Naval ships to pull along side departing Soviet ships to verify and take photographs. (152, 153) At the Executive Committee meeting on the evening of November 6, the participants dissuaded the President from taking too hard a line with Khrushchev. Instead they persuaded Kennedy to concentrate on the issue at hand, verification of the missiles' removal, saving the bomber issue for later negotiations. (154) Kennedy's letter to Khrushchev of November 6 nonetheless contained a strong objection to Khrushchev's view that the bombers were not offensive weapons and therefore not subject to the understanding of October 27–28. (155)

At the next Executive Committee meeting, it was clear that the President had been won over. He agreed to delay action on the bombers until the missiles were out. (158) At the United Nations, Stevenson and McCloy received instructions outlining the minimum deal the United States would accept: MRBM, IRBMs, bombers, and nuclear weapons must leave. The United States was prepared to accept Soviet assurances that there would be no submarine base in Cuba. (159)

On November 8, Kuznetsov informed Stevenson and McCloy that the 42 missiles were out of Cuba completing the Soviet part of the understanding. The warheads would also go and the Soviets now expected the United States to fulfill its part of the bargain. (163) The next day Stevenson suggested to Washington a plan for settling outstanding issues, which included calling off the quarantine, a formal U.S. pledge in the UN Security Council against invasion of Cuba in return for Soviet removal of the bombers with verification at sea, and a formal Soviet assurance to the Security Council that there were no nuclear weapons in Cuba. Soviet compliance would be verified by Latin American diplomats in Cuba. The Soviet Union and Cuba would also agree not to reintroduce offensive weapons, and the United States would agree to call off subversion and sabotage against Cuba. Under Secretary of State George Ball did not like Stevenson's plan, which he characterized as a "guarantee" for Castro with "no obligations," but he passed it to the President without written comment. (167, 168)

The Bomber Crisis and the Non-Invasion Pledge

Ball had his own plan for resolving the bomber crisis, which he recommended to the President. Earlier Ball had agreed with McGeorge Bundy that the bombers should be downgraded to a U.S.-Cuban problem, not a U.S.-Soviet issue. (164) Ball now suggested that the United States accept the Soviet Union's contention that it could not control Castro and thus eliminate the issue of the IL-28s from the U.S.-U.S.S.R. dialogue. (169) Ball's idea seemed the right course when Khrushchev gave his "gentleman's word" in a letter of November 12 to Kennedy that the bombers would be removed, "not now but later." Khrushchev could not resist, however, pointing out that without air cover the bombers could be shot down by anti-aircraft artillery, regular artillery, or fighters. How could the President consider these defenseless planes as a threat? (171)

The Kennedy administration deliberated whether to accept Khrushchev's "gentlemen's agreement." The President leaned that way. Robert Kennedy informed Dobrynin that if the Soviet Union gave the order to remove the bombers and they were out within 30 days, the United States would immediately lift the quarantine. (172, 173) McCone objected and warned that even stripped of missiles and bombers Castro remained a serious threat. (174) Any chance that the issue would be resolved immediately was eliminated by Khrushchev's letter of November 14 insisting that 30 days was not enough time for withdrawal of the IL-28s. Khrushchev suggested that if the United States stopped overflights of Cuba—something Kennedy was unprepared to do—he would announce the withdrawal of the bombers. (176) In a November 15 letter to Khrushchev, Kennedy admitted that the bombers deal was only a matter of timing, but the issue of verification remained unresolved, especially in light of unconfirmed reports of weapons stored in caves. Kennedy demanded safeguards against the reintroduction of strategic weapons and worried that “trouble” might spring from Cuban sources. (181)

At the Executive Committee meeting on November 16, Kennedy vowed that the United States would continue to overfly Cuba in the face of Cuban threats to shoot down reconnaissance planes. The President accepted in principle McCone’s warning that SAMs must not be allowed to shield a new Soviet military build up. McCloy then presented Stevenson’s assessment that the U.S.-Soviet negotiations at the United Nations were deadlocked. The Soviets could not deliver on-site inspections because of Castro’s insistence on receiving in return a non-invasion pledge. The President suggested that perhaps the deadlock could be resolved informally with a public statement promising no invasion of Cuba—provided there was no military threat or civil war—while the United States continued unobtrusive overflights. Kennedy envisioned a solution without a clear, formal agreement. (185)

U.S. and Soviet negotiators met on the evening of November 19 at the Soviet compound in Locust Valley on Long Island for a discussion marked by recriminations and reproaches. McCloy stated that the President must say something about the bombers in his press conference of November 20. If there was no agreement on them, then there was no agreement on offensive weapons. The United States would not sign a non-invasion pledge—that would make it a treaty requiring Senate confirmation—but it would make a “solemn declaration” in the United Nations. Kuznetsov replied that the Soviet Union would remove the bombers, but only in conjunction with settlement of other issues including overflights. McCloy shot back that there was no stopping overflights until there was adequate verification. Furthermore, if U.S. reconnaissance planes were attacked, they would return fire. (191) At the Executive Committee meeting the morning of November 19, the same showdown state of mind prevailed. After the meeting, Ball informed McCloy that his Soviet counterparts should be informed that if there were no deal [illegible in the original] the IL-28s the Soviet Union could expect a more drastic and extended quarantine. (192, 193)

Under this pressure the Soviet Union retreated. Fomin assured Scali that the procedure for verification of missiles could be used for bombers and that Soviet IL-28 technicians were returning to the Soviet Union. If the United States lifted the blockade and gave the Soviets a draft of a non-aggression pledge, the two sides had a deal. (195) Fomin's promises were followed by a November 20 letter from Khrushchev who agreed to remove the bombers with their technicians within a month or sooner. (196) The United States then lifted the quarantine and the crisis that began on October 16, 1962, was finally over. There was general agreement on November 20 that since Khrushchev had not insisted on a formal non-invasion pledge, he should not be given one. (197) McCloy called Ball to register his belief that since the Soviet Union had come through for the United States, they should get a non-invasion declaration. (199) Ball discussed it with McGeorge Bundy who stated that 42 missiles and 30 bombers did not constitute much of a concession. When the United States got real verification, Cuba would get a non-invasion pledge. (200)

At the Executive Committee meeting on November 21, Kennedy agreed to abandon U.S. demands for ground inspection in Cuba, but he would not relinquish the right to invade Cuba in the event of civil war, in response to Cuban fostered guerrilla subversion directed against Latin American, or if offensive weapons were reintroduced into Cuba. Kennedy was not prepared to "build up Castro with a no invasion pledge." (201) Instead the President informed Khrushchev that he need have "no fear of invasion of Cuba while matters take their present favorable course." (202) Kennedy then drafted language with Ball for a very cautious and qualified pledge not to invade Cuba. (204)

The "Understanding" on Cuba

At this point the Kennedy administration faced a crossroads. Either it could extend negotiations with the Soviet Union on UN verification and the non-invasion pledge or it could move to rapidly conclude the matter. (205) Former President Eisenhower and McCloy favored a quick wrap up on Cuba, relying on overflights and other intelligence resources to verify. Neither one held out much hope for the effectiveness of UN inspection of Cuba. McCone remained opposed to any non-invasion pledge. (209)

The administration initially tried negotiations. McCloy and Stevenson met with Mikoyan, the "hardest bargainer in [the] Kremlin's stable of tough negotiators." Mikoyan made the case for Castro's role in the negotiations, insisted on reciprocity of inspections, and objected that the draft U.S. non-invasion pledge was only an intention, not a commitment. Clearly, Mikoyan was not considering a quick resolution. (213)

The President was unprepared to make concessions that would pave the way for a formal settlement. As he told the Executive Committee on November 29, he would rather have Soviet troops in Cuba than give Castro a non-invasion pledge. At this same meeting, the President authorized the continuation of Mongoose Operations (a special program of intelligence operations directed at Cuba), but restricted it to intelligence gathering. (216, 217) In his meeting with Mikoyan, who had just returned from a long and unpleasant visit to Cuba, Kennedy gave no ground. (218, 219)

At the Executive Committee meeting on December 3, Stevenson and Ball explained the three issues holding up negotiations in New York: the manner in which the United States expressed its intention to continue overflights, U.S. insistence on preservation of peace in the Caribbean, and the no-invasion undertaking. As the President put it, he was "not going to rat on an agreement with the Russians, but we are not going to tie on to a no-invasion pledge in a way which allowed Castro to operate from an invulnerable base." (222)

McCloy and Stevenson argued for concessions to allow them to conclude the negotiations. (227, 228) McCone spoke against such a course. (224, 229) It was generally agreed within the administration that the United States should not accept just any agreement, but should hold out for a good one. (230) The chances for a formal resolution dimmed.

Nevertheless, the President authorized Stevenson and McCloy to seek an agreement with the Soviet Union on the basis of a joint report to the Security Council, but on terms that the Soviet Union was not likely to accept. (243) The Soviet negotiators rejected this last U.S. offer on December 14, stating that the non-invasion pledge was too qualified, that reference to overflights was included, and that there was no provision for Cuban participation. The Soviets countered with a plan to send the Kennedy and Khrushchev letters of October 27 and 28 to the Security Council. (253, 256) The Kennedy administration responded with a plan to send the letters plus the White House and Presidential press statements of October 27 and November 20. If the Soviets rejected this, then either a joint or separate letters to the Secretary General should be sent saying that despite progress made, the United States and Soviet Union could not resolve their differences. (257) There was no resolution. The United States and the Soviet Union decided on a joint letter to the Secretary General admitting their inability to agree. (259, 263) The long and drawn out negotiations for a mutually acceptable agreed resolution to the Cuban missile crisis ended in failure. There was no specific set of obligations and procedures, just Soviet removal of the missiles and the bombers and a promise of a gradual scaling down of Soviet military personnel in Cuba in return for a lifting of the quarantine, the indication that U.S. missiles would eventually be removed from Turkey, and limited assurances that the United States would not invade Cuba. In the end, there were no formal U.S.-Soviet understandings to end the Cuban missile crisis.

Covert Operations Against Cuba

The remainder of the volume covers 1963 in which U.S.-Soviet confrontation over Cuba is only one of a number of themes. Other major issues include increased covert operations against Cuba including more extensive and efficient use of refugees and exiles, tighter economic pressure against Cuba, and exploration of a possible rapprochement with Castro. The Kennedy administration used the natural breaking point of the end of the missile and bomber crises to reorganize its covert operations against Castro by disbanding Operation Mongoose and placing day-to-day responsibility for covert and overt operations under a Department of State Coordinator for Cuban Affairs. (261)

The Kennedy administration began 1963 with an internal debate over covert operations against Cuba. Should it try to isolate and then actively seek the overthrow of Castro or should it isolate Cuba and seek reduction of Soviet presence as a more limited goal? Debate also ranged over tactics. Should the United States apply increasing degrees of pressure or merely press Castro as opportunities presented themselves? (270, 272) In mid-April, the Cuban Coordinator, Sterling Cottrell, recommended a more intensified covert program against Cuba without resolving the broader questions. (318) McGeorge Bundy suggested that the United States faced three options: confrontation with Castro to force a non-Communist solution, gradual pressure to achieve limited ends, or accommodation. (320) The overriding problem, according to U.S. intelligence estimates, was that Castro was gaining strength within Cuba. As McCone saw it, present covert operations could slow Castro down, but would not hurt him critically. (323) On May 28, the issue came to a head at a meeting of the Standing Group of the NSC. McGeorge Bundy stated that the United States did not have the ability to overthrow Castro. McCone countered that increasing economic hardship on Cuba would cause the Cuban military to overthrow him. McNamara wondered just which economic denial and covert policies would accomplish Castro's demise. Robert Kennedy suggested that the United States had to do something, even if it did not believe that it would cause Castro's fall. (344) On June 8, the Central Intelligence Agency submitted an intensified covert plan that assumed that the United States would not invade Cuba, but which was designed to apply maximum pressure to prevent Castro from consolidating his rule and to encourage dissident Cuban elements to eliminate his control and reduce Soviet influence. The President approved, but he had no illusions that Castro would soon be out of power. (346, 348)

Possible Rapprochement With Cuba

As the Kennedy administration was increasing covert operations against Castro, it was also considering the possibility of a rapprochement with him. McGeorge Bundy had tentatively raised the issue in early 1963. (261) McCone also suggested to the President in mid-April 1963 that better contacts with Castro could possibly turn him away from the Soviets. (315) Later in April 1963, Bundy raised the issue again and suggested that although it seemed contradictory, accommodation still was compatible with more anti-Castro options. (320) It was Kennedy's two-track ploy.

One of the problems with the policy of accommodation was how to contact Castro. Lawyer James B. Donovan, who was negotiating the release of the Bay of Pigs prisoners, was one channel, (310, 330) 238); journalists were another (332). Obviously the policy was extremely controversial and held very closely. Although he earlier raised it as a possibility, McCone came to believe it was a "bad idea" and "dangerous politically." McCone worried that Rusk favored it. (351) McGeorge Bundy agreed that the time was not yet right for détente with Castro, but he saw no harm in keeping channels open. (356)

The most definite attempt to contact Castro came at the initiative of former Ambassador to Guinea, William Attwood, who used his personal contacts with Cuban UN representative Carlos Lechuga to raise the issue. (367, 372, 374) On November 12, 1963, President Kennedy authorized Attwood's tentative talks with Dr. René Vallejo, Castro's aide and physician, but the two men did not get together. (377) Kennedy's assassination delayed the process. White House officials suggested that the Attwood channel was now less promising since Lyndon Johnson probably ran a greater risk of appearing "soft" on Castro if the talks become known publicly. (378) Nevertheless, Castro was still interested and White House officials favored continuing the dialogue. (383, 384) When President Johnson learned of these talks in mid-December, apparently for the first time, he was "somewhere between lukewarm and cool" on the idea. (387, 388) The initiative lost momentum.

Soviet Troops in Cuba and Cuban Exiles

The major cause of U.S.-Soviet friction over Cuba in 1963 was U.S. concern with reducing the thousands of Soviet military personnel in Cuba. In January 1963, Kuznetsov promised Kennedy that they would be withdrawn in time.

(266) In late February, Dobrynin told Thompson that “several thousand” troops would be withdrawn later in the month. (286, 287) McCone held that the Soviets were in Cuba to stay no matter how many incremental withdrawals they made. (299, 314) By mid-1963, the CIA reported that 12,000 to 13,000 Soviet troops were still in Cuba. Although there was no indication of reintroduction of Soviet strategic weapons, Castro was gaining political strength. (347) By October 1963, the Defense Intelligence Agency estimated that 5,000 to 8,000 Soviet military troops were in Cuba. (370) Gromyko assured a skeptical Kennedy that only specialists remained. (371) McCone assured the President in mid-November that the Soviets were gradually withdrawing but leaving their equipment for the Cubans. (375)

The use of Cuban exiles and refugees against Castro is the last principal theme of 1963. Rusk opposed the hit-and-run tactics of U.S.-sponsored exile groups as an unnecessary and complicating factor in U.S.-U.S.S.R. relations. Rusk wanted to control exile groups more effectively. Over McCone’s opposition, he convinced the President to do so. (302, 303, 304) The United States discouraged exile raids from U.S. territory, but was less able to control raids from outside the United States. (365, 366)

When he became President, Johnson did not reexamine U.S. policy toward Cuba. He remained committed to Kennedy’s concept of non-invasion as long as certain conditions were met. If anything, Johnson wanted a more effective covert and economic denial program against Cuba. (381, 388–390) Although U.S.-Cuban relations would prove difficult and antagonistic during Johnson’s years, they never reached the drama and tension of the Cuban Missile Crisis.

List of Documents

No.	Document Description
-----	----------------------

Bolivia

- | | |
|---|--|
| 1 | Telegram 430 from La Paz, February 9, 1961. Transmits text of Bolivian communiqué on U.S.-Bolivian agreement on U.S. military assistance for Bolivian economic development and internal security. Unclassified. 1 p. DOS, CF, 611.247/2-961. |
| 2 | Memorandum from Schlesinger to Kennedy, March 3, 1961. The crisis in Bolivia. No classification marking. 7 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Regional Security Series, Latin America. |
| 3 | Memorandum from General Lemnitzer to McNamara, JCSM-236-61, April 13, 1961. Bolivian request for a bilateral agreement. Secret. 3 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD/ISA Files: FRC 64 A 2382, Bolivia, 1961, 000.1—. |
| 4 | Memorandum from Hilsman (INR) to Woodward (ARA), July 18, 1961. Latin American and U.S. concern for Bolivian stability and security. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 724.00/7-2461. |
| 5 | Memorandum of conversation, July 21, 1961, between Rusk and Bolivian Ambassador Andrade. Bolivian Government request for $11 million emergency economic assistance. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 330. |
| 6 | Memorandum of conversation, October 18, 1961, among Rusk, Andrade, and Fitzgerald (ICA). Bolivian request for emergency assistance. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 330. |
| 7 | Memorandum from Hamilton (ICA) to Dungan, June 28, 1962. Transmits for Kennedy's approval a joint U.S.-IADB program of development assistance for Bolivia. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Brubeck Series, Box 32. |

No.	Document Description
8	Memorandum from Dungan to President Kennedy, July 6, 1962. Transmits a memorandum to approve announcement of the U.S. commitment of assistance to Bolivia; handwritten note that Kennedy approved. No classification marking. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Brubeck Series, Bolivia, 1961–1962.
9	Memorandum from Hansen (BOB) to Dungan, July 19, 1962. Concerns about the Bolivian aid commitment. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Brubeck Series, Bolivia, 1961–1962.
10	Memorandum from Topping (S/P) to Rostow, July 30, 1962. Observations concerning the Alliance for Progress and Bolivia. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, S/P Files: Lot 69 D 121, Bolivia.
11	Memorandum of conversation, November 15, 1962, between Rusk and Andrade. Exchange of views during Andrade's farewell call. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 724.00/11–1562.
12	Memorandum of conversation, April 24, 1963, between Kennedy and Ambassador Sanchez de Lozada. Exchange of views during presentation of credentials. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Bolivia, General 4–7/63.
13	Memorandum from Major General Lansdale to McNamara and Gilpatric, June 3, 1963. Report on visit to Bolivia. Secret. 10 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Bolivia, General 4–7/63.
14	Memorandum from Read (S/S) to McGeorge Bundy, July 20, 1963. Transmits memorandum on the situation in Bolivia. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Bolivia, General 4–7/63.
15	Memorandum from Cottrell (ARA) to the Special Group (Counter-Insurgency), July 31, 1963. The internal security threat in Bolivia and contingency planning. Secret. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Bolivia, General 4–7/63.

No.	Document Description
16	Memorandum of conversation, October 22, 1963, among Kennedy, President Paz, and U.S. and Bolivian officials. General exchange of views. Confidential. 4 pp. DOS, President's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.
17	Memorandum of conversation, October 22, 1963, among Kennedy, President Paz, and U.S. and Bolivian officials. Bolivian-Chilean relations. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, President's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.
18	Memorandum of conversation, October 22, 1963, among Kennedy, President Paz, and U.S. and Bolivian officials. Alliance for Progress; U.S. aid to Bolivia; development assistance; petroleum. Confidential. 7 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Bolivia, Paz Visit, 10/63.
19	Memorandum of conversation, October 23, 1963, among Kennedy, President Paz, and U.S. and Bolivian officials. Cuban subversion. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, President's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.
20	Memorandum of conversation, October 23, 1963, among Kennedy, President Paz, and U.S. and Bolivian officials. Communist propaganda. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, President's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.
21	Memorandum of conversation, October 23, 1963, among Kennedy, President Paz, and U.S. and Bolivian officials. Alliance for Progress; U.S. assistance. Confidential. 5 pp. DOS, President's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.
22	Memorandum of conversation, November 20, 1963, between Kennedy and Ambassador Henderson. Discussion of Henderson's mission to Bolivia. Confidential. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Bolivia, General, 8/63–1/64.

Chile

23	Memorandum of conversation, February 20, 1961, between Rusk and Ambassador Mueller. Financial assistance to Chile. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 725.5–MSP/2–2061.
----	--

No.	Document Description
24	Memorandum from Achilles to Berle, April 13, 1961. Chilean attitude toward Cuban problem; aid to Chile Christian Democratic Party. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, Task Force on Latin America Files: Lot 61 D 298, Chile.
25	Memorandum of conversation, April 17, 1961, between Dillon and Agriculture Minister Casanueva. Chilean economic adjustment and planning for the future. Official Use Only. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 611.25/4-1761.
26	Memorandum of conversation, June 2, 1961, between Barall and Chargé Soto. Difficulties in programming U.S. assistance for Chilean reconstruction. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 725.5-MSP/6-261.
27	Memorandum of conversation, October 10, 1961, between President Kennedy and Foreign Minister Martinez. Recent political changes in Chile; Alliance for Progress; economic development; land reform; Cuba. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, October-December 1961.
28	Instructions for Moscoso Mission, undated. Two-phased proposal of conditional U.S. financial assistance to Chile. Confidential. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, January-June, 1962.
29	Telegram 746 from Santiago, March 8, 1962. Text of agreement worked out with Chilean cabinet re U.S. loans to Chile. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, January-June, 1962.
30	Telegram 58 to Santiago, July 20, 1962. Reiteration of U.S. hard line with respect to Chile's economic problems and programs. Confidential. 4 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, July-October, 1962.
31	Letter from Charles W. Cole to Edwin M. Martin, July 23, 1962. Crucial points in U.S.-Chile economic relations. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 611.25/7-2362.

No.	Document Description
32	Memorandum from Belcher to Edwin M. Martin, July 25, 1962. Ambassador Cole's position on the situation in Chile. Confidential. DOS, CF, 725.00/7–2562.
33	Memorandum of conversation, December 11, 1962, among President Alessandri, President Kennedy, and other officials. Current situation in Chile; Alliance for Progress. Limited Official Use. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, January–June, 1963.
34	Memorandum of conversation, December 11, 1962, among President Alessandri, President Kennedy, and other officials. Problems and importance of American investment in Chile. Limited Official Use. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, January–June, 1963.
35	Memorandum of conversation, December 11, 1962, among President Alessandri, President Kennedy, and other officials. Cuban problem. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, January–June, 1963.
36	Memorandum of conversation, December 11, 1962, among President Alessandri, President Kennedy, and other officials. U.S. military assistance programs; Chilean relations with Bolivia. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, January–June, 1963.
37	Memorandum of conversation, December 11, 1962, among President Alessandri, President Kennedy, and other officials. Press reports about Chile. Limited Official Use. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, January–June, 1963.
38	Memorandum of conversation, December 12, 1962, among President Alessandri, President Kennedy, and other officials. Chile and Cuba. Secret. 4 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Brubeck Series, Chile, December 1963.
39	Memorandum of conversation, December 12, 1962, between President Kennedy and President Alessandri. Text not declassified. Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, November–December 1962.

No.	Document Description
40	Memorandum of conversation, December 12, 1962, between President Alessandri and President Kennedy. Communists in international organizations. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, November–December 1962.
41	Memorandum of conversation, December 12, 1962, among President Alessandri, President Kennedy, and other officials. U.S. aid; relationship of EEC with LAFTA. Limited Official Use. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, January–June, 1963.
42	Memorandum of conversation, January 24, 1963, between President Kennedy and Ambassador Muller. Farewell call on the President. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 725.00/1–2463.
43	Telegram 37 to Santiago, July 24, 1963. Text not declassified. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 12 CHILE.
44	Memorandum of conversation, August 19, 1963, between President Kennedy and Senator Duran from Chile. Political situation and upcoming election in Chile. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, July–November 1963.
45	National Intelligence Estimate 94–63, October 3, 1963. “The Chilean Situation and Prospects.” Secret. 25 pp. CIA, ODDI Registry, Job 79–R01012A.
46	Memorandum of conversation, November 14, 1963, among Belcher, Thompson, Richardson, Carlisle, and others. Chilean Presidential election of 1964 and implications for U.S. strategy and policy. Secret. 4 pp. DOS, CF, POL 14 CHILE.

Colombia

- | | |
|----|--|
| 47 | Memorandum of conversation, February 17, 1961, among Rusk, Ambassador Sanz de Santamaría, and U.S. and Colombian officials. Exchange of views on matters of mutual interest. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, Secretary’s Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 330. |
|----|--|

No.	Document Description
48	Memorandum of conversation, February 25, 1961, between Lleras Camargo and Adolf A. Berle, Jr. General exchange of views including: economic conditions; Caribbean crisis; Government of Haiti; Cuba; Mexico. Secret. 6 pp. DOS, CF, 721.11/2–2561.
49	Memorandum of conversation, March 23, 1961, between Rusk and Ambassador Sanz de Santamaría. U.S. military and financial assistance to Colombia. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 330.
50	Memorandum from Mulliken to Carwell, June 8, 1961. Meeting with Colombian Ambassador on coffee price stabilization. Official Use Only. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 611.21/6–861.
51	Telegram 3 to Bogota, July 3, 1961. Letter from Rusk to President Lleras expressing gratification for President's initiative on the Cuban problem. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Colombia, 1961.
52	Telegram 145 to Bogota, August 28, 1961. Instructions for meeting with President Lleras and Foreign Minister Turbay regarding action program on Cuba outlined earlier by Colombia. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 721.00/8–2861.
53	Memorandum of conversation, September 25, 1961, between President Kennedy and Ambassador Turbay. Lleras Plan to test Cuba's willingness to remain in the Inter-American system. Confidential. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Colombia, 1961.
54	Memorandum from Woodward to Acting Secretary, September 27, 1961. Urgent need for internal security aid to Colombia. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 721.5–MSP/9–2761.
55	Memorandum of conversation, October 6, 1961, between Ambassador Sanz de Santamaría and Coerr. Colombian request for additional internal security aid. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 721.5–MSP/10–661.
56	Telegram 234 from Bogota, October 12, 1961. State of siege declared throughout Colombia by President Lleras. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 721.00/10–1361.

No.	Document Description
57	Telegram 315 to Bogota, November 1, 1961. Announcement that President Kennedy has signed determination to furnish internal security aid to Colombia. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 721.00/11-0161.
58	Memorandum of conversation, December 17, 1961, between President Kennedy and President Lleras. Developments in the Dominican Republic; planning for Foreign Ministers meeting on Cuban problem. Confidential. 5 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Colombia, January 1962.
59	Memorandum of conversation, June 8, 1962, between President Kennedy and Ambassador Freeman. Alliance for Progress results in Colombia. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, Presidential Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.
60	Memorandum of conversation, June 26, 1962, among U. Alexis Johnson, President-elect Valencia and other U.S. and Colombian officials. Review of relations between the two countries. Confidential. 6 pp. DOS, CF, 611.21/6-2662.
61	Airgram A-145 from Bogota, September 5, 1962. Transmits September 4 memorandum of conversation between Ambassador Freeman and President Valencia on the violence problem in Colombia. Secret. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 721.00/9-562.
62	Memorandum of conversation, September 18, 1962, between Rusk and Ambassador Sanz de Santamaría. Farewell call of Ambassador; Colombian request for $60 million balance-of-payments loan and counterpart release. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 330.
63	Memorandum of conversation, September 27, 1962, between President Kennedy and Ambassador Sanz de Santamaría. Farewell call of Ambassador; Coffee Agreement; Alliance for Progress. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Colombia, July-September 1962.
64	DOS Guidelines for Policy and Operations: Colombia, December 1962. Secret. 10 pp. DOS, S/P Files: Lot 69 D 121.

No.	Document Description
65	Memorandum of conversation, February 1, 1963, among DOS officials. Colombian political and economic problems. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL COL.
66	Airgram A-731 from Bogota, May 10, 1963. Political contingencies—extra-legal changes. Confidential. 5 pp. DOS, CF, POL 23 COL.
67	Memorandum of conversation, July 24, 1963, between President Kennedy and Ambassador Uribe Botero. Presentation of Ambassador's credentials; Colombian budgetary difficulties. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 17 COL-U.S.

Costa Rica

68	Despatch 576 from San Jose, April 6, 1961. Status of relations with current Costa Rican Government. Secret. 11 pp. DOS, CF, 611.18/4-661.
69	Memorandum of conversation, April 17, 1961, between President Kennedy and Ambassador Escalante. Costa Rican land reform program. Official Use Only. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Costa Rica, January–August 1961.
70	Despatch 625 from San Jose, April 25, 1961. President Echandi's current attitude toward U.S. aid. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 611.18/4-2561.
71	Telegram 519 from San Jose, May 18, 1961. Reasons for delay in presenting credentials by new U.S. Ambassador. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 611.18/5-1861.
72	Despatch 360 from San Jose, January 24, 1962. President Echandi's concern over 1962 U.S. sugar allocation. Official Use Only. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 818.235/1-2462.
73	Despatch 440 from San Jose, March 2, 1962. Costa Rica's fiscal difficulties and request for U.S. assistance, with a copy of a letter from the Central Bank to President-elect Orlich. Confidential. 5 pp. DOS, CF, 818.10/3-262.

No.	Document Description
74	Despatch 442 from San Jose, March 5, 1962. U.S. efforts to encourage economic planning in Costa Rica. Official Use Only. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 818.00/3-562.
75	Memorandum from Woodward to Moscoso, March 7, 1962. Costa Rican financial difficulties. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 818.10/3-762.
76	Memorandum of conversation, April 24, 1962, between Foreign Minister-designate Oduber and Edwin M. Martin. Economic policies of incoming Orlich administration. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 818.13/4-2462.
77	Memorandum of conversation, April 24, 1962, between Foreign Minister-designate Oduber and Edwin M. Martin. Orlich government's attitude toward other Central American States. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 810.18/4-2762.
78	Memorandum of conversation, April 30, 1962, between Figures and Moscoso and other U.S. officials. Costa Rican financial situation and possibility of U.S. assistance to rectify it. Official Use Only. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 818.00/4-3062.
79	Letter from Telles to Edwin M. Martin, May 31, 1962. End of year assessment: DOS failure to act on Embassy recommendations and lack of confidence Department has shown in Embassy; Orlich visit to Washington; Costa Rican fiscal and budgetary problem; U.S. policy in dealing with Figueres. Confidential. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 611.18/5-3162.
80	Airgram A-191 from San Jose, June 4, 1962. Meeting between President Orlich and Minister of Economy Hess and Ambassador Telles on seriousness of Costa Rica's current financial crisis and President's hope for U.S. assistance. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 818.00/6-362.
81	Airgram A-46 from San Jose, July 23, 1962. Country Team recommendation for fiscal assistance to GOCR. Official Use Only. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 818.10/7-2362.

No.	Document Description
82	Memorandum of conversation, August 13, 1962, among Ambassador Facio, former Ambassador Esquivel and Edwin M. Martin. Serious budget deficit in Costa Rica; coffee conference in New York. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 718.00/8–662.
83	Memorandum of conversation, August 13, 1962, between Ambassador Facio and John W. Fischer. Costa Rican budgetary problem. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 818.00/8–1362.
84	Memorandum of conversation, September 13, 1962, among Edwin M. Martin, Ambassador Facio, and other Costa Rican and U.S. officials. U.S. assistance in Costa Rican budget crisis. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 811.10/9–1362.
85	Circular Airgram CA–6669, December 19, 1962. Approved Plan of Action toward Costa Rica from December 1962 to October 1963. Secret. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 611.18/12–1962.
86	Memorandum of conversation among President Kennedy, President Orlich, and other U.S. and Costa Rican officials. Requests for U.S. aid: Project financing, National Industrial Corporation; education, health and fiscal problems. Official Use Only. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, President's Trip—San Jose, March 1963, Memcons.
87	Airgram A–7 from San Jose, July 6, 1963. Report of President Orlich first public criticism of U.S. for slow processing of GOCCR loan applications. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 15–1 COSTA RICA.
88	Memorandum of conversation, July 31, 1963, between Foreign Minister Oduber and Cottrell. Text not declassified. Secret. 1 p. DOS, CF, POL COSTA RICA–CUBA.

Ecuador

89	Despatch 419 from Quito, February 2, 1961. U.S. economic assistance policy toward Ecuador. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 822.10/2–661.
90	Telegram 447 to Quito and 553 to Lima, February 25, 1961. U.S. concerns over possible arms race between Ecuador and Peru. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 722.58/2–2161.

No.	Document Description
91	Memorandum of conversation, April 18, 1961, between President Kennedy and Foreign Minister Chiriboga. Review of relations and security in Latin America. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 720.5-MSP/4-186.
92	Memorandum of conversation, May 2, 1961, between Foreign Minister Chiriboga and A.A. Berle. Chiriboga's concern over pro-Communist forces in Ecuador. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 722.00/5-261.
93	Despatch 673 from Quito, May 9, 1961. U.S. military relationship with Ecuador. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 722.5-MSP/5-961.
94	Telegram 211 to Quito, undated. DOS response to request from Ecuadorean military officers for equipment to assist in maintaining internal security. Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Ecuador.
95	Memorandum from McGhee to Woodward, November 9, 1961. Anatomy of the revolution in Ecuador. Secret. 2 pp. WNRC, RG 59, S/P Files: Lot 67 D 548, Ecuador.
96	Memorandum from Woodward to McGhee, November 17, 1961. Response to McGhee's November 9 memorandum on the anatomy of the Ecuadorean revolution. Secret. 1 p. WNRC, RG 59, S/P Files: Lot 67 D 548, Ecuador.
97	Memorandum of conversation, November 24, 1961, between Rusk and Ambassador Plaza. Attitude and needs of the new Government of Ecuador. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 330.
98	Memorandum of conversation, November 28, 1961, between President Kennedy and Ambassador Plaza. New Government in Ecuador; U.S. aid. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, Presidential Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.

No.	Document Description
99	Memorandum from McClintock to Rostow, December 15, 1961, transmitting a memorandum from Woodward to McGhee and Ramsey, which attaches a memorandum from Woodward to McGhee. Preliminary analysis of recent Ecuadorean revolution. Secret. 6 pp. WNRC, RG 59, S/P Files: Lot 67 D 548, Ecuador.
100	Memorandum of conversation, January 10, 1962, between President Kennedy and Ambassador Ponce. Presentation of credentials; discussion of upcoming Meeting of Foreign Ministers at Punta del Este. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Ecuador, January 1961–March 1962.
101	Memorandum for the record, February 6, 1962. Text not declassified. Secret. 1 p. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files, Job 80–B01285A, Meetings With the President, Box 6, 12/1/61–6/30/62.
102	Memorandum of conversation, July 23, 1962, between President Kennedy and President Arosemena and other U.S. and Ecuadorean officials. U.S. assistance to Ecuador; situation in Ecuador; situation in Peru. Confidential. 4 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Country Series, Ecuador, April–August, 1962.
103	Memorandum of conversation, July 24, 1962, between President Kennedy and President Arosemena. Alliance for Progress. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Country Series, Ecuador, April–August, 1962.
104	Memorandum of conversation, July 24, 1962, between President Arosemena and Acting Secretary Ball and U.S. and Ecuadorean officials. Financial and economic situation in Ecuador. Confidential. 4 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Country Series, Ecuador, April–August, 1962.
105	Memorandum of conversation, July 25, 1962, between President Kennedy and President Arosemena and U.S. and Ecuadorean officials. Economic problems and reform in Ecuador. Confidential. 4 pp. DOS, Presidential Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.

No.	Document Description
106	Memorandum from Brubeck to Dungan, January 24, 1963. Transmits a copy of the Contingency Paper on Ecuador. Secret. 6 pp. DOS, CF, 722.00/1-2463.
107	Telegram 17 from Quito, July 11, 1963. Announcement of five-man military junta ouster of Arosemena government. Confidential. 9 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Ecuador, July to November, 1963.
108	Memorandum of conversation, July 17, 1963, between Rusk and Ambassador Ponce. Informal discussion of new regime and future of Ecuador. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Ecuador, July to November 1963.
109	Circular telegram CA-73 to certain American Republic posts, July 18, 1963. U.S. withholding recognition new Government in Ecuador until junta indicates intention to return to civilian government and several other Latin American countries have recognized Ecuador. Confidential. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Ecuador, July to November 1963.
110	Circular telegram 170 to certain American Republic posts, July 26, 1963. U.S. plan to recognize Ecuadorian junta by July 31 if several other Hemisphere countries do so by then. Confidential. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Ecuador, July to November, 1963.
111	Memorandum of conversation, August 7, 1963, between President Kennedy and Foreign Minister Ponce. Farewell call of departing Ecuadorean Ambassador (the new Foreign Minister); Alliance for Progress; subversion of Communist activities in Ecuador. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Ecuador, July to November, 1963.

El Salvador

- | | |
|-----|---|
| 112 | Memorandum from Mann to Rusk, January 25, 1961. Overthrow of the Junta Government in El Salvador by the Salvadoran Army. Confidential. 1 p. DOS, CF, 716.00/1-2561. |
|-----|---|

No.	Document Description
113	Memorandum from Mann to Rusk, February 9, 1961. Recommendation to recognize new Government in El Salvador on February 15. Confidential. 1 p. DOS, CF, 716.02/2–961.
114	Memorandum from Mann to Rusk, February 11, 1961, transmitting a memorandum from Rusk to the President. Recommendation that no formal statement be made by the President or the Department at time of recognition of Salvadoran Government. Confidential. 1 pp. DOS, CF, 716.02/2–1161.
115	Telegram 321 to San Salvador, February 13, 1961. Transmit text of note of recognition of Salvadoran Government. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 716.02/2–1361.
116	Telegram 651 from San Salvador, April 13, 1961. Need for direct financial support and moral encouragement for new regime. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 816.10/4–1361.
117	Telegram 391 to San Salvador, April 15, 1961. DOS authorization to commend Directorate's determination to improve standard of living, promote social reform, and develop economy. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 816.10/4–1361.
118	Memorandum of conversation June 9, 1961, between Ambassador Lima and Ball. Salvadoran political situation and need for U.S. financial assistance. Limited Official Use. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 716.00/6–961.
119	Telegram 502 from San Salvador, April 29, 1962. Report on elections. Official Use Only. 1 p. DOS, CF, 716.00/4–2962.
120	Memorandum from Moscoso to President Kennedy. Alliance for Progress in El Salvador. Official Use Only. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Brubeck Series, Salvador, 1961–64.
121	Airgram CA–6720 from San Salvador, December 20, 1962. Plan of Action for El Salvador to July 1, 1963. Secret. 5 pp. DOS, CF, 611.16/12–2062.

- | No. | Document Description |
|-----|---|
| 122 | Memorandum of conversation, March 20, 1963, between President Kennedy and President Rivera. Salvadoran political and economic situation and plans; support for Alliance informational activities; U.S. cotton policies; loan projects; Peace Corps; communism in El Salvador; travelers to Cuba. Confidential. 5 pp. DOS, CF, POL EL SAL. |
| 123 | Memorandum from Brubeck to McGeorge Bundy, July 22, 1963. El Salvador—long- and short-term prospects for political stability. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Brubeck Series, Salvador, 1961–64. |

Guatemala

- | | |
|-----|---|
| 124 | Telegram 459 from Guatemala City, April 20, 1961. Report on exchange of views of current situation at a meeting with leading members of the American Community. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 714.00/4–2061. |
| 125 | Despatch 494 from Guatemala City, March 31, 1962. U.S. interests and the Guatemalan political scene following recent demonstrations. Secret. 7 pp. DOS, CF, 714.00/3–3062. |
| 126 | Telegram 496 from Guatemala City, April 19, 1962. Danger of a Communist takeover in Guatemala discussed with President Ydigoras. Secret. 1 p. DOS, CF, 714.00/4–1862. |
| 127 | Memorandum from Edwin M. Martin to McGhee, April 26, 1962. Reasons to keep the President from getting involved in Guatemalan situation for the time being. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 714.00/4–2662. |
| 128 | Memorandum from Katherine W. Bracken to Edwin M. Martin, April 26, 1962. Current situation and possible contingencies in Guatemala. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 714.00/4–2662. |
| 129 | Airgram A-142 from Guatemala City, September 11, 1962. Transmits guidelines for policy and operations in Guatemala. Secret. 10 pp. DOS, CF, 611.14/9–1162. |

No.	Document Description
130	Memorandum of conversation, November 28, 1962, between President Kennedy and Ambassador Alejos. Unrest in Guatemala and concern over Castro threat. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Guatemala, September–December 1962.
131	Telegram 385 from Guatemala City, December 18, 1962. Review of attempted “Air Force” revolt and MAP deliveries. Secret. 6 pp. DOS, CF, 714.5622/12–1762.
132	Memorandum from Dungan to President Kennedy, January 22, 1963. Transmits attached background paper on Guatemala. Top Secret. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, President’s Office Files, Guatemala, Security, 1961–63.
133	Memorandum for the record, January 22, 1963. Meeting at the White House to discuss the situation in Guatemala and Arévalo’s candidacy. Top Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 714.00/1–2263.
134	DOS Guidelines for Policy and Operations: Guatemala, February 1953. Secret. 23 pp. DOS, S/P Files: Lot 67 D 396.
135	Memorandum of conversation, March 20, 1963, between President Kennedy and President Ydigoras. Relations with Cuba; elections; Belize; domestic reforms. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 15–1 US/KENNEDY.
136	Memorandum from Edwin M. Martin to U. Alexis Johnson, March 27, 1963. Background information on March 25 siege imposed by President Ydigoras. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL GUAT.
137	Memorandum from Brubeck to McGeorge Bundy, April 24, 1963. Transmits memorandum summarizing the first 3 weeks of the Peralta regime in Guatemala. Confidential. 4 pp. DOS, CF, POL 2 GUAT.
138	Memorandum from Read to McGeorge Bundy, July 31, 1963. Guatemalan request for U.S. mediation in British Honduras (Belize) dispute. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Guatemala, April–July 1963.

No.	Document Description
139	Telegram 123 to Guatemala City, September 24, 1963. Concern over failure of Peralta regime to begin to solve the main economic and political problems facing Guatemala. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL GUAT-US.
140	Telegram 254 to Guatemala City, November 27, 1963. Guatemalan plans for return to constitutional government. Confidential. 1 p. DOS, CF, POL 15 GUAT.

Honduras

141	Telegram 657 from Tegucigalpa, March 13, 1961. President Villeda Morales informed about threats to stability of his government. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 715.00/3-1361.
142	Telegram 705 from Tegucigalpa, April 3, 1961. Embassy assessment of President Villeda Morales' anti-Communist position. Secret. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 715.00/4-361.
143	Telegram 768 from Tegucigalpa, April 21, 1961. President Villeda Morales proposal to break relations with Cuba on April 22. Unclassified. 1 p. DOS, CF, 715.00/4-2161.
144	Letter from Ambassador Burrows to Katherine W. Bracken, January 24, 1962. Thoughts that OCI's reporting requirements reveal a distorted view of the situation in Honduras. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 715.00/1-2462.
145	Telegram 64 from Tegucigalpa, August 13, 1962. Country Team response to criticism and assumption in circular telegram 230. Secret. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 715.5/8-1362.
146	Telegram 51 to Tegucigalpa, September 11, 1962. Instructions for meeting with President and Foreign Minister to convey U.S. concern over implications for foreign investment, public and private, in Honduras agricultural development as result new agrarian reform law. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 815.16/9-1062.

No.	Document Description
147	Telegram 68 to Tegucigalpa, September 20, 1962. Transmits considerations pertinent to U.S. policy on assistance to American private interests abroad and problems arising from provisions of Honduran agrarian reform law. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 815.16/9–1962.
148	Memorandum of conversation, October 4, 1962, between Foreign Minister Alvarado and Edwin M. Martin. Honduran agrarian reform; request for assistance. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 715.04/10–462.
149	Memorandum from Edwin M. Martin to Rusk, November 7, 1962. Visit of President Villeda Morales to the U.S. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 715.11/11–762.
150	Memorandum of conversation, November 30, 1962, between President Kennedy and President Villeda Morales and other U.S. and Honduran officials. Alliance for Progress. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Honduras, December 1962–September 1963.
151	Memorandum of conversation, November 30, 1962, between President Kennedy and President Villeda Morales and other U.S. and Honduran officials. Honduran agrarian reform and United Fruit Company. Confidential. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Honduras, December 1962–September 1963.
152	Memorandum of conversation, November 30, 1962, between President Kennedy and President Villeda Morales and other U.S. and Honduran officials. The Swan Islands. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Honduras, December 1962–September 1963.
153	Memorandum of conversation, December 4, 1962, among Ambassador Burrows, Jasper Baker (United Fruit Company), Edward M. Rowell, and John W. Fisher. Honduran agrarian reform and United Fruit Company. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 715.04/12–462.

No.	Document Description
154	Memorandum of conversation, September 30, 1963, between Cottrell, and Ambassador Dávila and Finance Minister Bueso. Possible coup in Honduras. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, POL 26 HOND.
155	Telegram 84 to Tegucigalpa, 134 to Guatemala City, 69 to Managua, 143 to Panama, 111 to San José, and 81 to San Salvador, September 30, 1963. Rumors about impending coup in Honduras. Secret. 3 pp. DOS, CF, POL 26 HOND.
156	Memorandum from Read to McGeorge Bundy, October 1, 1963. U.S.-Honduran dispute over the Swan Islands. Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, William H. Brubeck Series, Honduras, 1961-1964.
157	Telegram 74 to Managua and 86 to San Salvador, October 2, 1963. Joint declaration by four American Republics presidents re impending coup. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 26 HOND.
158	Memorandum of conversation between Foreign Minister Perdomo, Finance Minister Bueso, and Ambassador Dávila, and Cottrell and other U.S. officials. Request for U.S. assistance in holding back ongoing coup. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, POL 26 HOND.
159	Telegram 94 to Tegucigalpa, October 4, 1963. Instructions re contact with members of former Villeda government and question of recognition. Confidential. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Honduras, 10/1-5/63.
160	Telegram 101 to Tegucigalpa, 96 to San Salvador, 80 to Managua, 123 to San José, October 4, 1963. Eventual recognition of Honduran Government and restoration of normal relations. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, POL 15 HOND.
161	Telegram 135 to San José, October 8, 1963. Personal message from President Kennedy to Villeda Morales. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 15 HOND.
162	Telegram 126 to San Salvador, 106 to Managua, 159 to San José, October 17, 1963. Return to civilian constitutional government in Honduras. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 15 HOND.

No.	Document Description
163	Telegram 159 to Tegucigalpa, October 26, 1963. Contacts with Lopez. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 15 HOND.
164	Telegram 258 from Tegucigalpa, October 27, 1963. Conclusions from October 25 conversation with Lopez. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 15 HOND.
165	Telegram 268 from Tegucigalpa, October 30, 1963. Analysis of position of military regime; policy considerations confront U.S.; Embassy course of action recommendations. Confidential. 7 pp. DOS, CF, POL 15 HOND.
166	Telegram 171 to Tegucigalpa, October 31, 1963. Approval of recommendations in telegram 268 from Tegucigalpa with specific comments. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 15 HOND.
167	Memorandum for Bromley Smith, November 1, 1963. Meeting among President Kennedy and other government officials on the current situation in Honduras and the Dominican Republic. Confidential. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Dominican Republic, 10/18–11/23/63.
168	Telegram 194 to Tegucigalpa, November 18, 1963. Return to civilian constitutional government. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, POL 15 HOND.

Jamaica

169	Memorandum from Rusk to President Kennedy, April 3, 1961. Upcoming visit of Premier Manley of Jamaica. Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Jamaica, 1961–62.
170	Memorandum of conversation, April 19, 1961, between President Kennedy and Premier Manley. West Indian Federation; U.S. assistance; bauxite, immigration, and aviation; sugar quotas. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Jamaica, 1961–62.
171	Memorandum from Rusk to President Kennedy, May 28, 1962. Visit of Premier Bustamante of Jamaica. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Jamaica, 1961–62.

No.	Document Description
172	Jamaican Scope Paper, undated. Independence; OAS membership; defense treaty; U.S. aid; sugar; bauxite; immigration. Secret. 6 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Jamaica, 1961-62.
173	Memorandum of conversation between President Kennedy and Premier Bustamante, and other U.S. and Jamaican officials, June 27, 1962. Economic situation in Jamaica; future of the Caribbean; West Indies; independence; emigration; migratory workers; sugar; tobacco production; AID project. Secret. 6 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Jamaica, 1961-62.
174	Memorandum from Moscoso to McGeorge Bundy, July 12, 1962. Aid program in Jamaica. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Jamaica, 1961-62.
175	Memorandum from Rusk to President Kennedy, July 19, 1962. Establishment of an Embassy at Kingston, Jamaica. No classification marking. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Jamaica, 1961-62.
176	Strategy Statement for Jamaica, February 15, 1963. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Jamaica, 1962-63.
177	Plan of Action for Jamaica beginning June 1, 1963. Secret. 11 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Jamaica, 1962-63.
178	Memorandum of conversation, June 14, 1963, between Prime Minister Bustamante and President Kennedy and other U.S. and Jamaican officials. Jamaican quota; Jamaican development plan; Cuban refugees. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Jamaica, 1962-63.

Mexico

- 179 Letter from Edward G. Cale to Thomas C. Mann, February 14, 1961. Transmits paper entitled "The Tactical Handling of Relations With Mexico." Secret. 7 pp. DOS, CF, 611.12/2-1461.

No.	Document Description
180	Memorandum from Coerr to Ball, April 11, 1961. Mexican oil import problem. Secret. 3 pp. WNRC, RG 59, TFLA Subject and Chron Files: Lot 61 D 298, Box 9.
181	Memorandum from Melville E. Osborne to Coerr, May 6, 1961. Mexico and the Castro problem. Confidential. 4 pp. WNRC, RG 59, TFLA Subject and Chron Files: Lot 61 D 298, Box 9.
182	Memorandum from Edwin E. Vallon to Jamison, June 6, 1961. Mexican request for 10 minesweepers. Confidential. 1 p. DOS, CF, 712.5621/6–661.
183	Memorandum from Vallon to Braddock, July 26, 1961. Mexican request for purchase of naval vessels (20 minesweepers). Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 712.5621/7–2661.
184	Memorandum from Robert F. Woodward to U. Alexis Johnson, July 31, 1961. Politico-economic discussions with Mexico. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 611.12/7–3161.
185	Memorandum of conversation, October 19, 1961, between Foreign Minister Tello and Under Secretary Bowles. Berlin question; Troika (UN). Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 611.12/10–1961.
186	Telegram 1744 from Mexico City, December 17, 1961. Report on discussion with President Lopez Mateos. Secret. 6 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Mexico, January 1961–May 1962.
187	Memorandum of conversation, February 16, 1962, between Rusk and Ambassador Carrillo. Geneva Disarmament Conference and salinity of Colorado River water. Confidential. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 397.5611–GE/2–1662.
188	Memorandum from McGhee to Woodward, March 7, 1962. Transmits memorandum entitled “The Salt Water Problem of the Mexicali and San Luis Valleys.” No classification marking. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 611.12322/3–762.

No.	Document Description
189	DOS Policy Directive PD/ARA-3.1, March 15, 1962. Mexico's protest on salinity of Colorado River water. Official Use Only. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Department and Agencies Series, DOS Policy Directives.
190	Despatch 1347 from Mexico City, April 27, 1962, transmitting April 26 memorandum of conversation between Foreign Minister Tello and Ambassador Mann. Mexican proposals re Chamizal and Ojinaga dispute. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 611.1232/4-2762.
191	Memorandum from Ambassador Mann to Edwin M. Martin, May 19, 1962. Salinity of Colorado River water. Confidential. 6 pp. DOS, CF, 611.12323/5-1962.
192	Memorandum from Roger Hilsman to Edwin M. Martin, June 13, 1962. Mexico and the Alliance for Progress. Confidential. 6 pp. DOS, CF, 712.00/6-1362.
193	Memorandum of conversation, June 29, 1962, between President Kennedy, President Lopez Mateos, and Minister Tello. Flow of private capital. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, Presidential Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.
194	Memorandum of conversation, June 29, 1962, between President Kennedy, President Lopez Mateos, and Foreign Minister Tello. Salinity problem. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, Presidential Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.
195	Memorandum of conversation, June 29, 1962, between President Kennedy, President Lopez Mateos and Foreign Minister Tello. Communism in Latin America. Secret. 3 pp. DOS, Presidential Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.
196	Memorandum of conversation, June 30, 1962, between President Kennedy, President Lopez Mateos, and Foreign Minister Tello. Salinity problem on the lower Colorado River and other problems. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 611.12/6-3062.

No.	Document Description
197	Memorandum from Brubeck to McGeorge Bundy, July 10, 1962. Status of salinity problem on lower Colorado River and Chamizal dispute. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Mexico, General, June to September, 1962.
198	Memorandum from Brubeck to McGeorge Bundy, December 14, 1962. Sale of minesweepers to Mexico. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 712.5621/12–1462.
199	Memorandum from Brubeck to McGeorge Bundy, January 11, 1963. Status report on negotiations for settlement of Chamizal dispute. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 611.1231/1–1163.
200	Memorandum of conversation, February 15, 1963, between Ambassador Carrillo Flores and Robert M. Sayre. Current bilateral problems between the United States and Mexico. Confidential. 4 pp. DOS, CF, POL 33–1 MEX–US.
201	Memorandum from Brubeck to Dungan, February 27, 1963. Status report on Chamizal negotiations. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, POL 32–1 MEX–US.
202	Memorandum of conversation, February 28, 1963, between President Kennedy and Ambassador Carrillo Flores. Salinity problem on lower Colorado River and transit of Latin Americans through Mexico. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Mexico, General, March–June 1963.
203	Telegram 2494 to Mexico City, March 6, 1963. President's response to news conference question on Chamizal. Unclassified. 1 p. DOS, CF, POL 32–1 MEX–US.
204	Memorandum from Brubeck to McGeorge Bundy, March 29, 1963. Solution of the salinity problem on the lower Colorado River; recommendations of the DOS. Confidential. 6 pp. DOS, CF, POL 32–1 MEX–US.
205	Memorandum of conversation, April 18, 1963, between Ambassador Carrillo Flores and Sayre. Salinity problem on lower Colorado River. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 33–1 MEX–US.

No.	Document Description
206	Memorandum from Edwin Martin to Acting Secretary Ball, May 22, 1963. Settlement of the Chamizal dispute. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, POL 32-1 MEX-US.
207	Memorandum of conversation, May 23, 1963, between Ball and Ambassador Carrillo Flores. Salinity problem on lower Colorado River. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 33-1 MEX-US.
208	Memorandum from George Ball to President Kennedy, May 24, 1963. Settlement of the Chamizal dispute. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, POL 32-1 MEX-US.
209	Memorandum from Edwin Martin to Chayes, June 20, 1963. Salinity problem on lower Colorado River. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 32-1 MEX-US.
210	Telegram 504 from Mexico City, August 21, 1963. Salinity problem on lower Colorado River. Confidential. 4 pp. DOS, CF, POL 33-1 MEX-US.
211	Telegram 508 to Mexico City, September 5, 1963. Transmits September 5 memorandum of conversation between Rusk and Ambassador Carrillo Flores re Chamizal dispute; salinity problem; Cuba; President Lopez Mateos' trip to Europe. Confidential. 4 pp. DOS, CF, POL 33-1 MEX-US.
212	Memorandum of conversation, October 11, 1963, among Rusk, Udall, and other U.S. officials. Colorado River salinity problem. Limited Official Use. 4 pp. DOS, CF, POL 33-1 MEX-US.

Venezuela

- | | |
|-----|---|
| 213 | Memorandum of conversation, March 31, 1961, between Foreign Minister Falcon Briceño and Thomas C. Mann, and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials. Venezuela's urgent need for financial assistance. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 731.5-MSP/3-3161. |
|-----|---|

No.	Document Description
214	Memorandum of conversation, May 5, 1961, between Perez Guerrero and Bowles and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials. Request by the Special Financial Mission from Venezuela for U.S. assistance with its economic development program. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 331.
215	Memorandum of conversation, June 22, 1961, between President of the Chamber of Deputies Caldera, Ambassador Mayobre and Rusk and Ingersoll. Political situation in Venezuela. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 731.00/6–2261.
216	Memorandum from Battle to Swank, October 16, 1961. Transmits memoranda of conversation, between Rusk and Foreign Minister Salcon-Briceño. Perez Jimenez extradition case; Cuban Problem. Confidential. 4 pp. DOS, Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 331.
217	National Intelligence Estimate No. 89–61, November 21, 1961. "The Situation in Venezuela." Secret. 3 pp. CIA Files: Job 79–R01012A, ODDI Registry.
218	Memorandum of conversation, December 16, 1961, between President Kennedy and President Betancourt and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials. Community development–housing/slum clearance project. Limited Official Use. 3 pp. DOS, Presidential Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.
219	Memorandum of conversation, December 16, 1961, between President Kennedy and President Betancourt and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials. Oil imports problem. Limited Official Use. 2 pp. DOS, Presidential Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.
220	Memorandum of conversation, December 16, 1961, between President Kennedy and President Betancourt and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials. Military assistance. Secret. 3 pp. DOS, Presidential Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.

No.	Document Description
221	Memorandum of conversation, December 16, 1961, between President Kennedy and President Betancourt and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials. Refinancing Venezuelan external debt. Limited Official Use. 2 pp. DOS, Presidential Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.
222	Memorandum from Hilsman to Edwin M. Martin, May 29, 1963. Venezuela and the Alliance for Progress. Confidential. 8 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, William H. Brubeck Series, Venezuela, 1961–1962.
223	Memorandum of conversation, August 30, 1962, between President Kennedy and Minister of Defense Briceño and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials. Venezuelan defense requirements. Confidential. 3 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD/ISA Files: FRC 65 A 3501, Venezuela, 1962, 000.1–381.
224	Memorandum of conversation, August 30, 1962, between President Kennedy and Minister of Defense Briceño and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials. Smuggling of arms into Venezuela. Confidential. 2 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD/ISA Files: FRC 65 A 3501, Venezuela, 1962, 000.1–381.
225	Memorandum from Clint E. Smith to the Latin American Policy Committee, September 21, 1962. Plan of action for Venezuela to March 2, 1964. Secret. 8 pp. DOS, CF, 611.31/9–2162.
226	Memorandum of conversation, February 19, 1963, between President Kennedy and President Betancourt and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials. Petroleum issues. Confidential. 5 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Venezuela, March–May 1963.
227	Memorandum of conversation, February 19, 1963, between President Kennedy and President Betancourt and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials. Balance of payments. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Venezuela, March–May 1963.

- | No. | Document Description |
|------------|---|
| 228 | Memorandum of conversation, February 20, 1963, between President Kennedy and President Betancourt and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials. Flight of capital from Venezuela. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Venezuela, March–May 1963. |
| 229 | Circular airgram CA–10071 from Moscow, March 18, 1963. Cuban propaganda and subversive activities in Venezuela. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Venezuela, March–May 1963. |
| 230 | Memorandum from Gordon Chase to McGeorge Bundy, April 30, 1963. Highlights of General Lansdale’s report on Communist insurgency in Venezuela. Secret. 4 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Venezuela, March–May 1963. |
| 231 | Telegram 446 to Caracas, November 21, 1963. President Betancourt’s briefing of LA chiefs on Cuban arms cache. Top Secret. 6 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Venezuela, October–November 1963. |

Cuba

November–December 1960

- | | |
|-----|---|
| 232 | Briefing papers used to brief President-elect Kennedy, November 18. Covert action program to replace Castro government. Secret. 6 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 64–00352R, Box 4, US Govt–President, Memoranda, Letters, Reports re CIA Relations with President and Cabinet. |
| 233 | Memorandum from Joseph W. Scott to Livingston Merchant, December 6. Transmits memorandum recommending a program of covert action to remove the Castro regime. Top Secret. 9 pp. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, Cuba Program, Nov. 1960–Jan. 20, 1961. |
| 234 | Notes of a Special Group meeting, December 29. Overall plan for covert actions in Cuba. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 82–00679R, Box 3, Special Group Meetings—Cuba. |

No.	Document Description
-----	----------------------

January 1961

- | | |
|-----|---|
| 235 | Paper prepared in the CIA, January 1961. Mission and concept of operation for action against Cuba. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 82-00679R, Box 3, Papers Furnished the Green Committee. |
| 236 | Briefing paper for Secretary of State-designate Rusk, January 1961. Presidentially authorized program to replace current Cuban Government with one suited to democratic ideals of Cuban people and compatible with long-range U.S. interests. Secret. 28 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 78-01450R, Box 5, Area Activity—Cuba Task Force. |
| 237 | Memorandum from C. Tracy Barnes to McCone, January 2. Material for January 3 policy meeting on Cuba. Secret. 9 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 67-01083R, Box 1, C.T. Barnes—Chrono, Jan–Jul 1961. |
| 238 | Memorandum from Barnes to the Special Assistant to the Under Secretary for Political Affairs, January 17. Joint Planning Committee on Cuba. Secret. 3 pp. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, Cuba Program, Nov 1960–Jan 29, 1961. |
| 239 | Memorandum from Ambassador Willauer to Merchant, January 18. December 6 plan to overthrow the Castro regime. Secret. 3 pp. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, Cuba Program, Nov 1960–Jan 20, 1961. |
| 240 | Memorandum from Ambassador Willauer to Rusk, January 27. Recommendations from meeting on the Task Force on Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, Cuba Program, Jan 21, 1961. |
| 241 | Memorandum for the record, January 30. Briefing on strike force in Cuba, tactical plan for its use, and intelligence on the target. Secret. 1 p. CIA Files: Job 85-00664R, Box 3, Vol 10, Chpts 5 & 6. |

No.	Document Description
------------	-----------------------------

February 1961

- | | |
|-----|--|
| 242 | Memorandum from Chester L. Cooper to the US. Intelligence Board, February 11. Transmits a memorandum from Abbot Smith to Allan Dulles on probable international reactions to certain U.S. courses of action against the Castro regime. Top Secret. 12 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, General Maxwell Taylor Committee on Cuba, 28 Jan–21 May 1961. |
| 243 | Memorandum from Thomas C. Mann to Rusk, February 16. Proposed transfer of Cuban trainees from Panama Canal Zone to the United States. Secret. 1 p. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, Cuba Program, Jan 21, 1961—. |

March 1961

- | | |
|-----|---|
| 244 | Memorandum from Barnes to the Deputy Director (Plans), March 1. Courses to take in immediate future in the Cuba project. Secret. 3 pp. CIA, DDO, DDP Files: Job 67–01083R, Box 1, C.T. Barnes—Chrono, Jan–Jul 1961. |
| 245 | Notes of a Special Group meeting, March 2. Guatemala involvement in Cuba project. Secret. 1 p. CIA, DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 82–00679R, Box 3, Special Group Mtgs—Cuba. |
| 246 | Notes of a special Group meeting, March 8. Operational developments during the past week on the Cuba project. Secret. 1 p. CIA, DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 82–00679R, Box 3, Special Group Mtgs—Cuba. |
| 247 | Memorandum from Barnes to Chief, WH–4, March 10. Transmits a checklist prepared by DCI on the Cuba project. Secret. 5 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 67–01083R, Box 1, C.T. Barnes—Chrono, Jan–Jul 1961. |
| 248 | Memorandum prepared by Barnes, March 16. Reasons to pursue the “Z” plan versus the original “E” plan. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 67–01083R, Box 1, C.T. Barnes—Chrono, Jan–Jul 1961. |

No.	Document Description
249	Memorandum from Barnes to Chief, WH-4, March 21. Checklist of points raised by DCI on Cuba project. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 67-01083R, Box 1, C.T. Barnes—Chrono, Jan-Jul 1961.
250	Information report No. TDCS-3/469,582, March 27. Status report on opposition groups in Escambray region of Las Villas province. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, Cuba, Jan 1961-.

April 1961

251	Telegram 3811 to the CIA from Agency personnel in Nicaragua, April 16. Strategic targets on D-day and timing of missions. Top Secret. 1 p. CIA Files: Job 85-00664R, Box 4, Vol. I.
252	Telegram 4681 from CIA to Balgar , April 17. Instructions for ships participating in Bay of Pigs operation. Secret. 1 p. CIA, DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 82-00679R, Box 3, Gen Maxwell Taylor, Green Study Group, Vol II.
253	Telegram 4292 to CIA from Agency personnel in Nicaragua, April 18. Report of unsuccessful attacks; request for approval later attack and use of contract crews. Top Secret. 1 p. CIA Files: Job 85-00664R, Box 4, Vol I.
254	Telegram 7123 from CIA to Agency personnel in Nicaragua, April 18. Approval of use of cargo aircraft to deliver napalm bombs and beach resupply schedule. Top Secret. 1 p. CIA Files: Job 85-00664R, Box 4, Vol I.
255	Telegram 4455 from Agency personnel in Nicaragua to CIA, April 19. B-26 bombing schedule. Top Secret. 1 p. CIA Files: Job 85-00664R, Box 4, Vol I.
256	Telegram 7237 from CIA to Agency personnel in Nicaragua, April 19. Navy air support and cover granted for 1 hour. Top Secret. 1 p. CIA, DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 82-00679R, Box 3, Gen Maxwell Taylor, Green Study Group, Vol II.

- | No. | Document Description |
|-----|---|
| 257 | Telegram 7238 from CIA to Agency personnel in Nicaragua, April 19. Message to brigade re U.S. logistic support. Secret. 1 p. CIA/DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 82–00679R, Box 3, Gen Maxwell Taylor, Green Study Group, Vol II. |
| 258 | Notes by General Eisenhower of April 22 meeting with President Kennedy. Failure of Bay of Pigs operation. Secret. 8 pp. Eisenhower Library, Post-Presidential Papers, 1961–69, Augusta-Walter Reed Series, Cuba (2), Box 1. |
| 259 | Chronology of Bay of Pigs operation from January 1960 to April 19, 1961, dated April 23. Top Secret. 12 pp. CIA, DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 82–00679R, Box 3, Papers Furnished the Green Committee. |

May 1961

- | | |
|-----|--|
| 260 | Memorandum from Jacob D. Esterline to the Chief, WH/4/PM, May 2. Straightening out dates of strike force concept for the Taylor Committee. Secret. 2 pp. CIA Files: Job 85–00664R, Box 2, vol III, Part III. |
| 261 | CIA memorandum, May 3. Detailed statement of the circumstances surrounding the cancellation of the D-day air strike. Secret. 3 pp. CIA, DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 82–00679R, Box 3, Papers Furnished the Green Committee. |
| 262 | Memorandum from C. Tracy Barnes to the Deputy Director (Plans), May 8. Propaganda, paramilitary, political, intelligence and budget actions to be taken resulting from Cuban invasion. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 67–01083R, Box 1, C.T. Barnes—Chrono, Jan–Jul 1961. |
| 263 | Memorandum, May 24. Special Group consideration of the strike force concept. Secret. 12 pp. CIA, DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 82–99679R, Box 3, Gen Maxwell Taylor, Green Study Group, Vol II. |
| 264 | Memorandum for the record, May 26. Post D-day supply drops review. Secret. 2 pp. CIA Files: Job 85–00664R, Box 4, Vol I. |

No.	Document Description
-----	----------------------

June 1961

- | | |
|-----|--|
| 265 | Memorandum from Allen Dulles to General Taylor, June 1. Summary of November 18, 1960, briefing of President-elect Kennedy on planned covert actions in Cuba. No classification marking. CIA, DCI (Dulles) Files: Job 80-B01285A, General Maxwell Taylor committee on Cuba, 28 Jan-21 May 1961. |
| 266 | Intelligence Note from Hilsman to Rusk, June 26. "Implications of Delivery of Soviet MIG Aircraft to Cuba." Secret. 3 pp. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, Cuba, May 1961-. |

July 1961

- | | |
|-----|--|
| 267 | Memorandum from C. Tracy Barnes to the Chief, Covert Action Staff, July 3. Possible funding of Cuban Revolutionary Council. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 67-01083R, Box 1, C.T. Barnes—Chrono, Jan-Jul 1961. |
| 268 | Draft memorandum for the files, July 17. Salient points of Woodward's July 14 report to Scott on a July 12 meeting at the White House. Secret. 1 p. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, Cuba Program, Jan 21, 1961—. |
| 269 | Memorandum from Woodward to Bowles, July 20. Transmits memorandum for the Special Group on the program of covert action directed at the Castro regime. Secret. 12 pp. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, S.G. 2, July 20, 1961. |
| 270 | Memorandum from Woodward to Johnson, July 26. Transmits a memorandum for the Special Group on internal action operations against Cuba. Secret. 8 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 67-01083R, Box 1, C.T. Barnes—Chrono, Jan-Jul 1961. |

August 1961

- | | |
|-----|--|
| 271 | Memorandum from Coerr to Johnson, August 2. Transmits a memorandum for the Special Group on program of covert action directed at the Castro regime. Secret. 13 pp. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, S.G. 4, August 3, 1961. |
|-----|--|

No.	Document Description
-----	----------------------

September 1961

- | | |
|-----|---|
| 272 | Memorandum, September 6. Report on Castro's instructions to Dorticos re contact with American Embassy in Belgrade during Belgrade Conference. Secret. 1 p. DOS, INR/IL Historical files, Cuba, August 1961–. |
| 273 | Memorandum for the record, September 8. Meeting among Ball, Woodward, Bissell, Goodwin, et al., re policy with respect to the Cuban Revolutionary Council. Secret. 1 p. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 78–01450R, Box 5, Area Activity—Cuba. |

October 1961

- | | |
|------|---|
| 273A | Survey Report by CIA Inspector General Kirkpatrick, October 1961. Survey of the Cuban Operation with Annexes. 216 pp. Top Secret. CIA, DCI Files, History Staff Files, Job 85–00664R. |
| 274 | Memorandum from C. Tracy Barnes to Chief, WH–4, October 6. Confirmation of requests re Cuba. Secret. 1 p. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 78–01450R, Box 1, Area Activity–Western Hemisphere–Cuba. |
| 275 | Memorandum to Park F. Wollam, October 6. Transmits paper entitled “What Would Happen If Castro Died?” Secret. 8 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 73–00853R, Box 1, WH Division Liaison with Department of State. |
| 276 | Memorandum for the Special Group, October 12. Cuban program report. Secret. 12 pp. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, S.G. 15, October 20, 1961. |

November 1961

- | | |
|-----|---|
| 277 | Memorandum, November 4. Recommendations on subsequent actions in Cuban operation. Secret. 3 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 78–01450R, Box 5, Area Activity—Cuba. |
| 278 | Notes on conversation, November 9, between President Kennedy and Tad Sulz. Sulz' visit to Cuba and meeting with Castro; assassination of Castro. Top Secret. 1 p. NARA, RG 233, JFK Collection. |

No.	Document Description
278A	Memorandum from CIA Inspector General Kirkpatrick to CIA Director Dulles, November 24. Inspector General's survey of the Cuban operation. 2 pp. Top Secret. CIA, DCI Files, History Staff Files: Job 85-00664R.
December 1961
278B	Memorandum from CIA Inspector General Kirkpatrick to CIA Director McCone, December 1. Inspector General's survey of the Cuban operation. 1 p. Top Secret. CIA, DCI Files, History Staff Files: Job 85-00664R.
278C	Memorandum prepared by CIA Deputy Director Cabell, December 15. Inspector General's survey of the Cuban operation. 2 pp. Top Secret. CIA, DCI Files, History Staff Files: Job 85-00664R.
January 1962
278D	Analysis by CIA Deputy Director for Plans Bissell, January 18. Report on the Cuban operation. 188 pp. Top Secret. CIA, DCI Files, History Staff Files: Job 85-00664R.
278E	Letter from CIA Director McCone to President of the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board Killian, January 19. Forwards Kirkpatrick's survey of the Cuban operation and comments of other CIA officials. 1 p. Top Secret. CIA, DCI Files, History Staff Files: Job 85-00664R.
278F	Memorandum from CIA Assistant Deputy Director for Plans Barnes to Deputy Director for Plans Bissell, January 19. Survey of the Cuban operation. 5 pp. Secret; Eyes Only. CIA, DCI Files, History Staff Files: Job 85-00664R.
278G	Memorandum from CIA Inspector General Kirkpatrick to Assistant Deputy Director for Plans Barnes, January 22. Response to Barnes' January 19 memorandum commenting on Kirkpatrick's survey of the Cuban operation. 2 pp. Secret. CIA, DCI Files, History Staff Files: Job 85-00664R.

- | No. | Document Description |
|------------|---|
| 278H | Memorandum from the staff officers of the CIA Office of the Inspector General to CIA Inspector General Kirkpatrick, January 26. Kirkpatrick's Cuban survey and the Deputy Directory of Plans analysis of the Cuban operation. 2 pp. Secret. CIA, DCI Files, History Staff Files: Job 85–00664R. |
| 278I | Memorandum from CIA Deputy Director for Plans Bissell to CIA Director McCone, January 27. Barnes memorandum on the IG Survey of the Cuban operation. 1 p. Secret; Eyes Only. CIA, DCI Files, History Staff Files: Job 85–00664R. |

February 1962

- | | |
|------|--|
| 278J | Memorandum from Allen W. Dulles to CIA Director McCone, February 15. IG's survey of the Cuban operation. 3 pp. Top Secret. CIA, DCI Files, History Staff Files: Job 85–00664R. |
| 278K | Letter from CIA Director McCone to Allen W. Dulles, February 19. Survey of the Cuban operation. 1 p. Secret. CIA, DCI Files, History Staff Files: Job 85–00664R. |
| 279 | Program review by Brigadier General Lansdale, February 20. "The Cuba Project." Top Secret. 26 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Special Group (Augmented), Operation Mongoose, 2/62–4/62. |

March 1962

- | | |
|-----|--|
| 280 | Memorandum from General Lansdale to the Special Group (Augmented), March 13, 1962. Institutional planning for Operation Mongoose. Top Secret. 15 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 482, Mongoose. |
| 281 | Memorandum from Barnes to Dulles, March 13. Cuban operation, July–September 1960. Secret. 4 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 67–01083R, Box 1, C.T. Barnes—Chrono, Jan–June 1962. |

No.	Document Description
-----	----------------------

- | | |
|-----|--|
| 282 | McCone's notes for discussion with Helms and Harvey, March 16. Operation Mongoose. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80-B01285A, Box 2, Memo for the Record, 29 November 1961-5 April 1962. |
|-----|--|

April 1962

- | | |
|-----|--|
| 283 | Memorandum of discussion between Rusk and McCone, April 10. Rusk report on confidential discussion with Brazilian Foreign Minister Dantas concerning Cuba. Secret. 1 p. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80-B01285A, Box 2, Memo for the Record, 7 April-21 August 1962. |
|-----|--|

May 1962

- | | |
|-----|---|
| 284 | Memorandum for the record, May 17. Review of Operation Mongoose. Secret. 1 p. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 91-00741R, Box 1, Mongoose Papers. |
|-----|---|

June 1962

- | | |
|-----|--|
| 285 | Memorandum for the record, June 25. Special Group (Augmented) decision on new SNIE on Cuba. Secret. 1 p. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 91-00741R, Box 1, Mongoose Papers. |
|-----|--|

July 1962

- | | |
|-----|--|
| 286 | Notes of Special Group (Augmented) meeting, July 12. Operation Mongoose. Secret. 1 p. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 91-00741R, Box 1, Mongoose Papers. |
| 287 | Memorandum for the record, July 20. Review of Operation Mongoose. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80-B01285A, Box 6, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 December 1961-30 June 1962. |

August 1962

- | | |
|-----|--|
| 288 | National Intelligence Estimate No. 85-2-62, August 1. "The Situation and Prospects in Cuba." Secret. 13 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD(C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896, McNamara Briefing Notebook, 12 Jan 63. |
|-----|--|

- | No. | Document Description |
|-----|--|
| 289 | Memorandum from William Harvey to McCone, August 8, with attached Operation Plan. Operation Mongoose future course of action. Top Secret. 19 pp. CIA Files: Job 84–00499R, Box 1, HS/HC 841, 7 Aug 62–15 Aug 62. |
| 290 | Memorandum from Harvey to Carter, August 14. Operation Mongoose—assassination of Fidel Castro. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 91–00741R, Box 1, Mongoose Papers. |

September 1962

- | | |
|-----|--|
| 291 | Telegram 72756 from McCone, September 4. Soviet military assistance to Cuba confirmed. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, Box 4, DCI-DDCI Cables—Cuba, 4 Sept–21 Sept 1962. |
| 292 | Telegram 73741 from McCone, September 6. Confirmation of nine SAM sites in Cuba; Latin American Ambassadors asked to convene meeting of OAS Foreign Ministers to discuss Cuban developments. Top Secret. 1 p. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, Box 4, DCI-DDCI Cables—Cuba, 4 Sept–21 Sept 1962. |
| 293 | Telegram 18314 to McCone, September 7. Support for frequent reconnaissance missions; develop joint policies for action in Cuba with selected Caribbean and South American states. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA Files: Job 80–B1676R, Box 17, Mongoose, Cuban Reconnaissance/Overflights. |
| 294 | Telegram 74587 from McCone, September 8. Twelve SAMs confirmed and MIG–21 cited. Top Secret. 1 p. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, Box 4, DCI-DDCI Cables—Cuba, 4 Sept–21 Sept 1962. |
| 295 | Telegram 19372 to McCone, September 10. Appearance of secrecy measures being deployed in Cuba to cover Soviet offensive capability. Top Secret. 1 p. CIA: Job 80–B1676R, Box 17, Mongoose, Cuban Reconnaissance/Overflights. |

No.	Document Description
296	Carter diary entry, September 10. Intelligence objectives behind overflights of Cuba. No classification marking. 1 p. CIA Files: Job 80-B1676R, Box 17, Walter Elder Recop.
297	Telegram 75341 from McCone, September 11. Exile group attacks two outward bound cargo ships from Cuba; BNE statement re Soviet motivations for MRBM installation. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80-B01285A, Box 4, DCI-DDCI Cables—Cuba, 4 Sept–21 Sept 1962.
298	Telegram 21493 to McCone, September 13. Release of exiled Cuban prisoners; humanitarian support for Cuba; installation of defensive equipment. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA Files: Job 80-B1676R, Box 17, Mongoose, Cuban Reconnaissance/Overflights.
299	Carter diary entry, September 14. Special Group (Augmented) meeting on low-level reconnaissance over Cuba. No classification marking. 1 p. CIA Files: Job 91-00741R, Box 1, Mongoose Papers.
300	Telegram 23209 to McCone, September 16. Soviet Cuban buildup including possible MRBMs. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80-B01285A, Box 4, DCI-DDCI Cables—Cuba, 4 Sept–21 Sept 1962.
301	Telegram 77871 from McCone, September 18. Review of SNIE 85-3 regarding Soviet buildup in Cuba. Secret. 2 pp. CIA Files: Job 80B1676R, Box 17, Mongoose, Cuban Reconnaissance/Overflights.
302	Telegram 78480 from McCone, September 19. Transmits conclusions of SNIE approved by USIB on September 19. Top Secret. 4 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80-B01285A, Box 4, DCI-DDCI Cables—Cuba, 4 Sept–21 Sept 1962.
303	Telegram 25591 to McCone, September 20. Comments on telegram 78480 transmitting SNIE conclusions. Top Secret. 1 p. CIA Files: Job 80-B1676R, Box 17, Mongoose, Cuban Reconnaissance/Overflights.

No.	Document Description
304	Memorandum for the file, September 24. Discussion with the Attorney General on proposed Donovan negotiations for release of Cuban exile prisoners held by Castro. Secret. 1 p. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, Box 2, Memo for the Record, 24 Sept–31 Dec 1962.
305	Memorandum of meeting with the President, September 25. Proposed Donovan negotiations for release of Cuban exile prisoners held by Castro. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, Box 2, Memo for the Record, 24 Sept–31 Dec 1962.
306	Memorandum of conversation between McCone and Eisenhower, September 26. Proposed Donovan project. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, Box 2, Memo for the Record, 24 Sept–31 Dec 1962.
307	Notes of the Special Group (Augmented) meeting, September 27. Mongoose balloon plan; Rostow paper on Cuba. Secret. 1 p. CIA Files: Job 91–00741R, Box 1, Mongoose Papers.
308	Memorandum of telephone conversation between Donovan and McCone, September 29. Plans for Donovan mission to Cuba to gain release of Cuban exile prisoners. Secret. 3 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, Box 2, Memo for the Record, 24 Sept–31 Dec 1962.

October 1962

309	Memorandum for the record, October 2. Results of Gilpatric meeting at the White House on Cuban trade. Secret. 2 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD/ISA Files: FRC 65 A 3501, Cuba, 1962, 000.1—092.
310	Memorandum of conversation among Foreign Ministers of the American Republics, October 2. Communist bases in Cuba. Confidential. 7 pp. DOS, Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 330.
311	Memorandum of conversation among Foreign Ministers of the American Republics, October 2. Communism in the Western Hemisphere. Confidential. 8 pp. DOS, Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 330.

No.	Document Description
312	Memorandum of conversation among Foreign Ministers of the American Republics, October 3. Communist infiltration in Cuba. Confidential. 6 pp. DOS, Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 330.
313	Memorandum of conversation among Foreign Ministers of the American Republics, October 3. Communist infiltration in Cuba. Confidential. 8 pp. DOS, Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 330.
314	Memorandum from Sloan to Gilpatric, October 8. Release of Cuban prisoners. Top Secret. 1 p. WNRC, RG 330, OASD/ISA files: FRC 65 A 3591, Cuba 1962, 00.1 (383.6 Cuba).
315	Summary memorandum of discussions with Congressional leaders, October 8. Donovan project. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80—B01285A, Memos for the Record, 24 Sept–31 Dec 1962.
316	Memorandum for the record, October 9. Summaries of meetings with the President and Vice President on the Donovan project. Secret. 1 p. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80—B01285A, Meetings with the President, 1 July 1962–31 December 1962.
317	Memorandum from McGeorge Bundy to the Deputy Secretary of Defense and Acting DCI Carter, October 13. Bundy's view of situation involving Donovan project and further responsibilities therefor. Top Secret. 1 p. CIA Files: Job 80—B1676R, Walter Elder, Recop.
318	Notes from transcripts of JCS meeting, October 15. Contingency planning for Cuba. Secret. 3 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History.
319	Memorandum for the record by General Carter, October 17. Summary of October 16 NSC meeting with the President re latest U-2 photography indicating deployment of medium-range ballistic missiles in Cuba. Top Secret. 3 pp. CIA Files: Job 80—B1676R, Walter Elder, Recop.

No.	Document Description
320	Notes from transcripts of JCS meeting, October 16. Medium-range ballistic missiles in Cuba. Secret. 5 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History.
321	Memorandum from Carter to the Special Group (Augmented), October 16. Operation Mongoose/Sabotage Proposals. Secret. 2 pp. CIA Files: Job 80–B1676R, Walter Elder, Recop.
322	Memorandum for the record, October 16. Meeting at the White House on Soviet MRBMs in Cuba. Top Secret. 4 pp. NDU, Taylor Papers, Memos for the Record.
323	Memorandum of conversation between Carter and Hilsman, October 16. Failure of U.S. intelligence (with the exception of McCone) to predict development of Soviet missiles in Cuba. No classification marking. 2 pp. CIA Files: Job 80–B1676R, Walter Elder, Recop.
324	Paper prepared by Sorensen, October 16. Questions U.S. should be prepared to answer in case Soviet missiles in Cuba cause the United States to initiate an armed attack that might lead to nuclear war. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, Sorensen Papers, Classified Subject Files, 1961–64, Cuba, General, 1962.
325	Memorandum from Dillon to the President, undated. Outlines Dillon's views on need to eliminate offensive weapons from Cuba and course of action to do so. Top Secret. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, vol. III.
326	Notes from transcripts of JCS meeting, October 17. Five courses of action proposed at White House meeting evening of October 16. Secret. 3 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History.
327	Gilpatric's handwritten notes of meeting, October 17. Preferred course of action. Top Secret. 1 p. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896, RLG's Notes re Cuba.

No.	Document Description
328	Gilpatric's handwritten notes of meeting, October 17. U.S. position on missiles in Cuba. Top Secret. 1 p. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896, RLG's Notes re Cuba.
329	Memorandum for the file, October 17. Conversation between McCone and former President Eisenhower on Cuban developments. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80-B01285A, Memos for the Record, 24 Sept-31 Dec 1962.
330	First State Strategic Paper, undated. Possible courses of action in Cuba. Top Secret. 14 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896, Historical, Cuba, October 1962.
331	Notes from transcripts of JCS meeting, October 18. Courses of action in Cuba. Secret. 4 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History.
332	Standing Committee Paper, undated. Plan I—Limited one-time Strike against MRBM sites. Top Secret. 10 pp. Kennedy Library, Sorensen Papers, Classified Subject Files, 1961-64, Cuba—Subjects, General and Historical Information 8/31/62-10/19/62.
333	Standing Committee Paper, undated. Option II—Blockade. Top Secret. 6 pp. Kennedy Library, Sorensen Papers, Classified Subjects Files 1961-64, Cuba—Subjects, Standing Committee 9/62-10/62.
334	Standing Committee Paper, October 18. Option III—Invasion. Top Secret. 9 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896, Nitze Files: Black Book, Cuba, Vol. I.
335	Memorandum by McCone, October 18. Problems the USIB should address at next meeting on possible courses of action in Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA, Job 84-00499R, Box 1, HS/HC 850B, Vol. II.

No.	Document Description
336	Joint Evaluation prepared by the Guided Missile and Astronautics Intelligence Committee, Joint Atomic Energy Intelligence Committee, and National Photographic Interpretation Center, October 18. Soviet missile threat in Cuba. Top Secret. 5 pp. CIA Files: Job 80–R01386R, O/D/NFAC, Box 1, Cuba (5 Sept–19 Oct 1962).
337	Notes from transcripts of JCS meetings, October 19. CJCS summarized previous evening's meeting at the White House on reaction to photographic pictures of Cuban missile sites in Cuba; JCS position for meeting with the President; debrief on morning meeting at the State Department. Secret. 4 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History.
338	Memorandum from McCone to USIB members, October 19. Transmits probable decision among principals to initiate a limited blockade of Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 July–31 December 1962.
339	Handwritten notes of meeting made by McCone, October 19. Possible courses of action in Cuba. No classification marking. 4 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 July–31 December 1962.
340	Memorandum prepared by McCone, October 19. Actions against the Soviet-Cuban military threat. Top Secret. 6 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 July–31 December 1962.
341	Paper prepared in the White House, October 19. The defense of Berlin if Cuba is blockaded. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, 10/15–23/62.

No.	Document Description
342	Joint Evaluation prepared by Guided Missile and Astronautics Intelligence Committee, Joint Atomic Energy Intelligence Committee, and National Photographic Interpretation Center, October 19. Soviet missile threat in Cuba. Top Secret. 6 pp. CIA Files: Job 80–R01386R, O/D/NFAC, Box 1, Cuba (5 Sept–19 Oct 1962).
343	Notes from transcripts of JCS meetings, October 20. Various courses of action in response to Soviet missiles in Cuba. Secret. 4 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History.
344	Supplement 1 to Joint Evaluation prepared by Guided Missile and Astronautics Intelligence Committee, Joint Atomic Energy Intelligence Committee, and National Photographic Interpretation Center, October 20. Soviet missile threat in Cuba. Top Secret. 8 pp. CIA Files: Job 80–R01386R, O/D/NFAC, Box 1, Cuba (20 Oct–22 Oct 1962).
345	Paper, October 20. I—Air Strike Scenario. Top Secret. 3 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896, Nitze Files: Black Book, Cuba, Vol. I.
346	Memorandum of conversation among the President, Attorney General, Secretary of Defense, General Taylor, McCone, October 21. Possible military courses of action in Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 July 1962–31 December 1962.
347	Notes from transcripts of JCS meetings, October 21. Debrief of meetings with the President on possible air strikes against Cuba, President's speech, and blockade of Cuba. Secret. 3 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History.
348	Telegram 6830 from the Joint Chiefs of Staff to Certain Military Commands, October 21. Possible reactions to initiation of blockade operations against Cuba and instructions to review applicable general war plans. Top Secret. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, Cables, 10/16/62–10/21/62.

No.	Document Description
349	Circular telegram 700 to all Latin American posts, October 21. Instructions for Ambassadors following the President's nationwide TV statement on Soviet offensive nuclear capability in Cuba. Top Secret. 5 pp. DOS, CF, 737.00/10–2262.
350	Memorandum of discussion between the President and McCone, October 21. Conclusions of McCone's discussion with former President Eisenhower on military procedures to follow in Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 July 1962–31 December 1962.
351	Supplement 2 to Joint Evaluation prepared by Guided Missile and Astronautics Intelligence Committee, Joint Atomic Energy Intelligence Committee, and National Photographic Interpretation Center, October 21. Soviet missile threat in Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA Files: Job 80–R01386R, O/D/NFAC, Box 1, Cuba (20 Oct–22 Oct 1962).
352	Memorandum for the record, November 14. Report on Acheson's mission to Paris, October 22–24. Secret. 21 pp. CIA Files: Job 84–00499R, Box 1, HS/HC 850A, 29 May 72.
353	Excerpt from Ambassador Bruce's diary, October 21–25. Acheson's meetings in London. No classification marking. 10 pp. DOS, Bruce Diaries: Lot 64 D 327.
354	Memorandum for the file, October 22. Briefing of Vice President Johnson on October 21. Secret. 1 p. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, Memos for the Record, 24 Sept–31 Dec 1962.
355	Memorandum from Rostow to Rusk, October 22. Possible initiatives and courses of action around the world as the Cuban crisis develops. Top Secret. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, Sorensen Papers, Classified Subject Files 1961–64, Cuba—Subjects, General & Historical Information, 10/20/62–10/25/62.

No.	Document Description
356	Notes from transcripts of JCS meetings, October 22. Briefing by General Carroll (Director DIA) on the MRBM sites in Cuba and U.S. responses to a missile attack. Secret. 3 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History.
357	Memorandum for the record, October 22. Daily White House Staff Meeting on October 22 on Cuban crisis. Secret. 2 pp. National Defense University, Taylor Papers, Chairman's Staff Group, Oct.-Nov. 1962.
358	Telegram 6848 from the JCS to CINCLANT, October 22. Instructions to prepare for the blockade of Cuba. Top Secret. 6 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, Cables, 10/22/62.
359	Circular telegram 706 to selected ARA diplomatic posts, October 22. Transmits text of letter from President to respective chiefs of state about the U.S. response to the Cuban missile crisis. Top Secret. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 737.00/10-2262.
360	Telegram 1199 from Bonn, October 22. Briefing of Adenauer on Cuban crisis. Confidential. 1 p. DOS, CF, 611.3722/1-2261.
361	Memorandum of conversation between Canadian Prime Minister Diefenbaker and Merchant, October 22. Meeting to deliver President's October 22 letter on Cuba. Secret. 7 pp. DOS, CF, 737.00/11-262.
362	Telegram 221822Z to Supreme Allied Commander, Europe, October 22. Transmits letter from the President to General Norstad explaining U.S. actions in Cuban missile crisis and importance of NATO alliance. Secret. 1 p. DOS, CF, 611.3722/10-2262.
363	Memorandum from Acting Director of the Office of National Estimates Smith to McCone, October 22. Soviet reaction to certain U.S. moves. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA Files: Job 84-00499R, Box 1, HS/HC 850B, Vol. II.
364	Telegram from White House Situation Room to the Department of State, October 22. Transmits letter from President to Prime Minister Macmillan for Department's information and action. No classification marking. 2 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438, UK-Cuba.

- | No. | Document Description |
|-----|---|
| 365 | Telegram 222308Z from the White House to Rusk, October 22. Transmits text of Macmillan letter to Kennedy re Soviet build up in Cuba to the Department. Top Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 737.56361/10–2262. |
| 366 | Supplement 3 to Joint Evaluation prepared by Guided Missile and Astronautics Intelligence Committee, Joint Atomic Energy Intelligence Committee, and National Photographic Interpretation Center, October 22. Soviet missile threat in Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA Files: Job 80–R01386R, O/D/NFAC, Box 1, Cuba (20 Oct–22 Oct 1962). |

October 23, 1962

- | | |
|-----|--|
| 367 | Circular telegram 726, October 23. Instructions to meet with highest available official to persuade government to which accredited to take actions to prevent Soviet Bloc military equipment from reaching Cuba. Secret. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 737.00/10–2362. |
| 368 | Memorandum for the record, October 23. Daily White House staff meeting, Bundy presiding re handling of crisis actions. Secret. 2 pp. NDU, Taylor Papers, Chairman's Staff Group, Oct.–Nov. 1962. |
| 369 | Notes from transcripts of JSC meetings, October 23. Low-level reconnaissance; U.S. reaction to possible U–2 shootdown; blockade of Cuba. Secret. 3 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History. |
| 370 | Memorandum of meeting of the Executive Committee of the National Security Council, October 23. Intelligence report, blockage, possible military actions, firing on a U–2, air intercept capability, and low-level flights. Top Secret. 3 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01265A, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 July 1962–31 December 1962. |
| 371 | Memorandum for the file, October 23. Meetings with Senators Russell, Hickenlooper, and Chairman Vinson to notify them of administration policy and get their positions. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01265A, DCI Memos for the Record, 24 Sept–31 Dec 1962. |

- | No. | Document Description |
|-----|---|
| 372 | Memorandum from Acting Director of the Office of National Estimates Smith to McCone, October 23. Effect on Cuba of a Blockade covering all goods except food and medicines. Top Secret. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Cuba, Subjects, Intelligence Materials, 10/1/62–11/12/62. |
| 373 | List of issues raised at Rostow group meeting, October 23. Strategic guidelines, missile trade-off, offensive nature of missiles in Cuba, Soviet personnel in Cuba, inspection issue, initiative thinking, Cuban objectives, Tobin–Greenfeld paper, systematic review of possible contingencies. Top Secret. 4 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) Files: FRC 71 A 2896, Nitze Files: Black Book, Cuba, Vol. II. |
| 374 | Memorandum from Katzenbach to Attorney General Kennedy, October 23. Proclamation re Cuba. No classification marking. 1 p. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896, Misc. Papers Regarding Cuba, 20 Oct.–25 Oct. 1962. |
| 375 | NSC Executive Committee Debriefing, October 23. Blockade of Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. DOS, S/S–NSC Files: Lot 75 D 165, NSC Debriefings 1962. |

October 24, 1962

- | | |
|-----|---|
| 376 | Supplement 4 to Joint Evaluation prepared by Guided Missile and Astronautics Intelligence Committee, Joint Atomic Energy Intelligence Committee, and National Photographic Interpretation Center, October 24. Soviet missile threat in Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA Files: Job 80–R01386R, O/D/NFAC, Box 2, Cuba (23 Oct.–28 Oct. 1962). |
| 377 | Telegram 987 to Moscow, October 24. Transmits regulation of Secretary McNamara re submarine surfacing and identification procedures used by U.S. quarantine forces in vicinity of Cuba for transmittal to Soviet Government. Unclassified. 2 pp. OSD, Historical Office, Secretary of Defense, Cable Files, Cuba, Oct. 23–24, 1962. |

No.	Document Description
378	Telegram 1205 from Bonn, October 24. Briefing Chancellor on U.S. courses of action in Cuba and Chancellor's reaction. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 611.3722/10–2462.
379	Memorandum for the record, October 24. Daily White House staff meeting covering Navy preparations for intercepts, Nitze Berlin-NATO Subcommittee, Rostow subcommittee, duty officer assignments. Secret. 3 pp. NDU, Taylor Papers, Chairman's Staff Group, Oct.–Nov. 1961.
380	Notes from transcripts of JCS meeting, October 24. Debrief on ExComm meeting; ship movements; advantages of planes ready at airfields in Florida. Secret. 3 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History.
381	Memorandum from Rostow to McGeorge Bundy, October 24. Report 1 of Planning Subcommittee: Blockade and future planning. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Cuba, Planning Subcommittee, 10/62–11/62.
382	Telegram from General Norstad to McGeorge Bundy, October 24. Transmits letter to the President reporting on Norstad's trip to London. Top Secret. 4 pp. Eisenhower Library, Norstad Papers, Subject File, Kennedy, John F.
383	Telegram 1458 from USUN to Rusk, October 24. Message from U Thant to President Kennedy re U Thant message to Khrushchev expressing concern over Soviet ships challenging the U.S. quarantine. Confidential. 2 pp. OSD, Historical Office, Secretary of Defense, Cable Files, Cuba, Oct. 23–24, 1962.
384	Memorandum from Cleveland to Rusk and Ball, October 24. Discussion of Cuba in the UN Security Council. Secret. 3 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438, UN—Cuba.
385	Memorandum from McGeorge Bundy to the President, October 24. Briefing information for a call to the President from Macmillan; possible next steps on the political track. No classification marking. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. IV (A).

No.	Document Description
386	Memorandum of telephone conversation between McGeorge Bundy and Ball, October 24. Timing for interception of ships at sea. No classification marking. 2 pp. DOS, Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272, Telcons—Cuba.
387	Memorandum of telephone conversation between Cleveland and Ball, October 24. Stevenson's position on U.S. statement before the United Nations. No classification marking. 1 p. DOS, Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272, Telcons—Cuba.
388	Supplement 5 to Joint Evaluation prepared by Guided Missile and Astronautics Intelligence Committee, Joint Atomic Energy Intelligence Committee, and National Photographic Interpretation Center, October 24. Soviet missile threat in Cuba. Top Secret. 3 pp. CIA Files: Job 80–R01386R, O/D/NFAC, Box 2, Cuba (23 Oct.–28 Oct. 1962).
389	Memorandum of telephone conversation between McNamara and Ball, October 24. Khrushchev message to the President; interception of ships at sea. No classification marking. 3 pp. DOS, Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272, Telcons—Cuba.
390	Circular telegram 743 to all diplomatic and consular posts, October 24. Guidance for U.S. officials at home and abroad for public and private discussions of Soviet bases in Cuba. Confidential. 13 pp. DOS, CF, 611.3722/10–2462.
391	Memorandum of telephone conversation between the President and Ball, October 24. Response to Khrushchev message; possible interception of tanker at sea on the morning of October 25. No classification marking. 3 pp. DOS, Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272, Telcons—Cuba.
392	Memorandum of telephone conversation between McGeorge Bundy and Ball, October 24. President's concern over challenging ship at sea; possible message for U Thant to give to sent to Khrushchev. No classification marking. 2 pp. DOS, Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272, Telcons—Cuba.

- | No. | Document Description |
|-------------------------|--|
| 393 | Memorandum of telephone conversation between McGeorge Bundy and Ball, October 24. No action planned during night of October 24–25; message to Khrushchev through U Thant. No classification marking. 1 p. DOS, Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272, Telcons—Cuba. |
| October 25, 1962 | |
| 394 | Memorandum of telephone conversation between Stevenson and Ball, October 25. Report on Stevenson's conversation with U Thant on message to Khrushchev to hold off Soviet ships for discussion of situation. No classification marking. 2 pp. DOS, Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272, Telcons—Cuba. |
| 395 | Memorandum of telephone conversation between Ball and McGeorge Bundy, October 25. Response to Khrushchev message. No classification marking. 1 p. DOS, Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272, Telcons—Cuba. |
| 396 | CIA memorandum prepared for the Executive Committee of the NSC, October 25. The Crisis: USSR/Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memos Series, Excom, Vol. I, Mtgs 1–5. |
| 397 | Memorandum of telephone conversation between McNamara and Ball, October 25. Report on first intercept at sea; response to Khrushchev message. No classification marking. 2 pp. DOS, Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272, Telcons—Cuba. |
| 398 | Memorandum for the record, October 25. Daily White House staff meeting including discussion on Soviet Bloc shipping headed for Cuba. Secret. 2 pp. National Defense University, Taylor Papers, Chairman's Group, Oct–Nov 1962. |
| 399 | Notes from transcripts of JCS meetings, October 25. Soviet acceptance of quarantine; procedures for boarding ships; reconnaissance flights; air blockade. Secret. 4 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History. |

No.	Document Description
400	Memorandum of telephone conversation between McGeorge Bundy and Ball, October 25. Additional paragraph for response to Khrushchev letter from Stevenson. No classification marking. 1 p. DOS, Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272, Telcons—Cuba.
401	Memorandum from Klein and Legere to McGeorge Bundy, October 25. Meeting of the Nitze subcommittee on Berlin–NATO. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Country Series, Germany, Berlin.
402	Memorandum from Kitchen to Nitze, October 25, enclosing memorandum from Raymond Garthoff to Rostow. Concern over the course and outcome of the Cuban crisis. Top Secret. 4 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD/ISA Files: FRC 65 A 3501, Cuba 1962, 092 Jan—.
403	Intelligence Note from Hilsman to Rusk, October 25. Soviet strategy in UN discussions of Cuba. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. IV (A).
404	Memorandum from Rostow to McGeorge Bundy, October 25. Report No. 2 of Advance Planning Subcommittee. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. IV (A).
405	Memorandum of telephone conversation between McGeorge Bundy and Ball, October 25. Changes in draft message to U Thant. No classification marking. 1 p. DOS, Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272, Telcons—Cuba.
406	Paper prepared by Dillon's group, October 25. Scenario for airstrike against offensive missile bases and bombers in Cuba. Top Secret. 4 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438, Air Strike, Cuba.
407	Paper prepared in the Department of State, October 25. Political path including three political actions for consideration by the Executive Committee. Top Secret. 4 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438, Political Action.
408	Executive Committee record of action, October 25. Military situation; political situation; military recommendations, message to U Thant. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Executive Committee, Vol. I, Meetings 1–5.

- | No. | Document Description |
|-----|---|
| 409 | Memorandum for the record, October 29. Summary of Cooper's activities during his mission to London, October 21–25. No classification marking. 7 pp. CIA Files: Job 84–00499R, Box 1, HS/HC 850A, 29 May 72. |
| 410 | Memorandum of telephone conversation between Stevenson and Cleveland, October 25. Request that Stevenson come to Washington for discussions with the President and Rusk. No classification marking. 2 pp. DOS, Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272, Telcons—Cuba. |
| 411 | Memorandum of telephone conversation between the President and Ball, October 25. Report on Stevenson's planned trip to Washington. No classification marking. 1 p. DOS, Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272, Telcons—Cuba. |

October 26, 1962

- | | |
|-----|---|
| 412 | Supplement 6 to Joint Evaluation prepared by Guided Missile and Astronautics Intelligence Committee, Joint Atomic Energy Intelligence Committee, and National Photographic Interpretation Center, October 26. Soviet missile threat in Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA Files: Job 80–R01386R, O/D/NFAC, Box 2, Cuba (23 Oct.–28 Oct. 1962). |
| 413 | Memorandum prepared for the NSC Executive Committee, October 26. The Crisis: USSR/Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Executive Committee, Vol. I, Meetings 6–10. |
| 414 | Memorandum for the record, October 26. Daily White House staff meeting including discussion on press leaks, boarding of the Marucla , telegram from Lord Russell to the President. Secret. 2 pp. NDU, Taylor Papers, Chairman's Staff Group, Oct–Nov 1962. |
| 415 | Notes from transcripts of JCS meetings, October 26. CJCS debrief on meeting at the White House the previous evening; blockade issues; air reconnaissance; MRBMs. Secret. 2 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History. |

No.	Document Description
416	Memorandum for the file, October 26. Meeting of the NSC Executive Committee including intelligence briefings and discussion of operational problems. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80-B01258A, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 July 1962-31 December 1962.
417	NSC Executive Committee record of action, October 26. Planning for Cuba, status of quarantine, political measures, negotiation with U Thant. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Excom Meetings, vol. I, Meetings 1-6.
418	Rough notes of Rostow committee meeting, October 26. Three courses of U.S. action—political, military, and economic—to pursue concurrently. Top Secret. CIA Files: Job 84-00499R, Box 1, HS/HC 850B, Vol. II.
419	Memorandum from Hilsman to Rusk, October 26. Khrushchev's conversation with W.E. Knox, President of Westinghouse Electrical International, in Moscow on October 24. Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Cuba, General, Vol. VI(A), 10/26-27/62.
420	Memorandum from Komer to McGeorge Bundy, October 26. Forward planning thoughts on Cuba. Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Staff Memoranda, Robert W. Komer, vol. II.
421	Memorandum from Komer to Rostow, October 26. Forward planning on Cuba vs. Cuban MRBMs. Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Staff Memoranda, Robert W. Komer, vol. II.
422	Memorandum from Kitchen to U. Alexis Johnson, October 26. Rostow subcommittee memorandum on negotiation. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438, Negotiations.
423	Telegram 936 from Rome, October 26. Italian Government position on withdrawal of Jupiter missile installations from Italy. Secret. 4 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438, Jupiter—Cuba.

- | No. | Document Description |
|-----|--|
| 424 | Memorandum of telephone conversation between Nitze and Ball, October 26. U.S. missile installations in Turkey. No classification marking. 1 p. DOS, Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272, Telcons—Cuba. |
| 425 | Telegram 587 from Ankara, October 26. Embassy assessment of removal of Jupiter missiles from Turkey in exchange for Soviet removal of missiles in Cuba. Secret. 6 pp. DOS, CF, 611.3722/10–2662. |

October 27, 1962

- | | |
|-----|--|
| 426 | Supplement 7 to Joint Evaluation prepared by Guided Missile and Astronautics Intelligence Committee, Joint Atomic Energy Intelligence Committee, and National Photographic Interpretation Center, October 27. Soviet missile threat in Cuba. Top Secret. 3 pp. CIA Files: Job 80–R01386R, O/D/NFAC, Box 2, Cuba (23 Oct.–28 Oct. 1962). |
| 427 | Memorandum prepared for the NSC Executive Committee, October 27. The Crisis: USSR/Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Excom Meetings, Vol. I, Meetings 6–10. |
| 428 | Notes from transcripts of JCS meetings, October 27. Briefing by General Carroll and Hughes of DIA; Soviet military personnel in Cuba; OPLANs 312 and 316; U–2 lost over Cuba; President’s message to Khrushchev; Jupiter missiles in Turkey; retaliation for U–2 shot down over Cuba; photographic verification of nuclear weapons in Cuba; reconnaissance. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History. |
| 429 | NSC Executive Committee record of action, October 27. Soviet ships moving toward Cuba, size of quarantine zone, Soviet public statement, draft message to Khrushchev. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Excom Meeting, vol. V, Meetings 6–10. |
| 430 | Telegram 1970 from Paris, October 27. De Gaulle position on U.S. actions in Cuba. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 611.3722/1–2762. |

No.	Document Description
431	Memorandum from Rostow to McGeorge Bundy, October 27. Report No. 4 of Planning Subcommittee. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. IV(B).
432	Memorandum of conversation between Georgi Kornienko and Richard H. Davis, October 27. Transmittal of text of letter from Stevenson to Secretary General U Thant re delimitation of "interception area" in the waters around Cuba. Confidential. 2 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD/ISA Files: FRC 65 A 3501, Cuba 381, Jan-Oct.
433	Memorandum from Kitchen to Nitze, October 27. Transmits memorandum from Raymond Garthoff on Khrushchev's proposal for a Turkey-Cuba trade-off. Secret Attachment. 3 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD(C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896, Historical, Cuba, October 1962.
434	Memorandum prepared by Raymond Garthoff, October 27. The military significance of the Soviet missile bases in Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 737.56361/10-2762.
435	Memorandum from Hilsman to Rusk, October 27. Khrushchev's proposal for trade-off of missiles in Turkey for missiles in Cuba. Top Secret. 1 p. DOS, CF, 737.56361/10-2762.
436	Memorandum from Thomas L. Hughes (INR) to Rusk, October 27. Probable Soviet response to U.S. retaliation against an SAM site. Top Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 611.3722/10-2762.
437	NSC Executive Committee record of action, October 27. Reconnaissance missions; message to U Thant; U-2 overflying the USSR; letter from the President to Khrushchev; military planning. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Excom Meetings, Vol. I, Meetings 6-10.
438	NSC Executive Committee record of action, October 27. Call up of air reserve squadrons; message for U Thant; calling up U.S. ships and adding POL to list of prohibited goods; message from General Nors-tad; message to Finletter. No classification marking. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Excom Meetings, Vol. I, Meetings 6-10.

No.	Document Description
-----	----------------------

October 28, 1962

- | | |
|-----|--|
| 439 | Supplement 8 to Joint Evaluation prepared by Guided Missile and Astronautics Intelligence Committee, Joint Atomic Energy Intelligence Committee, and National Photographic Interpretation Center, October 28. Soviet missile threat in Cuba. Top Secret. 4 pp. CIA Files: Job 80–R01386R, O/D/NFAC, Box 2, Cuba (23 Oct.–28 Oct. 1962). |
| 440 | Telegram 1234 from Bonn, October 28. Chancellor Adenauer's views on what actions United States should take now. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 611.3722/10–2861. |
| 441 | Notes from transcripts of JCS meetings, October 28. Request for meeting with the President; MRBM sites operational; Khrushchev message (Moscow radio broadcast) that Soviets will stop building bases and dismantle equipment. Secret. 3 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History. |
| 442 | Memorandum from Brubeck to McGeorge Bundy, October 28. Transmits Rostow subcommittee October 27 paper on negotiations. Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, vol IV(B). |
| 443 | NSC Executive Committee record of action, October 28. Khrushchev message; blockade; air reconnaissance missions; public statement on Soviet decision to withdraw offensive weapons from Cuba; press relations; reply to Khrushchev. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Excon Meetings, vol. I, Meetings 6–10. |
| 444 | Debriefing by U. Alexis Johnson, October 28. Current situation in Cuban missile crisis. Top Secret. 4 pp. DOS, S/S–NSC Files: Lot 75 D 265, NSC Debriefings 1962. |
| 445 | Telegram 1517 from USUN, October 28. Stevenson and Yost conversation with SYG on situation following latest Khrushchev letter to the President. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 611.3722/10–2861. |

No.	Document Description
446	Memorandum of conversation between Rusk and Alphand, October 28. Latest developments in Cuba including Khrushchev's recent letter. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 330.
447	Telegram 7065 from JCS to CINCLANT, CINCONAD, and CINCSAC, October 28. Instruction not to relax alert procedures despite latest Soviet proposal. Top Secret. 1 p. OSD, Historical Office, Secretary of Defense, Cable Files, Cuba, Oct. 25-31, 1962.
448	Letter from U Thant to the President, October 28, enclosing text of Secretary General's reply to Castro. Comments on President's spirit of cooperation and concern for peace. No classification marking. 1 p. DOS, S/S-NSC Files: Lot 65 D 438, Miscellaneous.
449	Supplement 9 to Joint Evaluation prepared by Guided Missile and Astronautics Intelligence Committee, Joint Atomic Energy Intelligence Committee, and National Photographic Interpretation Center, October 28. Soviet missile threat in Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA Files: Job 80-R01386R, O/D/NFAC, Box 2, Cuba (23 Oct.-28 Oct. 1962).

October 29, 1962

450	Memorandum for the record, October 29. Daily White House staff meeting including discussion of quarantine developments; Presidential TV statement; Berlin; AID in FY 64; aerial reconnaissance of Cuba by UN; critique of crisis. Secret. 2 pp. National Defense University, Taylor Papers, Chairman's Staff Group, Oct-Nov 1962.
451	NSC Executive Committee record of action, October 29. Current intelligence on Cuba; establishment of Coordinating Committee; quarantine and aerial reconnaissance; air reserves call-up; UN arrangements for verification; agenda for new Coordinating Committee. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Executive Committee, Meetings, Vol. II, Meetings, 11-16.

No.	Document Description
452	Memorandum from Komer to McGeorge Bundy, October 29. Report on Planning Group meeting and proposal for a U.S.-Soviet summit. Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Staff Memoranda, Robert W. Komer, Vol. I.
453	Notes from transcripts of JCS meeting, October 29. Jupiter missile deal; UN inspection and surveillance; U.S. readiness posture. Secret. 3 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History.
454	Memorandum of telephone conversation between McCloy and Rusk, October 29. Quarantine inspection at sea; UN weapon inspections in Cuba; disarmament. No classification marking. 2 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896, Cuba 1962, (McN Working Papers)
455	NSC Executive Committee record of action, October 29. UN developments; IRC inspections; on-site inspections; lifting of U.S. quarantine; inspection system; political developments. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Excom Meetings, Vol. II, Meetings 11–16.
456	Telegram 909 from Rio de Janeiro, October 29. General Albino to visit to Havana to talk with Castro. Top Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 737.56361/10–2962.
457	Memorandum from Schlesinger to the President, October 29. Post mortem on Cuba. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, vol. IV(B).

October 30, 1962

458	Memorandum for the record, October 30. Daily White House staff meeting including discussion of aerial surveillance; communications with Latin America; Executive order on shipping restrictions to Cuba; press leaks; press speculation re intelligence gathering; Cuban exiles; Adenauer visit; Nitze Subcommittee. Secret. 3 pp. NDU, Taylor Papers, Box 25, Chairman's Staff Meetings.
-----	---

No.	Document Description
459	NSC Executive Committee record of action, October 30. Current intelligence; U-1 flights; press restrictions; Executive order on Cuban shipping; Cuban exiles. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Excom Meetings, Vol. II, Meetings 11-16.
460	Notes from transcripts of JCS meeting, October 30. Briefing by DIA re October 29 photography of missile sites in Cuba. Secret. 2 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History.
461	Memorandum from the Joint Chiefs of Staff to McNamara, October 30. Points to consider in current negotiations on the removal of Soviet offensive capabilities from Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. WNRC, OASD/ISA Files; FRC 65 A 3501, Cuba 1962, 381 Jan-Oct.
462	Memorandum from McCone to the Attorney General, McNamara, Rusk, and General Taylor, October 30. Information on intelligence collecting infiltration and guerrilla warfare teams. Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, Subjects, Intelligence Materials, 10/1/62-11/12/62.
463	Memorandum from Edwin M. Martin to Rusk, October 30. Guarantees from Cuba with respect to subversive activities. Secret. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 737.00/10-3062.
464	List of Outstanding Issues prepared for the NSC Executive Committee, October 30. List covers: theory of operation; short-term verification requirements; long-term verification requirements; political arrangements. Top Secret. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. IV(b).

October 31, 1962

- 465 Memorandum Prepared for the Executive Committee of the National Security Council, October 31. The Crisis: USSR/Cuba. Top Secret. 8 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Excom Meetings, vol. II, Meetings 6-11.

No.	Document Description
466	Notes from transcripts of JCS meetings, October 31. DIA briefing on latest photographs; State instructions for UN negotiations; reconnaissance flights over Cuba. Secret. 2 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History.
467	NSC Executive Committee record of action, October 31. Inspection procedures; President's press conference; draft instructions to UN Mission; reconnaissance missions; quarantine. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Excom Meetings, Vol. II, Meetings 11–16.
468	Memorandum of conversation between Llewellyn Thompson and Zhukov, October 31. Summit meeting; Soviet Cuban policy; quarantine; verification measures; Indian-Chinese dispute; test ban treaty. Secret. 4 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, vol. IV(B).
469	Circular telegram 807, October 31. U Thant discussions with Castro re verification measures. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 737.56361/10–3162.
470	Memorandum from Stevenson to McCloy, Ball, and Gilpatric, October 31. Next steps in Cuban crisis. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438, UN—Cuba.
471	Telegram 1153 to USUN, October 31. Instructions for New York negotiations on Cuba. Secret. 4 pp. Department of Defense, OSD, Historical Office, Secretary of Defense, Cable Files, Cuba, Oct 25–31, 1962.
472	Memorandum prepared by McCone, October 31. A history of Soviet MRBMs in Cuba with a September 11 attachment entitled "Recent Soviet Military Activities in Cuba." Top Secret. 11 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01258A, DCI Memos for the Record, 24 September–31 December 1962.
473	NSC Executive Committee record of action, October 31. U Thant-Castro talks; aerial surveillance; quarantine; USIA broadcasts to Cuba; discussions with Russian officials. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Excom Meetings, Vol. II, Meetings 11–16.

- | No. | Document Description |
|----------------------|--|
| 474 | Memorandum of meeting of NSC Executive Committee, October 31. Report of photographic evidence of movement of missiles in Cuba; discussion in New York. Top Secret. 1 p. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80-B01258A, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 July-31 December 1962. |
| November 1962 | |
| 475 | Telegram 1585 from USUN, November 1. Summary of U Thant's preliminary report of his visit to Cuba. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438, Psalm Documents. |
| 476 | Memorandum prepared for the NSC Executive Committee, November 1. Cuban Crisis Negotiations: the situation in Cuba; Soviet Bloc shipping to Cuba; 2 annexes. Top Secret. 13 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Excom Meetings, vol. II, Meetings 6-11. |
| 477 | Notes from transcripts of JCS meetings, November 1. Debrief of Executive Committee meeting November 1; reconnaissance flights; preparations for operation against Cuba. Secret. 2 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History. |
| 478 | Telegram 1606 from USUN, November 2. Encloses text of letter and enclosure Stevenson sent to Mikoyan re U.S. list of offensive weapons. Secret. 2 pp. USUN Files: NYFRC 84-84-001, Outgoing Telegrams, 1953-1963. |
| 479 | Memorandum prepared for the NSC Executive Committee, November 2. The situation in Cuba; Bloc developments; Bloc military status; Soviet bloc shipping to Cuba; and one annex. Top Secret. 9 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Excom Meetings, vol. II, Meetings 6-11. |
| 480 | Memorandum from Hilsman to Rusk, November 2. Situation in light of Mikoyan talks and Castro speech. Top Secret. 3 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438, Political Actions. |

No.	Document Description
481	Telegram 1177 to USUN, November 2. Transmits questions to clarify in conversations with the Soviets. Confidential. 1 p. USUN Files: NYFRC 84–84–001, Incoming Telegrams, 1953–1963.
482	Memorandum of telephone conversation between Ball and Gilpatric, November 3. Status of IL–28s in Cuba; planned high-level flights over national waters. No classification marking. 2 pp. DOS, Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272, Telcons—Cuba.
483	Memorandum of telephone conversation between Ball and McCloy, November 3. Status of IL–28s in Cuba; notification to Soviets of unacceptable IL–28 activity in Cuba. No classification marking. 1 p. DOS, Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272, Telcons—Cuba.
484	Memorandum from General Joseph Carroll to McNamara, General Taylor, and the Director of the Joint Staff, November 3. Status of Soviet offensive weapons in Cuba. No classification marking. 1 p. NDU, Taylor Papers, Cuba, Cuba Intelligence.
485	Memorandum for the record, November 3. NSC Executive Committee meeting including discussion of hidden missiles in Cuba; Cuban SAM program; effect of quarantine; overflight program; inspection arrangements; no invasion guarantee. Top Secret. 4 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B1258A, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 July 1962–31 December 1962.
486	NSC Executive Committee record of actions, November 3. Low-level sorties over Cuba; inspection arrangements. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Executive Committee, Meetings, Vol. II, Meetings 17–24.
487	Draft instruction to USUN for consideration by the Executive Committee, undated. Inspection arrangements for Cuba. Secret. 4 pp. Washington National Records Center, RG 330, OASD(C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896, Verification of US-USSR Agreements re Cuba.

No.	Document Description
488	Memorandum from Llewellyn E. Thompson to Rusk, November 3. Notes of a conversation between Dobrynin and Thompson on November 3 re verification arrangements. Secret. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, USSR, Dobrynin Talks, Vol. II.
489	NSC Executive Committee record of action, November 3. Presidential instruction on present negotiations on Cuba; progress on inspection negotiations. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Executive Committee, Meetings, Vol. II, Meetings 17-24.
490	Memorandum from Cline to McCone, November 3. Time factors in construction of Soviet missile bases in Cuba. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80-B01258A, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 December 1961-30 June 1962.
491	NSC Executive Committee record of action, November 5. Aerial reconnaissance missions; McCloy-Kuznetsov discussions at UN. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Executive Committee, Meetings, Vol. II, Meetings 17-24.
492	Memorandum of NSC Executive Committee meeting by McCone, November 5. Overflights of Cuba; inspection procedures; reciprocal UN inspections. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80-B01258A, DCI Meetings with the President, Box 6, 1 July 1962-31 December 1962.
493	Paper by George B. McManus, November 5. Demise of Operation Mongoose. Secret. 3 pp. CIA Files: Job 91-00741R, Box 1, Mongoose Papers.
494	Telegram 1200 to USUN, November 5. Guidance for procedures for adequate verification that USSR has removed offensive equipment from Cuba. Top Secret. 6 pp. DOS, CF, 737.56361/11-562.
495	Draft letter from Kennedy to Khrushchev, November 5, enclosing draft telegram to USUN. List of weapons in Cuba that the United States considers to be offensive. Secret. 5 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Subjects File, Khrushchev Correspondence (Cuba), Vol. I-C, 11/3/62-11/16/62.

No.	Document Description
496	Memorandum from McNaughton to Nitze, November 5. U.S. “anti-invasion” guarantee in the Cuban settlement. Top Secret. 5 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896, Historical Files, Cuba, November 1962.
497	Memorandum from Forrestal to Bundy, November 5. Comments on Presidential instructions on Cuban negotiations. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. V(A).
498	Telegram 1642 from USUN, November 6. Report of 3½ hour meeting Stevenson and McCloy had with Kuznetsov, Zorin, and Mendelevich. Secret. 4 pp. USUN Files: NYFRC 84–84–001, Outgoing Telegrams, 1953–1963.
499	NSC Executive Committee record of action, November 6. Approved letter to Khrushchev; IL–28 bombers; broadcasts to Cuba; air reconnaissance mission; refugee reports on Soviet missiles hidden in Cuban caves. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Executive Committee, Meetings, Vol. II, 17–24.
500	Memorandum of telephone conversation among Gilpatric, Ball and U. Alexis Johnson, November 6. Preparations for meeting with Kuznetsov: SAM activations; aerial inspection; IL–28s; verification; re-introduction of arms assurance. No classification marking. 3 pp. DOS, Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272, Telcons—Cuba.
501	Notes from transcripts of JCS meetings; November 7. General Wheeler visit to Army units in the field; briefing by DIA; reconnaissance; OPLAN 316. Secret. 3 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History.
502	Memorandum for the record, November 7. Briefing of former President Eisenhower at Gettysburg on Cuban developments. Secret. 4 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, Box 2, Memos for the Record, 24 Sept–31 Dec 1962.

No.	Document Description
503	Memorandum from Nitze to the NSC Executive Committee, November 7. Suggested course of action if a U.S. surveillance plane is shot at or destroyed. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, Sorensen Papers, Classified Subject Files 1961–64, Cuba—Subjects, Material Used at Hyannis, 11/22/62–11/23/62.
504	Memorandum from the Joint Chiefs of Staff to McNamara, November 7. Recommended U.S. reaction to hostile attack of U.S. reconnaissance aircraft over Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896, Cuba (Sensitive) 1962.
505	NSC Executive Committee record of action, November 7. Current intelligence; Naval checking of Soviet ships; reconnaissance missions; surveillance; unresolved issues. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Executive Committee, Meetings, Vol. II, 17–24.
506	Telegram 1684 from USUN, November 8. Report on meeting between Yost and Wellborn and Morozov and Mendelevich to clarify aspects of alongside inspection of outgoing Soviet vessels and ICRC procedures. Top Secret. 2 pp. USUN Files: NYFRC 84–84–001, Outgoing Telegrams, 1962 (TS, Exdis, etc.)
507	NSC Executive Committee record of action, November 8. Press release; long-term surveillance requirements; courses of action in event a U.S. reconnaissance plane is shot or destroyed; ways to keep pressure on Castro; aerial reconnaissance mission. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Executive Committee, Meetings, Vol. II, 17–24.
508	Memorandum from Edwin M. Martin to Rusk, November 8, covering a memorandum from Hurwitch to Martin. Approach to Castro through Carlos Lechuga. Top Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 737.56361/11–862.
509	Notes from transcripts of JCS meeting, November 9. Surveillance requirements. Secret. 3 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History.

No.	Document Description
510	Telegram 1703 from USUN, November 9. Meeting between Ruegger and Borsinger (ICRC) and McCloy and Yost re Cuban consent to proposed inspection operation. Top Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 737.56361/11–962.
511	Telegram 1709 from USUN, November 9. Kuznetsov allegations that three Soviet ships sailing from Cuba to USSR were improperly searched by U.S. vessels. Secret. 2 pp. USUN Files: NYFRC 84–84–001, Outgoing Telegrams, 1953–1963.
512	Telegram 1710 from USUN, November 9. Report of follow-on conversation between McCloy and Kuznetsov based on telephone conversation between McCloy and Gilpatric re Kuznetsov allegations that U.S. vessels improperly searched Soviet ships. Confidential. 1 p. USUN Files: NYFRC 84–84–001, Outgoing Telegrams, 1953–1963.
513	Memorandum for the record, November 13. Record of November 10 meeting between Rusk and McCone re the future of Cuba. Secret. 1 p. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, Box 2, DCI Memos for the Record, 24 Sept–31 Dec 1962.
514	Memorandum prepared in the Central Intelligence Agency, November 10. Recent Cuban developments: analysis of low-altitude photography and verification of cargoes on Soviet ships. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Cuba, Subjects, Intelligence Materials, 10/1/62–11/12/62.
515	Notes from transcripts of JCS meeting, November 12. Blockade; disengaging Soviets from Cuba. Secret. 2 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History.
516	NSC Executive Committee record of action, November 12. U.S. forces state of readiness; current intelligence summary; political situation; negotiations with Russians at UN; form of assurance against U.S. invasion of Cuba; reliability of refugee reports; arrangements to ensure that Soviet offensive weapons cannot be secretly introduced into Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NFS, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Executive Committee Meetings, Vol. II, Meetings 17–24.

No.	Document Description
517	Memorandum from Nitze to McNamara, November 12. Suggested DOD position on Ball memoranda to the President. Top Secret. 6 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896, Cuba 1962.
518	Memorandum from U. Alexis Johnson to McGeorge Bundy, November 12. Draft of proposed statement prepared for UN Security Council re "no-invasion" guarantee with respect to Cuba in the event the IL-28s are removed and satisfactory on-ground verification is achieved. Top Secret. 4 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. VI(A).
519	Memorandum of Executive Committee meeting by McCone, November 12. Military equipment in Cuba; aerial surveillance; Cuban refugee report re number of missiles in Cuba. Top Secret. 1 p. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80-B01285A, Box 6, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 July 1962-31 December 1961.
520	NSC Executive Committee record of action, November 12. Khrushchev's reply to Kennedy November 6 letter; safeguards against offensive weapons in Cuba; aerial reconnaissance missions for November 13. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NFS, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Executive Committee Meetings, Vol. II, Meetings 25-32A.
521	Notes from transcripts of JCS meetings, November 13. Chief JCS debriefing of November 12 and 13 Executive Committee meetings; UN negotiations; courses of action in Cuba crisis; Khrushchev's letter. Secret. 4 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History.
522	Memorandum from Cleveland to Rusk and Ball, November 13, enclosing a draft Cuban contingency paper. Courses of action if Soviets stall on removal of IL-28s from Cuba. Top Secret. 13 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438, Psalm Documents.
523	Memorandum for McNamara, November 13. Quarantine operations. Top Secret. 2 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896, Nitze Files, Black Book, Cuba, Vol. III.

No.	Document Description
524	Memorandum for the record, November 13, prepared by Colonel Julian J. Ewell, covering a JCS paper entitled "Assessment of Increased Conventional Military Capabilities of Cuban and Soviet Units in Cuba." Secret. 10 pp. NDU, Taylor Papers, Cuba, Cuba Intelligence.
525	Telegram 1762 from USUN, November 13. Summary of 4-hour conversation between U.S. and Soviet negotiators on UN inspection and removal of offensive weapons from Cuba. Top Secret. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 737.00/11–1362.
526	Memorandum of telephone conversation between Gilpatric and Ball, November 14. Status of U.S.-Soviet negotiations on UN inspection and removal of offensive weapons from Cuba. No classification marking. DOS, Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272.
527	DOD/ISA draft paper, November 14. "Some Lessons From Cuba." Secret. 11 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. VI (A).
528	Telegram 1781 from USUN, November 14. Status of present U.S.-Soviet negotiations. Top Secret. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 737.56361/11–1462.
529	Memorandum for the NSC Executive Committee from Nitze, November 14. Relationship of Cuban objectives to present decisions. Top Secret. 6 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD/ISA Files: FRC 69 A 0926, Cuba 1962 (Sensitive).
530	Notes from transcripts of JCS meeting, November 15. Talking paper for discussion with the President. Secret. 2 pp. DOD, Office of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Office of Joint History.
531	Telegram 1795 from USUN, November 15. Mission comments on UN working paper on safeguards and verification. Top Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 737.663.61/11–1562.
532	Telegram 1798 from USUN, November 15. Transmits verbatim text of Soviet and Cuban proposed protocol. Secret. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 737.00/11–1562.

No.	Document Description
533	NSC Executive Committee record of action, November 16. Aerial surveillance; status of UN negotiations; long-term verification; policy re invasion of Cuba; daily aerial reconnaissance; courses of action in event surveillance plane is shot at or destroyed. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Executive Committee, Meetings, Vol. III, 25–32A.
534	Memorandum of meeting of Executive Committee of the NSC by McCone, November 16. Discussion of intelligence briefing by McCone; report on recent communications by Rusk; removal of IL–28s; high-level reconnaissance flights; Soviet military strength in Cuba; and four actions for CIA. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, Box 6, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 July 1962–31 December 1962.
535	Telegram 1288 to USUN, November 16. Comments on UN working paper on safeguards and verification. Top Secret. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 737.56361/11–1662.
536	Telegram 1833 from USUN, November 16. Report of Yost meeting with SYG on U.S. difficulties with UN working paper: verification of withdrawal, safeguards against introduction of nuclear weapons, and assurances against invasion. Top Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 737.56361/11–1662.
537	Telegram 1835 from USUN, November 16. Proposed text of letter and draft declaration for early submission to Soviets at UN in effort to move toward agreement on all outstanding points. Top Secret. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 737.56361/11–1662.
538	Memorandum from J.J. Ewell to General Taylor, November 16, covering a draft memorandum for the President in response to a request for further information on the Soviet arms build-up in Cuba. Secret. 3 pp. NDU, Taylor Papers, Cuba, Cuba Intelligence.
539	Letter from Rusk to McCloy, November 17. Guidance for McCloy's meeting with Kuznetsov on November 18. Top Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 737.56361/11–1762.

No.	Document Description
540	CIA memorandum prepared for the Executive Committee of the NSC, November 19. The situation in Cuba. Top Secret. 5 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438, CIA—Cuba.
541	NSC Executive Committee record of action, November 19. Summary of weekend intelligence; McCloy-Kuznetsov latest talk; high-level reconnaissance flights; Presidential press statements; review of political and military actions. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Executive Committee, Meetings, Vol. III, 25–32A.
542	Telegram 2645 to Paris; 1203 to Bonn, November 19. Transmits text of personal message from Kennedy to de Gaulle, Adenauer, and Macmillan. Secret. 4 pp. DOS, Presidential Correspondence: Lot 66 D 204.
543	Memorandum for members of the NSC Executive Committee from Brubeck, November 19. Transmits three INR papers entitled: “Soviet-Cuban Reactions to U.S. Retaliation for Attack on U.S. Reconnaissance Aircraft”; “Prospects for Overthrowing Castro From Within”; and “Negotiations on Cuba: The Advantages of Stalemate.” Secret. 18 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD/ISA Files: FRC 69 A 0926 Cuba 1962 (Sensitive).
544	Cuba Contingency Plan, November 20. Consisting of three parts: “Advice to NATO and OAS Governments regarding possible Cuban developments and U.S. action”; “Overflights and responses”; “Additional steps to be taken in the event IL–28s not removed.” Top Secret. 13 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, Vol. VI (B), 11/16/72–11/20/62.
545	Telegram 1862 from USUN, November 19. Probable course negotiations with USSR will take to wind up current Cuban crisis. Top Secret. 5 pp. DOS, CF, 737.56361/11–1962.
546	Telegram 1865 from USUN, November 19. Concerns on draft Presidential statement forwarded to Stevenson by Johnson on November 17. Top Secret. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 373.56361/11–1962.

No.	Document Description
547	Memorandum of meeting of the NSC Executive Committee by McCone, November 19. Cuban contingency plan of November 19; proposed messages to de Gaulle, Adenauer, and Macmillan; proposed resolution to OAS; President's press conference. Top Secret. 1 p. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80-B01285A.
548	Telegram Polto 577 from Paris, November 20. Report on Ball presentation on Cuba situation to the NAC. Top Secret. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 737.00/11-2062.
549	Memorandum for the record, November 21. Daily White House staff meeting: Public opinion on Cuba; Latin Americans position re Cuba. Secret. 2 pp. NDU, Taylor Papers, Chairman's Group, Oct-Nov 1962.
550	NSC Executive Committee record of action, November 21. UN negotiations with the Russians; aerial reconnaissance plan. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Executive Committee, Meetings, Vol. III, 25-32A.
551	Memorandum for the record, November 21. Report of telephone call to Kuznetsov from McCloy re draft of proposed U.S. declaration assuring against the invasion of Cuba. Confidential. 1 p. USUN Files: NYFRC 84-84-001, IA, October/November Meetings.
552	Letter from McCone to McGeorge Bundy, November 22. Non-invasion of Cuba pledge. No classification marking. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. VI (B), 11/21/62-11/30/62.
553	Memorandum from Cleveland to Ball, November 22. Transmits three drafts of the two main versions of the non-invasion pledge still under discussion. Top Secret. 4 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, General, Cuba, Vol. VI (B), 11/21/62-11/30/62.
554	Memorandum from Sorensen to President Kennedy, November 22. Wrapping up the Cuban crisis. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, Sorensen Papers, Classified Subject Files 1961-64, Cuba-Subjects, Material Used at Hyannis, 11/22/62-11/23/62.

No.	Document Description
555	Telegram 1942 from USUN, November 25. Kuznetsov-McCloy telephone conversation re Soviet questions about proposed U.S. declaration. Top Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 737.56361/11–2562.
556	Telegram 1953 from USUN, November 26. Reports on meeting with Secretary General about latest Cuban developments. Top Secret. 1 p. DOS, CF 737.56361/11–2662.
557	Telegram 1991 from USUN, November 28. U.S.-Soviet meeting re U.S. draft declaration. Top Secret. 6 pp. DOS, CF, 737.56361/1–2862.
558	Letter from Henry S. Rowen to Fred S. Hoffman, November 28. Expresses appreciation for Rand Corporation's quick response to DOD request for estimation of the threat posed by Soviet IRBMs if stationed in Cuba. Secret. 1 p. WNRC, RG 330, OASD/ISA Files: FRC 65 A 3501, Cuba, 1962.
559	Memorandum prepared for the NSC Executive Committee, November 29. Bloc military forces; bloc shipping to and from Cuba; Cuban internal situation; Soviet position. Top Secret. 7 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 60 D 438, OA—Cuba.
560	NSC Executive Committee record of action, November 29. Refugee reports of Soviet offensive weapons in Cuba; New York discussions with Mikoyan; longer-range plan to keep pressure on Castro; overflights of Cuba; press interest in post-mortem of Cuban crisis. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Executive Committee, Vol. III, Meetings, 25–32A, 11/12/62–12/4/62.
December 1962
561	Memorandum from Schlesinger to the President, December 2. Refutation of Alsop-Bartlett story on Stevenson's dissension from the Executive Committee consensus. Confidential. 4 pp. Kennedy Library, Schlesinger Papers, Cuba 1961–1963.
562	Memorandum of telephone conversation between McCloy and Ball, December 3. Request by McCloy to wrap up negotiations with Kuznetsov. No classification marking. 1 pp. DOS, Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272, Telcons—Cuba.

No.	Document Description
563	Memorandum of meeting of the Executive Committee of the NSC by McCone, December 3. Stevenson's report on the three areas of disagreement with the Soviets, and McCone's expression of concern over Soviet conduct in Cuba to the President at a later meeting. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80-B01285A, Box 6, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 July 1962-31 December 1962.
564	Memorandum from Schlesinger to the President, December 3. Alsop-Bartlett story on Stevenson. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, Schlesinger Papers, Cuba, 1961-1963.
565	Memorandum of telephone conversation between McCloy and Ball, December 3. McCloy report of 5-½ hour conversation with Kuznetsov, Zorin, and Mendelovich. No classification marking. 5 pp. DOS, Ball Papers: Lot 74 D 272, Telcons—Cuba.
566	Telegram 2104 from USUN, December 4. Transmits verbatim text of Cuban draft declaration. Secret. 5 pp. USUN Files: NYFRC: 84-84-001, Outgoing Telegrams, 1953-1963.
567	Telegram 2106 from USUN, December 4. Report of afternoon meeting with Soviets. Top Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 737.56361/12-462.
568	Memorandum of telephone conversation between Stevenson and Ball, December 5. Letter from the President to Stevenson as possible solution to the Alsop-Bartlett story on Stevenson. No classification marking. 2 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438, UN—Cuba.
569	Letter from the President to Stevenson, December 5. Expresses regret over statements in the press by Alsop and Bartlett and support for Stevenson. No classification marking. 1 p. Princeton University, Adlai E. Stevenson Papers, John F. Kennedy.
570	Memorandum of Executive Committee meeting by McCone, December 6. Intelligence briefing; Mikoyan visit to Cuba; UN negotiations; U.S. actions in event of Cuba-supported insurgency or civil war in Cuba; position paper. Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80-B01285A, Box 6, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 July 1962-31 December 1962.

No.	Document Description
571	Telegram 1511 to USUN, December 6. Transmits modifications in U.S. draft statement on Cuba for presentation to Soviet negotiators. Top Secret. 3 pp. DOS, CF 737.56361/12–662.
572	Telegram 1512 to USUN, December 6. Transmits draft U.S. statement on Cuba for presentation in Security Council. Top Secret. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 737.56361/12–662.
573	Memorandum from Bromley Smith to members of the NSC Executive Committee, December 6, covering an FBI report on Mikoyan's briefing of the Soviet delegation in New York. Top Secret. 4 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438, NSC Executive Committee.
574	Memorandum of telephone conversation between Stevenson and Ball, December 6. Outcome of President's letter of support to Stevenson. No classification marking. 1 p. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438, UN—Cuba.
575	Draft telegram to USUN, December 6. Instructions for negotiations with the Soviets. Top Secret. 6 pp. DOS, CF, 737.56361/12–662.
576	Memorandum from Gilpatric to the Secretary of the Army, December 8. Future plans for Cuban Volunteer Inductee Program. Secret. 2 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) A Files: FRC 72 A 2896, Yarmolinsky Files, Cuban Volunteer Program.
577	NSC Executive Committee record of action, December 10. UN negotiations on Cuba; broadcasts by Cuban refugees. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Executive Committee, Meeting, Vol. III, 33–37, 12/6/62–12/17/62.
578	Telegram 2291 from USUN, December 12. Transmits changes to shorten the draft text before submitting joint report to Kuznetsov. Top Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 737.56361/12–1262.
579	Memorandum from U. Alexis Johnson to McGeorge Bundy, December 17. Planning for contingencies of uprisings within Cuba. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. VII (A), 12/62.

No.	Document Description
580	Memorandum from Cleveland to Rusk, December 18. New Soviet proposal for settlement of Cuban crisis. Top Secret. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 737.00/12-1862.
581	Telegram 2416 from USUN, December 19. Discussion of Soviet proposal at luncheon at Soviet Mission. Secret. USUN Files: NYFRC: 84-84-001, 1-B December/January Meetings.
582	Note from General Clifton to General McHugh, December 20. Transmits McCone's request that the President see the attached memorandum. Rising world sugar prices and the effect on Cuba. Secret. 4 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba—Subjects, Intelligence Material, Vol. III.
583	Memorandum from General Taylor to McNamara, December 26. Reassessment of the alert posture for forces committed to Cuban operations. Top Secret. 2 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896, Cuba (Sensitive) 1962.
584	Memorandum from L.J. Legere to McGeorge Bundy, December 28. Alert posture for forces committed to Cuban operations. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. VII (A), 12/62.
585	Telegram 2541 from USUN, December 31. U.S.-Soviet discussion on latest Cuban developments including U.S. draft declaration. Confidential. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 737.5661/12-3162.

January 1963

586	Telegram 2558 from USUN, January 2. Transmits verbatim text of Soviet letter to UN Secretary General. Confidential. 3 pp. USUN Files: NYFRC 84-84-001 1-B December/January Meetings.
587	Telegram 2587 from USUN, January 4. U.S.-Soviet discussion on U.S. draft declaration. Confidential. 3 pp. USUN Files: NYFRC 84-84-001 1-B December/January Meetings.
588	Telegram 2600 from USUN, January 4. Confirmation of changes made in U.S. draft declaration. Confidential. USUN Files: NYFRC 84-84-001 1-B December/January Meetings.

No.	Document Description
589	Memorandum of telephone conversation among, Rusk, Ball, and U. Alexis Johnson, January 5. Release and transport of prisoners and Americans in Cuba. No classification marking. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, Ball Papers, Telephone Conversations, Cuba.
590	Telegram 2617 from USUN, January 5. Arrangements for signature of U.S. draft of joint letter. Confidential. 2 pp. USUN Files: NYFRC 84-84-001 1-B December/January Meetings.
591	Memorandum for the record, January 7. Meeting between McCone and James B. Donovan re outstanding issues in Bay of Pigs operation. Secret. 3 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80-01258A, Box 2, Memos for Record.
592	Memorandum for the record, January 9. Leadership meeting on January 8. Attached DCI Briefing on latest overview of Cuban developments. Top Secret. 5 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80-B01285A, Box 6, DCI Meetings With the President, 1 January–31 March 1963.
593	Memorandum from Rusk to President Kennedy, January 9. Briefing memorandum for Kuznetsov's call on the President January 9. Secret. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 033.1161/1-963.
594	Memorandum of conversation between Rusk and Kuznetsov and other U.S. and Soviet officials, January 10. U.S.-Soviet relations. Secret. 3 pp. DOS, Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 330.
595	Memorandum for the record, January 12. Discussion during a meeting with the President of Cuban aerial reconnaissance. Secret. 3 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80-B01285, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 January–31 March, 1963.
596	Memorandum from McCone to McGeorge Bundy, January 15. McCone's views on surveillance of the Soviet ship Simferopol . Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba—Subjects, Intelligence Material, Vol. III.

No.	Document Description
597	Memorandum from Gordon Chase to McGeorge Bundy, January 15. Progress report of Interdepartmental Coordinating Committee on Cuban Affairs: Pan American/Prisoner exchange package; the Brigade; future policy toward Cuba; press interest. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. VII (B), 1/63.
598	Memorandum from Gordon Chase to McGeorge Bundy, January 17. Progress report of the Cuban Coordinating Committee: the Brigade; the Miami Office; OAS resolutions. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. VII (B), 1/63.
599	CIA Current Support Brief, January 19. "The Cuban Economy in 1961 and 1962 and Prospects for 1963 through 1965." Secret. 11 pp. Kennedy Library, Schlesinger Papers, Cuba, White Label.
600	Memorandum from Gordon Chase to McGeorge Bundy, January 21. Transmits three draft papers of the Cuban Coordinating Committee for use by the Executive Committee. Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. VII (B), 1/63.
601	Memorandum from McGeorge Bundy to President Kennedy, January 21. Topics for President's discussion before NSC at January 22 meeting including President's personal judgment of the events in Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, NSC Meetings, No. 508, 1/22/63.
602	Talking Paper for the Chairman of the JCS, January 24. Papers for NSC Executive Committee meeting on January 25: U.S. policy toward Cuba, the use of the OAS, U.S. policy toward the Cuban Brigade. Top Secret. 5 pp. NDU, Taylor Papers, NSC Actions, 19 Nov. 62-28 Feb. 63.
603	Memorandum from Cottrell to the NSC Executive Committee, January 25. Future of the Cuban Brigade. Secret. 8 pp. DOS, CF, 737.00/1-2463.
604	Memorandum from Cottrell to the NSC Executive Committee, January 25. Current problems concerning Cuba. Secret. 1 p. DOS, CF, 737.00/1-2463.

No.	Document Description
605	Memorandum from Helms to Cottrell, undated. Reaction in the Cuban exile community and Brigade to the Attorney General's no air support statements. Top Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 737.00/1–2563.
606	Memorandum from Gordon Chase to McGeorge Bundy, January 28. Latest developments at the Department of State on Cuba: Donovan's trip to Cuba, the Brigade, intelligence problems, Cuban Coordinating Committee meetings. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. VII (B), 1/63.
607	Memorandum from Gordon Chase to McGeorge Bundy, January 30. Latest developments in Cuba situation: the Brigade, psychological program, planning, meetings. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. VII (B), 1/63.
608	Memorandum from U. Alexis Johnson to McGeorge Bundy, January 30. Cuba shipping. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, NSAM 220.
February 1963
609	Memorandum from McCone to General Taylor, February 1. Low-level reconnaissance of Cuba. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, DCI Memos for the Record, Box 2.
610	Circular telegram 1365 to all Latin American diplomatic posts, February 5. Message over U.S. concern over Cuban shipping question to convey to host government officials. Confidential. 3 pp. DOD, Office of the Secretary of Defense, Historical Office, Secretary of Defense Cable Files, Cuba, 1963.
611	Memorandum from Cyrus Vance to McNamara, February 5. Cuba shipping restrictions. Confidential. 3 pp. WNRC, RG 330, Foreign Policy History Files: FRC 330277–131, Chron File—Cuban Affairs.
612	Report prepared for the Executive Committee, February 5. Soviet Forces in Cuba. Top Secret. 12 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Executive Committee Meetings, Vol. IV, 34–42.

No.	Document Description
613	Statement by the Director of Central Intelligence, February 6. Current status of Soviet military forces and equipment in Cuba. No classification marking. 9 pp. NDU, Taylor Papers, Cuba, Cuba Intelligence.
614	Memorandum for record, February 6. Meeting of the Executive Committee of the NSC re Cuban situation including overflights, incoming Soviet ship. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80-B01285A, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 January-31 March 1963.
615	Memorandum from President Kennedy to McNamara, February 11. Request for views on reconnaissance flight instructions. Secret. 1 p. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) A Files: FRC 71 A 1896, Cuba 381, Feb thru April 1963.
616	Memorandum for the record, February 14. Daily White House staff meeting: Soviet troops in Cuba. Secret. 2 pp. NDU, Taylor Papers, Chairman's Staff Group, Feb 1963.
617	Aide-Mémoire from the Soviet Government to the U.S. Government, February 18. Notification of Soviet withdrawal from Cuba of several thousand Soviet personnel before the middle of March. No classification marking. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, President's Office Files, Cuba, General, 1/63-3/63.
618	Memorandum from Gordon Chase to McGeorge Bundy, February 18. Cuban Coordinating Committee progress report: contingency planning, the Brigade, American prisoners, Cuban subversive training of Latin Americans, action in the UN. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. VII(B), 2/63.
619	Memorandum from McGeorge Bundy to General Taylor, February 19. Transmits the President's request for ways and means to shorten the 18-day lead time in contingency planning for an invasion of Cuba. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, vol. VII(B), 2/63.

No.	Document Description
620	Memorandum of telephone conversation between Hilsman and Ball, February 20. Numbers of weapons in Cuba. No classification marking. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, Ball Papers, Telephone Conversations, Cuba.
621	Memorandum for the U.S. Intelligence Board, February 21. Transmits approved report entitled "Requirements for Low-Level Reconnaissance of Cuba." Secret. 6 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896, Cuba 381, Feb thru April 1963.
622	Special National Intelligence Estimate No. 85–2–63, February 21. "Reactions to U.S. Low-level Overflights of Cuba." Secret. 6 pp. CIA Files: Job 79–R01012A, ODDI Registry.
623	Memorandum from McCone, February 27. Transmits background paper on U–2 overflights of Cuba from August 29 to October 14, 1962. Secret. 12 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438, Cuban Missile Crisis, Miscellaneous.
624	Memorandum from Gordon Chase to McGeorge Bundy, February 26. Progress report of the Cuban Coordinating Committee. Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. VII (B) 2/63.
625	Memorandum of discussion among McGeorge Bundy, Alexis Johnson and McCone, February 28. Situation in Cuba and U.S. long-range plans for dealing with Castro and the Soviet presence in Cuba. Secret. 1 p. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, Box 2.

March 1963

- | | |
|-----|--|
| 626 | Memorandum from U. Alexis Johnson to McCone, March 6. State Department changes to McCone's February 27 memorandum on U–2 overflights of Cuba, August 29–October 14, 1962. Secret. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba—Subjects, Intelligence Material, Vol. IV. |
|-----|--|

No.	Document Description
627	Memorandum from McCone to U. Alexis Johnson, March 7. Reply to the State Department's memorandum commenting on McCone's February 27 memorandum on U-2 overflights of Cuba, August 29–October 14, 1962. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438, Miscellaneous.
628	Memorandum from Brubeck to McGeorge Bundy, March 9. U.S. air surveillance of Cuba. Confidential. 6 pp. DOS, CF, POL 31–1 CUBA–US.
629	Memorandum from McGeorge Bundy to the National Security Council, March 11. Background material for March 13 meeting of the NSC. Secret. 4 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, NSC Meetings, No. 509.
630	Telegram 2241 from Moscow, March 11. Report on conversation between Trevelyan and Khrushchev concerning concessions Soviets made to the United States in Cuba. Secret. 1 p. DOS, CF, POL 17–1 UK–USSR.
631	Memorandum for the record, March 13. Discussion between McCone and the President on latter's final meeting with the Stennis Committee on criticisms directed toward the CIA during the Cuban missile crisis. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–01285A, Box 6, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 January–31 March 1963.
632	Memorandum from U. Alexis Johnson to Rusk, March 13. McCone's report on Cuban intelligence prior to the October crisis. Top Secret. 3 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 38, Miscellaneous.
633	Telegram 2321 from Moscow, March 17. Meeting between Kuznetsov and Kohler re President's private communication to Khrushchev. No classification marking. 1 p. DOS, CF, POL CUBA–USSR.
634	Memorandum from FitzGerald to McCone, March 19. Outline of a program to exacerbate and stimulate disaffection in the Cuban Armed Forces. Secret. 6 pp. CIA Files: Job 91–00741R, Mongoose Papers, Box 1.

No.	Document Description
635	Intelligence Note from Hilsman to Rusk, March 27. "Soviet Response to Two Attacks on Their Freighters Off Cuba." Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba—Subjects, Exiles—3/63.
636	Memorandum from Gordon Chase to McGeorge Bundy, March 27. Cuba Coordinating Committee. Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, VII CC, 3/63.
637	Memorandum from Gordon Chase to McGeorge Bundy, March 27. Secret raid by L-66 exile group. Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba—Subjects, Exile Activities.
638	Telegram 2422 from Moscow, March 27. Transmits text of note from Soviet Government re attack on Soviet cargo vessel in Cuban port. Official Use Only. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba—Subjects, Exile Activities.
639	Memorandum from Gordon Chase to McGeorge Bundy, March 28. Activist exile groups. Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba—Subjects, Exile Activities.
640	Memorandum from Gordon Chase to McGeorge Bundy, March 29. Cuba Coordinating Committee—latest developments. Top Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. VII CC, 3/63.
641	Current Intelligence Memorandum, March 29. Movement of SAM launch sites in Cuba. Secret. 4 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba—Subjects, Intelligence Material, Vol. IV.

April 1963

- | | |
|-----|---|
| 642 | Memorandum from Brubeck to McGeorge Bundy, April 1. Transmits memorandum from Hurwitsch to the Attorney General on actions and recommendations to prevent pin-prick raids against Cuba. Secret. 5 pp. DOS, CF, POL 30-2 CUBA. |
| 643 | Memorandum from Gordon Chase to Dungan, April 2. Cuban exiles. Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba—Subjects, Exiles 4/63. |

No.	Document Description
644	Memorandum from Hurwitch to the Special Group, April 2. Propaganda inciting Cubans within Cuba to attack Soviet troops. Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General Vol. VIII (A), 4/1–4/20/63.
645	Memorandum from McGeorge Bundy to the President, April 3. Alpha 66 raid of March 17–18; the press conference held by Cubans in Washington; the San Jose Conference. No classification marking. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba—Subjects, Exile Activities.
646	Memorandum of telephone conversation between Ball and Greenfield, April 3. Report out of La Paz on a conversation between Donovan and Castro, which would lead to coexistence between Castro and the United States if Castro met certain conditions. No classification marking. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, Ball Papers, Telephone Conversations, Cuba.
647	Memorandum from Thompson to Rusk, April 5. Analysis of possible causes and motives behind Khrushchev's message passed to the Attorney General on April 3. Top Secret. 3 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 77 D 163, Pen Pal Series, Special US–USSR Files, 1963.
648	Memorandum from Thompson to Rusk, Ball, and McGeorge Bundy, April 6. Memorandum of conversation between Dobrynin and Thompson, April 6. Top Secret. 4 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 77 D 163, Pen Pal Series, Special US–USSR Files, 1963.
649	Memorandum for the record by McCone, April 10. Executive Committee of the NSC meeting including: Donovan negotiations; aerial surveillance. 3 pp. Secret. CIA, DCI McCone Files: Job 80–B01285A, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 April–30 June 1963.
650	Memorandum from the Joint Chiefs of Staff to McNamara, April 11. U–2 Flights, Cuba—Contingency Plans. Top Secret. 2 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD/ISA Files: FRC 69 A 0926, Cuba Sensitive 1963, 000.1—.

No.	Document Description
651	Memorandum from McGeorge Bundy to the President, April 12. Time to begin long-range planning aspects for Cuba. No classification marking. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Standing Group, 4/63–5/63.
652	Memorandum from Schlesinger to the President, April 13. Miro Cardona statement. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, Schlesinger Papers, Cuba II.
653	Memorandum for the record by L.J. Legere, April 15. Daily White House staff meeting, including: Miro Cardona statement. Secret. 2 pp. NDU, Taylor Papers, Chairman's Staff Group, March–April 1963.
654	Memorandum from Gordon Chase to McGeorge Bundy, April 17. Rusk's speech before American Society of Newspaper Editors; Miro resignation; support to CRC. Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. VII (D), 4/1–4/20/63.
655	Paper prepared by the CIA, April 17. "Prospects for and Limitations of a Maximum Covert Action Program Against the Castro Communist Regime." Top Secret. 11 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OSD Files: FRC 77–0131, Book I—Special Group.
656	Memorandum from Sherman Kent to McCone, April 19. Comments on proposed new covert policy and program toward Cuba. Secret. 5 pp. CIA Files: Job 91–00741R, Mongoose Papers, Box 1.
657	Memorandum of telephone conversation between McNamara and Ball, April 19. Low-level reconnaissance missions over Cuba. No classification marking. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, Ball Papers, Telephone Conversations, Cuba.
658	Memorandum from Hurwitch to the NSC Standing Group, April 19. Special Report on Cuba for meeting of April 23. Secret. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Standing Group Meeting, 4/23/63 (Part A).

No.	Document Description
659	Annex 3 to printed Document 320, revised April 18. Current Situation: Internal Economic Situation; Internal Political Situation; Soviet Forces in Cuba. Secret. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Standing Group Meeting, 4/23/63 (Part A).
660	Annex 6 to printed Document 320, undated. Economic Restrictions: Shipping; Civil Aviation Trade; Strategic Commodities. Secret. 4 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Standing Group Meeting, 4/23/63 (Part A).
661	Annex 7 to printed Document 320, undated. Exile Problems: The Cuban Revolutionary Council and Dr. Miro Cardona; Alpha 66 and Similar Pin-Pricked Raids; The Cuban Brigade; Resettlement of Cuban Exiles. Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Standing Group Meeting, 4/23/63 (Part A).
662	Tab 7 to printed Document 320, undated. Military Contingency Planning—CINCLANT OPLANS for Cuba. Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Standing Group Meeting, 4/23/63 (Part A).
663	Research memorandum from Hughes to Rusk, April 19. Effects of loss of Cuban sugar on free world sugar market. Limited Official Use. 2 pp. DOS, ARA/CCA Files: Lot 66 D 50, Cuba—Standing Group.
664	Memorandum from FitzGerald to McCone, April 22. Effects of the curtailment of exile hit and run raids. Secret. 3 pp. CIA Files: Job 91-00741R, Mongoose Papers, Box 1.
665	Memorandum from Kent to McCone, April 22. CIA Office of National Estimates study entitled "Cuba a Year Hence." Secret. 17 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Intelligence Material, Vol. V.
666	Memorandum of telephone conversation between Martin and Ball, April 24. President's concern about the Cuban Revolutionary Council. No classification marking. 1 p. Kennedy Library, Ball Papers, Telephone Conversations, Cuba.

No.	Document Description
667	Memorandum from McNamara to the Chairman of the JCS, April 24, enclosing revision of DOD–State paper entitled “U–2 Flights, Cuba—Contingency Plans.” Top Secret. 11 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD/ISA Files: FRC 69 A 0926, Cuba Sensitive 1903, 000.1—.
668	Paper prepared by Joseph Califano, April 25. Covert intelligence collection, hit and run raids, sabotage, and resistance activities. Top Secret. 2 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OSD Files: FRC 77–0131, Sabotage/Destruction.
669	Memorandum from McCone to the Special Group, April 25. Low-level reconnaissance of Cuba. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 April–30 June 1963.
670	Memorandum prepared by McCone, April 25. Cuban Policy: Various aspects of the Cuban problem and discussion at Standing Group. Secret. 12 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, Intelligence Material, Vol. V.
May 1963
671	Memorandum from Helms to McCone, May 1. Interview of U.S. newswoman with Castro indicating possible interest in rapprochement with the United States. Secret. 4 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, Intelligence Material, Vol. V.
672	Memorandum from Cottrell to Martin, May 2. Lisa Howard’s interview with Castro. No classification marking. 1 p. DOS, CF, POL 15–1 CUBA.
673	Memorandum from the Deputy Director of USIA to McGeorge Bundy, May 4, advocating that a high-U.S. Government official make a statement expressing U.S. views of post-Castro Cuba and enclosing proposed statement. Confidential. 6 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Standing Group Meeting, 5/7/63.
674	Paper prepared by the CIA, May 6. “Cuban Supply and Demand of Crude Oil and Refined Petroleum Products.” Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Standing Group Meeting, 5/28/63.

No.	Document Description
675	Paper prepared by the CIA, undated. List of additional covert actions against Cuba. Secret. 7 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Standing Group Meeting, 5/28/63.
676	Memorandum from General Taylor to McNamara, May 10. U.S. courses of action in case of a revolt in Cuba. Top Secret. 3 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OSD Files: FRC 77-0131, Miscellaneous 63-65.
677	Memorandum from U. Alexis Johnson to Brubeck, May 15. U-2 flights, Cuba—contingency plans. Top Secret. 1 p. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438, U-2 Flights, Contingency Plans.
678	Memorandum for the record prepared by McCone, May 15. Review with Rusk about the Castro trip to Moscow. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80-B01285A, Memoranda for the Record.
679	Memorandum from Gordon Chase to McGeorge Bundy, May 24. Lifting of the NOTAM over Cuba and non-resumption of PanAm Flights to Havana. Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Lifting of NOTAM re Cuba, 5/63-6/63.
680	Memorandum from Joseph Califano to Vance, May 27. Meeting of the Interdepartmental Coordinating Committee of Cuban Affairs, which discussed U.S. policy on Cuban exiles in the United States. Secret. 2 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896, Yarmolinsky Files.
681	Memorandum from Bromley Smith to the NSC Standing Group, May 27. Transmits paper entitled "The World Price of Sugar." Secret. 5 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Standing Group, 5/28/63.
682	Memorandum from U. Alexis Johnson to McGeorge Bundy, May 27, enclosing a memorandum entitled "Possible Soviet Initiatives To End U.S. Aerial Reconnaissance Over Cuba." Top Secret. 10 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Standing Group Meeting, 5/28/63.

No.	Document Description
683	Memorandum from Chase to McGeorge Bundy, May 28. U.S. policy toward exile unity and enclosing a May 22 statement by Edwin Martin before a Senate Subcommittee on the same subject. Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, Exiles, 5/63–6/63.
684	Memorandum from Kent to McCone, May 29. Implications of Castro's visit to the Soviet Union. Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, Intelligence Material, Vol. V.
June 1963
685	Memorandum from Helms to McCone, June 5. Reported desire of the Cuban Government for rapprochement with the United States. Secret. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, Intelligence Material, Vol. V.
686	Memorandum from Hurwitch to the Special Group, undated. Support of autonomous anti-Castro groups. Secret. 7 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OSD Files: FRC 330–77–131, Misc. 63, 64, 65.
687	National Intelligence Estimate 85–63, June 14. "Situation and Prospects in Cuba." Secret. 19 pp. CIA Files: Job 79–R01012A, ODDI Registry.
688	Memorandum from the Joint Chiefs of Staff to McNamara, June 15. U.S. courses of action in case of a revolt in Cuba. Top Secret. 3 pp. WNRC, OASD/ISA Files: FRC 69 A 0926, Cuba Sensitive 1963, 38/1–35752/63 15 June 63.
689	Diplomatic note from the Czech Ambassador to Rusk, June 24, transmitting a note of protest from the Cuban Government to the U.S. Government. No classification marking. 4 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. X, 6/24/63 Cuban Protest Note, 6/63–8/63.
690	Memorandum of telephone conversation between Kaysen and Ball, June 24. U–2 reconnaissance missions over Cuba in response to Cuban note of protest. No classification marking. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, Ball Papers, Telephone Conversations, Cuba.

No.	Document Description
691	Memorandum of telephone conversation between McNamara and Ball and U. Alexis Johnson, June 24. U-2 reconnaissance flights over Cuba in response to Cuban note of protest. No classification marking. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, Ball Papers, Telephone Conversations, Cuba.
692	Memorandum of telephone conversation between Kaysen and Ball, June 24. U-2 reconnaissance flights over Cuba. No classification marking. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, Ball Papers, Telephone Conversations, Cuba.
693	Memorandum of telephone conversation between McCone and Ball, June 25. Cuban note of protest. No classification marking. 1 p. Kennedy Library, Ball Papers, Telephone Conversations, Cuba.
694	Memorandum of telephone conversation between Ed Martin and Ball, June 25. Response to the Cuban note of protest. No classification marking. 1 p. Kennedy Library, Ball Papers, Telephone Conversations, Cuba.

July 1963

695	Memorandum from Gordon Chase to McGeorge Bundy, July 2. Recent events in Cuba. Top Secret. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. X, 7/63.
696	Memorandum of conversation between McGeorge Bundy and Ball, July 3. Travel restrictions to Cuba. No classification marking. 1 p. Kennedy Library, Ball Papers, Telephone Conversations, Cuba.
697	Memorandum from Bromley Smith to the NSC Standing Group, July 9. Transmits paper prepared by the Department of Agriculture entitled "Contingent Plan for Increasing World Production of Sugar." Confidential. 10 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. X, 7/63.
698	Memorandum from Chase to McGeorge Bundy, July 12. Progress report on Cuba including reply to Cuban note on overflights; Cuban refugees in Miami; Kennedy doctrine. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. X, 7/63.

No.	Document Description
699	Proposed statement, July 12. U.S. policy toward a post-Castro Cuba. Confidential. 5 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Standing Group Meeting, 7/16/63.
700	Proposed statement by President Kennedy on July 26, undated. U.S. policy toward a post-Castro Cuba. Confidential. 7 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Standing Group Meeting, 7/16/63.
701	Memorandum prepared by McGeorge Bundy, July 16. NSC record of actions at July 16 meeting. Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Meetings and Memoranda Series, Standing Group Meeting, 7/16/63.
702	Memorandum from the Joint Chiefs of Staff to McNamara, July 22. U.S. courses of action in case of a revolt in Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD/ISA Files: FRC 69 A 0926, Cuba Sensitive, 1963, 000.1—.
703	Memorandum from Chase to McGeorge Bundy, July 23, 1963. Cuban protest note; free world shipping to Cuba. Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. X, 7/63.

August 1963

704	Memorandum from General LeMay to McNamara, August 1, with two appendices. U.S. action in event of Cuban attack on U.S. aircraft or ships. Top Secret. 5 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) Files: FRC 71 A 2896, Cuba (Sensitive) 1963, Rules of Engagement.
705	Memorandum from Chase to McGeorge Bundy, August 9. Pending Cuban items: expropriation of American Embassy in Havana; reply to Cuban note on overflights; American students in Cuba; the Cuban amendment; contingency planning for further Cuban immigration. Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. XI (A), 8/63.
706	Memorandum from Hurwitch to the Special Group, August 12. 3 pages of source text not declassified. Secret. WNRC, OSD Files: FRC 77 A 131, Book II—Special Group.

No.	Document Description
-----	----------------------

September 1963

- | | |
|-----|--|
| 707 | Memorandum from Chase to McGeorge Bundy, September 1963. Exile raids—extent of knowledge within the Executive branch. Top Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, Exiles, 7/63–9/63. |
| 708 | Memorandum from McGeorge Bundy to McCone, September 17. 4 pages of source text not declassified. Secret. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, Exiles, 7/63–9/63. |
| 709 | Memorandum from Chase to McGeorge Bundy, September 19. Cuba and the IMF. Confidential. 1 p. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Series, Cuba, General, Vol. XI (B), 9/63. |
| 710 | Memorandum from McCone to the Chairman of COMOR, September 27. High-level photographic coverage of Cuba. Secret. 1 p. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896, Cuba 381, May thru Dec. 1963. |

October 1963

- | | |
|-----|---|
| 711 | Memorandum from Colonel Haig to Vance, October 2. Meeting of the NSC Standing Group: the situation in Cuba. Top Secret. 3 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OSD Files: FRC 330–77–131, Misc. 63, 64, 65. |
| 712 | Memorandum from Chase to McGeorge Bundy, October 4. Highlights of Chase's visit to Guantanamo Base October 1–2. Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Cuba, Guantanamo Base, 8/16/63–10/4/63. |
| 713 | Memorandum from Cottrell to the Special Group, October 21. Reappraisal of previous proposals for support of autonomous anti-Castro groups. Secret. 3 pp. WNRC, OSD Files: FRC 330–77–131, Misc. 63, 64, 65. |
| 714 | Memorandum from the Joint Chiefs of Staff to McNamara, October 21. Draft State–Defense contingency plan for a coup in Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD/ISA Files: FRC 69 A 0926, Cuba Sensitive 1963, 000.1—. |

- | No. | Document Description |
|------------|---|
| 715 | Memorandum from Cottrell to the Special Group, October 21. Proposal for air strikes against Cuban targets. Secret. 5 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OSD Files: FRC 77–0131, Sabatoge/Destruction. |
| 716 | Memorandum from General Carroll to McNamara, October 24. Transmits a DIA–CIA assessment of status of Soviet military personnel in Cuba. Secret. 3 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896, Cuba 381, May thru Dec. 1963. |
| 717 | Memorandum from J. Larocque to the Deputy Secretary of Defense, October 25. Transmits information report on interview with Fidel Castro. Secret. 3 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) A Files; FRC 71 A 2896, Cuba 381, May thru Dec. 1963. |

November 1963

- | | |
|-----|--|
| 718 | Memorandum for the record, November 14. Minutes of the meeting to review the Cuban program. Secret. 7 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, DCI Meetings with the President, 1 July–30 November 1963. |
| 719 | Special National Intelligence Estimate 85–3–63, November 15. “The Effects of Hurricane Flora on Cuba.” Secret. 3 pp. CIA Files: Job 79–R01012A, ODDI Registry. |
| 720 | Memorandum from U. Alexis Johnson to Rusk, November 29. Cuban contingency planning. Top Secret. 2 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438, Cuba, Contingency Planning. |

December 1963

- | | |
|-----|--|
| 721 | Memorandum from Edwin M. Martin to Rusk, December 2. Transmits talking points for Rusk’s December 2 meeting with President Johnson on Cuba. Top Secret. 9 pp. DOS, S/S Files; Lot 66 D 501, Cuba. |
| 722 | Memorandum from Chase to McGeorge Bundy, December 2. Attendance at the meeting with President Johnson scheduled that day. Top Secret. 1 p. Johnson Library, NSF, Country File, Cuba, Meetings, 12/63–3/65. |

No.	Document Description
723	Memorandum, December 9. Suggestion for additional administration statements on Cuba to stimulate anti-Castro action on the part of dissident elements in the Cuban Armed Forces. Secret. 3 pp. Johnson Library, NSF, Country File, Cuba, Intelligence, Vol. 2.
724	Memorandum from Rusk to President Johnson, December 11. Amendment of NSAM 220 governing foreign flag shipping in the Cuba trade. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Countries Files, Meetings and Memoranda Series, NSAM 220.
725	Memorandum prepared in the CIA, December 12. Current U.S. policy with respect to Cuba. Secret. 8 pp. Johnson Library, NSF, Country File, Cuba Meetings, 12/63–3/65.
726	Memorandum from Chase to McGeorge Bundy, December 12. Possible courses of action in controlling arms shipments between Cuba and Latin America. Secret. 2 pp. Johnson Library, NSF, Country File, Vol. A (Gordon Chase File), 11/63–5/64.
727	Memorandum from Read to McGeorge Bundy, December 12. Transmits paper entitled “Possible Further Unilateral and Bilateral Actions to Increase Pressure on Cuba (Short of the Use of Force)” for discussion at the NSC Standing Group meeting December 13. Top Secret. 11 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438, U–2 Flights—Contingency Plans.
728	Special report prepared by the CIA, December 13. “Fidel Castro’s Growing Military Power.” Secret. 10 pp. Kennedy Library, Schlesinger Papers, Cuba, White Label.
729	Memorandum from McGeorge Bundy to President Johnson, December 15. Discussion of further possible measures the U.S. can take against Castro that stop short of invasion and blockade in preparation for the President’s meeting with State, Defense, and CIA officials December 19. Top Secret. 23 pp. Johnson Library, NSF, Country File, Cuba, Meetings, 12/63–3/65.

No.	Document Description
730	Memorandum from McGeorge Bundy to holders of NSAM 220, December 16. Amendment to NSAM 220 relating to U.S. Government shipments by foreign-flag vessels in the Cuban trade. No classification marking. 1 p. Johnson Library, NSF, Country File, Cuba, Meetings 12/63–3/65.
731	Briefing notes prepared for the Deputy Director of Central Intelligence, December 18. "The Situation in Cuba." Top Secret. 2 pp. DOS, S/S Files: Lot 65 D 438, Cuba Meeting—12/19/63.
732	Special National Intelligence Estimate No. 85–4–63, December 18. "Soviet Transfer of the Surface to Air Missile System to Cuba." Top Secret. 2 pp. CIA Files: Job 79–R01012A, ODDI Registry.
733	Memorandum for the record prepared by General Carter, December 19. Transmits FitzGerald's memorandum for the record of a meeting with President Johnson on Cuba on December 19. Secret. 5 pp. CIA Files: Job 80–B01285A, DCI Meetings with the President, 23 November–31 December 1963.
734	Memorandum from General Carroll to McNamara, December 20. Transmits a DIA/CIA assessment of the status of Soviet military personnel in Cuba. Secret. 2 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD (C) A Files: FRC 71 A 2896, Cuba 381, May thru Dec. 1963.

American Republics

Bolivia

1. Telegram 430 from La Paz, February 9¹

La Paz, February 9, 1961

Priority.

Re Department's A-62.

Notes to be exchanged 6 p.m. today. FONMIN issuing following communiqué for morning papers.

"Governments of Republic of Bolivia and USA today entered into an agreement whereby US will provide GOB with military equipment, materials, services and other assistance valued at $1,000,000 for its armed forces. This assistance is for purpose improving capacity armed forces maintain internal security and assist in economic development of Bolivia through such activities as construction roads and maintenance communications and river transportation.

Agreement was effected by exchange notes between their Excellencies, The Minister of Foreign Affairs and Worship of Republic of Bolivia and the Ambassador of USA."

Strom

¹ Transmits text of Bolivian communiqué on U.S.-Bolivian agreement on U.S. military assistance for Bolivian economic development and internal security. Unclassified. 1 p. DOS, CF, 611.247/2-961.

2. Memorandum from Schlesinger to Kennedy, March 3¹

March 3, 1961

SUBJECT

The Crisis in Bolivia

Bolivia has, of course, been in a chronic state of mild crisis since at least 1943. There is reason to believe now, however, that it may be today on the brink of a serious political convulsion, and that the convulsion may lead to a Communist take-over. Because crisis is endemic in Bolivia and because Cuba, Brazil and Venezuela have been obvious claimants for priority attention, the Bolivian situation has probably not received full consideration in Washington. Ambassador Strom requested on February 24 that he be recalled to Washington for consultation. I agree with Ambassador Strom that a top-level review of our Bolivian policy is imperative.

I. Why the Crisis?

The immediate crisis is posed by the fact that the government apparently does not have the ready cash to meet the March 1 payrolls in the railroads and mines. If the workers are not paid, they will very likely go on strike, thereby paralyzing the economy. The government will be greatly tempted to turn to the printing-presses in order to meet its wage bills. This will mean a resumption of inflation. At the same time, the physical stock of the railroads has been deteriorating for some time; so that even without a strike, the railroad system is on the verge of collapse. The breakdown of the railroads would aggravate the inflation by leading to hoarding and speculation in foodstuffs. A further incentive toward inflation is the desire to relieve the heavy burden of internal debt. As troubles multiply, President Paz Estenssoro would probably resign, turning the government over to his Vice President, the left-wing opportunist Juan Lechin. With Lechin in control, Bolivia might well go the way of Cuba.

The long-term crisis is caused by (a) Bolivia's continuing economic stagnation and (b) the rise of Communist activity in the last two years and the penetration of the formerly anti-Communist governing party, the MNR, by Communists and fellow-travelers.

¹ The crisis in Bolivia. No classification marking. 7 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Regional Security Series, Latin America.

II. What should the United States do?

1. We can't pull out of Bolivia. I understand that there is some low-level State Department sentiment in favor of handing the Bolivian mess over to Lechin and the USSR. It is said that the Bolivians have become so confident that we will bail them out whatever they do that they will never take the necessary measures for their own salvation. It is further contended that no underdeveloped country will ever take us seriously unless sometime, somewhere, we let a government go when it declines to follow our advice.

The objections to such a policy seem to me overwhelming. Letting nations go Communist in order to punish them may not necessarily work out as we expect. After Cuba, we simply cannot let another Latin American nation go Communist; if we should do so, the game would be up through a good deal of Latin America. Moreover, Bolivia, as a Communist enclave in the center of the continent, would be a base for subversion and revolution in Peru, Ecuador, Brazil, Chile and Paraguay. And the relinquishment of Bolivia to the Communists would of course lead to political clamor in the United States; one can already imagine the speeches in Congress on the theme "Who lost Bolivia?"

2. We can't take over Bolivia. Bolivia is in a proud and nationalistic mood. Any attempt on the part of American officials to run the Bolivian government—even to the limited extent to which, say, we ran the Greek government in 1946–50—would probably encounter widespread hostility and stir anti-US feeling not only in Bolivia but through the continent.

3. The present government is not a reliable instrument of pro-democratic policy. President Paz Estenssoro in his private conversations with the Ambassador and myself has taken a strong anti-Communist line. This line is consistent with his past record and with that of the MNR party. The MNR and the Communists have been traditional enemies; the Communists played a leading role in the agitation which led in 1946 to the overthrow and hanging of the first MNR President Villaroel. However, Paz has cut himself off (or allowed himself to be cut off) from the MNR moderates. He appears to have lost the energy and authority he displayed in his first term as President (1952–56). When he returned to office in 1960, he had the personal strength to consolidate a political base of his own, which might even have included previously anti-MNR groups. But he has allowed his potential strength to crumble away. Today he seems to be an unhappy prisoner of the MNR left wing and the left-wing trade unions. The political and economic measures which we consider necessary to save Bolivia would be resisted by these groups; and though Paz agrees intellectually with many of the proposed measures, he seems unwilling to back them publicly or practically. As for the MNR itself, it has changed from an idealistic national movement into a tough and often brutal political machine.

4. No more reliable instrument is in sight. The only alternative to Paz is Lechin, a personable demagogue of Trotskyite background whose political tactic has always consisted of being farther to the left than anyone else. Lechin is not a Communist; no Communist would have visited Formosa, as Lechin recently did, and made complimentary remarks about Chiang Kai-shek. But he is a skilled anti-US agitator; his political base is on the extreme left; and he would put up less resistance than Paz to the Soviet embrace. As for the opposition to Paz on the right, it is demoralized and fragmented.

5. All choices are thus unappetizing. Yet the critical fact remains that the loss of Bolivia would be a catastrophe, and that the future of Bolivia may well determine whether the other Andean nations adopt the path of non-Communist or Communist revolution. The best hope, it seems to me, is for the US to attempt to create the conditions which would drive Paz to take an anti-Communist line and at the same time give him some confidence that an anti-Communist line would be successful. The key to this, I believe, lies in attempting what we have not thus far attempted in Bolivia—a serious effort at economic development—and combining this with a shrewd and tough politico-diplomatic offensive.

III. Past US policy in Bolivia

During the fifties, the US gave more grant aid to Bolivia than to any other Latin American country—about $150 million (plus another $30 million of credits). However, this aid has not produced a great deal in the way of economic stimulus or even of visible result. A good deal of it—around $18 million a year—has had to go for direct budgetary support—that is, for paying the running expenses of the Bolivian government. The total Bolivian budget is about $35 million per annum (in other words, less than that of the University of California or of a good-sized American city); and of this the US in recent years has been paying about one-third.

One reason why US aid to Bolivia has produced so little economic development is because the State Department in the fifties was under the spell of the International Monetary Fund and accepted its view that stable prices were more important than economic growth. No doubt the ruinous Bolivian inflation of 1953–56 had to be stopped. But deflation is not necessarily the sovereign tonic for economic development. If the IMF had controlled US economic policy in the 19th century, our economic growth would have been materially slowed down. Brazil, fortunately from the viewpoint of its economic growth, was able to defy IMF pressure for deflation in those years. Bolivia was too weak and too ignorant to do so. The result was a policy—insisted upon by the US as well as by the IMF—which stopped both inflation and growth. As Assistant Secretary of State Rubottom told the House Foreign Affairs Committee, "We had to tell the Bolivian Government that they couldn't put their money into it (the development program) and we weren't going to put ours into it."²

Because of this decision to pursue stabilization at the expense of development (and also because of the decline in her own tin production and in world tin prices), Bolivia has remained in a condition of economic stagnation. Its economic base is entirely inadequate, not only for the structure of social welfare erected by the Revolution, but even for tolerable living. Just before my visit, Paz responded to a teachers' strike by declaring a state of siege. I inquired what teachers were being paid. The pay per month of school teachers in Bolivia, depending on their category, ranges from $21.20 to $33.28—out of which they have not only to feed and clothe their families but even buy textbooks.

During these years, in other words, American assistance to Bolivia has been mainly consumed in keeping the drowning government's head above water without enabling it to make much progress toward the shore. As President Siles, who faithfully carried out the stabilization program in 1956–60, put it, "The United States has given me just enough rope to hang myself." To this day, the Bolivian government does not have a comprehensive plan for economic development.

However, a Planning Commission has been established; and, in collaboration with the Economic Commission for Latin America (ECLA—headed by Raul Prebisch, the most eminent Latin American economist), it is preparing a general development plan. I understand that the first draft will be ready in April and that they hope to have a final version by July.

This plan could provide what has been lacking for so long—a framework of action in which the US, instead of dribbling away its aid in meeting the daily expenses of government, could begin to contribute to economic growth. This plan seems to me the key to our future policy. If the proposed plan is not adequate, we should try to help the Bolivians draft a workable plan. If the plan is adequate, then we should back it—and we should back it generously enough to do the job.

The situation is further complicated by the fact that the USSR has offered Bolivia credits up to $150 million for development projects. For years, for example, Bolivians have wanted a tin smelter. Such a tin smelter would be uneconomic for a number of reasons, but it would satisfy national pride, and the USSR is ready to provide one.

Paz told me that he would turn down the Soviet proposal if there were political strings attached, but that he could not do so if it came without political conditions. If the Soviet loan should go through, then the USSR will get credit for a series of visible economic monuments, while we have gotten very little credit for our invisible support of the Bolivian budget.

² House Foreign Affairs Committee, Mutual Security Act of 1960: Hearings, 86 Cong., 2 Sess., p. 847.

IV. Recommendations

1. We should send to La Paz as quickly as possible a top US development economist to vet the Bolivian plan and forecast the relations between US aid and the Bolivian economy for the duration of the plan. Someone like Edward S. Mason or Lincoln Gordon of Harvard, or someone on Al Wolf's Ford Foundation staff, should be asked to undertake this job. The result should be a realistic plan which would give some hope of ending the present state of stagnation.

2. We should be prepared to back the plan sufficiently to make it work. If in 1952 we had decided to invest $150 million in Bolivian development instead of using the same amount of money over the next eight years to keep Bolivia on the dole, the Bolivian situation would undoubtedly be much more manageable today. The sums required for Bolivian development are not great, especially when compared to the amounts we have poured into Asian countries less immediately essential to our security. Probably $125–150 million would be sufficient to do the job of modernizing the mines and railroads, improving the transport system, and inducing a migration of peasants from the high plain to the more fertile lowlands.

3. The plan should be designed so that our assistance would be tied to performance in various sectors. Of course this raises the old question: Suppose they fail to perform, do we pull out? The only answer to this is a major political and diplomatic effort to make sure they perform. What we really require is a combined politico-economic plan, with explicit economic conditions and implicit political conditions, reinforced by a stern and resourceful diplomatic determination to see that our conditions are met. The success of such a plan obviously requires an adroit and aggressive Ambassador.

I understand that Ben Stephansky is scheduled for the assignment. From everything I hear, Stephansky sounds excellent. As a liberal opponent of Communists and fellow-travelers, Stephansky could talk to Paz in Paz's own language and help serve him to bolder action. At the same time Latin American political leaders with whom Paz has had fraternal relations—like Betancourt of Venezuela and Haya de la Torre of Peru—should also be encouraged to persuade him to take stronger positions.

(I might add a word about our present Ambassador, Dr. Carl Strom. He is 61 years old and, as befits a former Professor of Mathematics, his manner is old-fashioned and academic. However, this is deceptive.

He is shrewd, canny and subtle; and the fact that he has served successfully in Korea, Cambodia and Bolivia shows the confidence the State Department has had in him. I would hope that he might be transferred to a more tranquil post.)

4. We should negotiate a military assistance agreement with the Bolivian Army. In the main, such agreements seem to me bad in Latin America; but in this particular case an agreement would strengthen the government against the possibility of a revolt by the armed miners. I believe it would help Paz to recover his freedom of action.

5. Much of the success of this operation would depend on skilled and tactful technical assistance on the local level. Bolivia might well be a place where the Peace Corps could make an important and early contribution (assuming careful screening and training of the young people sent to Bolivia).

6. Above all, the US Government must confront the problem of Bolivia and, if it decides (as it must) that Bolivia must be saved, think through with care and precision the requirements of salvation.

Arthur Schlesinger, jr.

3. Memorandum from General Lemnitzer to McNamara, JCSM-236-61, April 13¹

April 13, 1961

SUBJECT

Bolivian Request for a Bilateral Agreement (U)

1. In a memorandum for the Director, Joint Staff, 1-10328/60, of 16 December 1960, the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense (ISA), forwarded a proposal of the Government of Bolivia for a Permanent Military Assistance Agreement and requested recommendations on the feasibility and advisability of the United States entering into such an agreement.

2. Military assistance for internal security is presently being furnished Bolivia as a result of a Presidential determination. Under the present law, this determination must be made annually.

¹ Bolivian request for a bilateral agreement. Secret. 3 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD/ISA Files: FRC 64 A 2382, Bolivia, 1961, 000.1.

3. Bolivia is a land-locked republic of about three million people. The country is one of the most highly mineralized areas of the world and its economy is based on mining. However, it is an exceedingly poor country, having one of the lowest standards of living in Latin America. The strength of the Bolivian ground forces is 16,400 men, including a standing army of 11,500 men and Carabineros of 4,900 men, according to latest intelligence information.

4. US Ambassador Strom, in May 1960, indicated that the Bolivian Armed Forces have demonstrated a capacity to contribute to the economic and social welfare of the country. In reply to a query, CINCARIB expressed the opinion that the United States can depend on pro-US orientation of the Bolivian Armed Forces and that the present Bolivian administration can administer a military assistance agreement.

5. Recent events in Cuba have made abundantly clear the necessity for the United States to assist friendly Latin American countries in preserving their internal security. In many countries, the only thing which prevents a rapid takeover by the communists is the military. It is, therefore, in the national interest of the United States to support and, when necessary, fund programs connected with civic action and the maintenance of internal security.

6. Authority for the Civic Action Program is provided in Section 105 b (5) of the Mutual Security Act of 1954, as amended. Commanders of unified commands and selected US Diplomatic Missions have been advised of the current Civic Action Program in a joint State-Defense-ICA message. The Joint Chiefs of Staff recently indicated their support of these programs in JCSM-110-61, dated 28 February 1961.

7. In view of the foregoing, the Joint Chiefs of Staff conclude that.

a. Because of the geography, military potential of the country, and the economic situation, Bolivia cannot make a meaningful external military contribution to the common defense of the Western Hemisphere. Bolivia's contribution to hemispheric defense generally is limited to internal security and the defense of its national boundaries. A permanent bilateral military assistance agreement which would envisage the commitment of Bolivian forces outside of Bolivia is, therefore, not advisable.

b. It is advisable for the United States to participate in an agreement with the Government of Bolivia which would contain provisions for military assistance to facilitate the maintenance of internal security and in furtherance of civic action programs.

c. Policy and authority exist to permit assistance in the furtherance of a civic action program in Bolivia.

d. It is legal to enter into a Permanent Military Assistance Agreement with Bolivia; however, funding for internal security is subject to annual Presidential determination.

8. The Joint Chiefs of Staff recommend that.

a. Bilateral negotiations should be undertaken immediately with the Government of Bolivia on a Military Assistance Agreement to cover internal security and civic action programs.

b. Until authority is granted to provide military assistance to Bolivia for internal security other than by Presidential determination, such assistance be continued by annual Presidential determination.

For the Joint Chiefs of Staff:

L.L. Lemnitzer
Chairman
Joint Chiefs of Staff

4. Memorandum from Hilsman (INR) to Woodward (ARA), July 18¹

July 18, 1961

SUBJECT

Latin American Concern for Bolivia: An Opportunity for the US

The Bolivian regime of Paz Estenssoro is kept in power by US assistance. Even with a more generous level of aid promised under a new development program, there is no assurance the regime can survive. Most likely replacements are a Castro-type regime or an Army dictatorship that might give way to extreme leftists. US concern that order be maintained in the country is shared by the governments of Bolivia's neighbors, especially Argentina and Brazil. The concern of these governments points to the possibility that they might be brought to cooperate in shoring up the Paz regime and that they might strengthen the prospects for stabilizing and developing the Bolivian society by their participation in the aid programs.

The Paz Estenssoro regime is so weak that it almost certainly will be unable to carry out a redevelopment of the Bolivian economy. The government's lack of authority, and widespread social unrest expose the Paz regime to extremist pressures supported by the promise of Soviet aid. The achievement of hoped-for economic viability and social order awaits a generation of training, discipline, and investment to bring the illiterate and unskilled population into the modern world. Meanwhile, the planned level of US aid may be sufficient to keep Paz in power, but even this is uncertain unless moderate forces can be strengthened and the extremists' hope of Soviet support discouraged.

¹ Latin American and U.S. concern for Bolivian stability and security. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 724.00/7-2461.

The United States has gradually come to assume almost sole responsibility for Bolivia in recent years. The country is, however, also of direct concern to the neighboring governments of Argentina, Brazil, Chile, and Peru. Some of these governments may take a philosophic view of Soviet domination of the regime in Cuba, but all are undoubtedly opposed to establishment of a Castro-type regime in Bolivia.

The neighboring governments have in recent weeks voiced their concern over the rapidly deteriorating political and economic situation in Bolivia, following renewed crises in that country. During a visit to Bolivia in late May, Argentine President Frondizi expressed to President Paz his concern over extremist inroads, agreed to provide food supplies on credit to Bolivian tin mine commissaries, and discussed prospects for expansion of trade and transportation between the two countries. During June both Brazilian President Quadros and Peruvian Prime Minister Beltran expressed to Ambassador Stevenson their strong concern over the Bolivian situation.

In view of the weakness of government authority in Bolivia and the desire of the neighboring governments to prevent an extremist takeover with Soviet support, these governments may well be open to becoming more involved in Bolivian affairs. They may be receptive to US efforts to seek their assistance in preventive measures to strengthen the Paz regime and the moderate forces in Bolivia.

Building upon the evidences of their concern, the US could seek the active cooperation of Bolivia's neighbors beginning with the negotiations connected with the IA-ECOSOC conference scheduled to be held on August 5. This cooperation could occur within the framework of a program for economic operations on a number of fronts, and would doubtless have to be accompanied by assurances of US willingness to back selected projects either directly or indirectly. The various neighbors might participate in a program with elements like these:

- 1) Argentina: development of Bolivian highways, railroads, petroleum resources; supply of food in substitution of existing US supplies;
- 2) Brazil: development of railroads and petroleum resources; agricultural promotion;
- 3) Peru: railroad and hydroelectric development; intensive social stabilization measures in the Puno area adjacent to the Altiplano;
- 4) Chile: promotion of Bolivian industrial development.

The question of Bolivia's integration into the proposed Latin American Free Trade Area (LAFTA) could also be considered, as well as a program for technical aid from leading industrial countries in Latin America.

The recent US sponsored multilateral arrangement with West Germany and the Inter-American Bank to aid the Bolivian tin mining industry and the recent US-British talks concerning aid to the Bolivian railroads enhance the opportunity for South American participation. Aside from their interest in Bolivia as a regional problem, the South American governments, especially those of Argentina and Brazil, would welcome the prestige of association with an international consortium including the Western European states. Certainly, should one of these governments move to join in the effort to stabilize and reorganize Bolivia, the others would hasten to assert their position by taking an active part in the operation.

The immediate effect to be expected through the cooperation of neighboring governments in economic aid to Bolivia would be public and concrete evidence that these leading South American governments intend to stand by the Paz regime. This affirmation of support through plans for economic aid would encourage moderate forces in Bolivia and throw a block in the way of groups agitating for a Castro-type solution. Over the long run, it might be hoped that aid from neighboring countries, especially Argentina and Brazil, would serve to develop the southern and eastern regions of Bolivia and to integrate Bolivia into the South American economy.

5. Memorandum of conversation, July 21 between Rusk and Bolivian Ambassador Andrade¹

July 21, 1961

SUBJECT

Bolivian Government's Request for $11 million Emergency economic Assistance

PARTICIPANTS

The Secretary
Ambassador Victor Andrade
WST/B—Robert W. Weise, Jr.

Ambassador Andrade said he did not wish to take much of the Secretary's time and that the principal purpose of his visit was: 1) to inquire about the status of the GOB's memorandum handed Adlai Stevenson, and 2) to acquaint the Secretary with the urgency of the Bolivian situation. He described briefly how the Bolivian revolution had been conceived, inspired and executed; that it was an independent Revolution; that it was the desire of President Paz to maintain the independence of this movement, free from Communist domination; how communist-inspired and pro-Castro elements were endeavoring to gain control of the Government and had in fact made substantial inroads into the labor movement to now alarming proportions; and finally how the Bolivian Government on June 7, 1961 undertook decisive steps to round up and arrest the principal Communist labor leaders of the country—some thirty-five in all—through a declaration of a "state of siege". This action, Ambassador Andrade said, involved grave risks for the Bolivian Government, since it already was confronting a serious economic crisis in which it was, in part at least, dependent upon financial assistance from the United States.

During the visit of Adlai Stevenson to La Paz on July 16, 1961, Ambassador Stevenson was handed a memorandum from the Bolivian Government in which the latter made application for an emergency loan of eleven million dollars to cover Bolivia's critical needs pending the re-establishment of social peace and the stabilization of the tin industry under the so-called "triangular operation" in which the USG, the Federal Republic of Germany and the Inter-American Development Bank will participate. Ambassador Andrade said his Government was very much concerned as to what consideration was being given to this memorandum of the GOB, since the "state of siege" would end in fifty days and the Bolivian Government would have to determine what steps it would take next in meeting the immediate social and political crisis.

¹ Bolivian Government request for $11 million emergency economic assistance. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 330.

The Secretary informed Ambassador Andrade that careful and serious consideration was being given to the GOB memorandum; that although the USG was prohibited under the mutual security legislation from financing the internal debts of any country, we were studying ways in which the US could assist Bolivia in meeting its present crisis in areas where our assistance would contribute to economic progress and long-range development.

6. Memorandum of conversation, October 18 among Rusk, Andrade, and Fitzgerald (ICA)¹

October 18, 1961

SUBJECT

Bolivia's Request for Emergency Assistance

PARTICIPANTS

The Secretary
Ambassador Andrade
Dr. Fitzgerald—ICA
Mr. Turnage—ARA/REA
Mr. Weise—ARA/WST

The Ambassador opened the discussion saying that during his visit to La Paz last September he had been asked by President Paz to see the Secretary of State and to convey to him the urgency of the Bolivia situation. The Ambassador referred to the visit of the Thorp Mission to Bolivia last March and to the Bolivian Government's request for an emergency loan of $11 million submitted to Ambassador Stevenson during his visit to Bolivia last June. He said that the United States Government had responded to these requests by authorizing loans of $2.6 million to COMIBOL for working capital, $10 million to YPF for equipment ($4 million of which is contingent upon the increase in local gasoline prices), and $2 million for the rehabilitation of the Bolivian railways (subject to the GOB arriving at a satisfactory arrangement with the former British management).

¹ Bolivian request for emergency assistance. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 330.

The Ambassador said that the future outlook for Bolivia was good and that with the increase in world tin prices, the prospect for an upswing in mineral exports, the expansion of domestic agricultural production now being realized, and the encouraging reports of Gulf Oil Company on Bolivia's petroleum reserves, it now appeared that Bolivia was on the verge of economic recovery.

Despite these encouraging signs, the country's internal financial situation was still desperate, and given the extreme political pressures to which President Paz is being subjected from the extreme left and Communist elements, it is most important that the Bolivian Government be able to buy time to prevent imminent collapse. The Ambassador said President Paz wished the Secretary to have this background against which to assess the urgency of the requests set forth in the President's two letters to President Kennedy.

The Secretary then asked the Ambassador what the prospects were for bringing order into the Bolivian labor movement. The Ambassador replied that considerable progress had been made. He said that the Bolivian Revolution of 1952 had brought about drastic changes in the social order and that organized labor in Bolivia had taken advantage of its newly gained position of power by demanding a voice in and veto over the decisions of management. The Government of President Paz, the Ambassador said, has been trying to operate in a democratic framework and to be responsive to democratic procedures without compromising the social democratic structures and processes. He said that labor procedures are being changed and that the situation is improving, but that all abuses could not be corrected overnight. The Ambassador cited as an example the current chauffeurs and teamsters strike in which labor demanded that it continue to have the right to name the municipal and national Director General of the Bolivian traffic police and violently opposed the Government's proposal to incorporate the Traffic Police into the National Police Organization (Carabineros). Andrade claimed that the Government had now won the first round in this fight and that the GOB would hereafter name the directors of traffic police.

The Secretary then said that the Department had received President Paz's two recent letters to President Kennedy, one of October 4, 1961 setting forth an emergency development program, and one of October 6, 1961 requesting an emergency credit. The Secretary said that these two letters were being carefully studied by the appropriate offices in the U.S. Government concerned with economic aid, that it was expected that some conclusions would be reached quickly. The Department of State, the Secretary said, would see that these matters are expedited.

The Secretary then asked Dr. Fitzgerald when it might be expected that an answer could be given to President Paz, to which Dr. Fitzgerald replied that he thought it would be possible to get some initial reaction within two weeks on major parts of the program. Ambassador Andrade said there already had been long delays in getting action on the promised assistance. In the case of the Bolivian railways there was an urgent need for interim financing. The GOB was trying to get the IBRD to undertake a study of the Bolivian transportation systems with a view toward obtaining long-term financing from IDA for rehabilitation of the Bolivian railways. In the meantime the GOB was negotiating with the private British management to resume operation of the railways for an interim period of two years. Dr. Fitzgerald responded by saying that the U.S. Government was awaiting a reply from the Bolivian Government as to steps being taken to fulfill conditions requisite for U.S. assistance to the railways.

The Secretary thanked Ambassador Andrade for his visit, assured him that prompt consideration would be given to President Paz's letters and that President Kennedy would respond as soon as he had had an opportunity to study the new proposals.

7. Memorandum from Hamilton (ICA) to Dungan, June 28¹

June 28, 1962

SUBJECT

U.S. Assistance Commitment to Bolivia

The President's approval of the attached memorandum is requested. It represents a joint commitment on the part of the United States Government and the Inter-American Development Bank to undertake an immediate program of development assistance for Bolivia. This proposed commitment is an outgrowth of the recent report of the OAS Wise Men entitled "Measures Designed to Speed Economic Development in Bolivia Under the Alliance for Progress". The external financial assistance proposed, although somewhat less than that recommended by the Wise Men, is consistent with their recommendations.

The Wise Men conclude that while Bolivia currently lacks an adequate development plan, the urgent political and economic problems of Bolivia require an immediate program of positive and helpful action. In response to the Wise Men's recommendations, the Bolivians have requested the Inter-American Development Bank to organize a consortium to provide the needed external financial assistance. The attached memorandum summarizes the negotiations and discussions with the Bolivian Ministers of Economy and Rural Affairs currently in Washington for this purpose, the Inter-American Development Bank and ourselves. As indicated in paragraph 4 of the attached memorandum, the Bolivian Government has accepted the self-help measures recommended by the Wise Men. Their intentions in carrying out the self-help measures are contained in a confidential letter which is attached, and will be made conditions of our assistance.

¹ Transmits for Kennedy's approval a joint U.S.-IADB program of development assistance for Bolivia. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Brubeck Series, Box 32.

Economic development and growth will enable the Bolivian government to fulfill the promise of its 1952 Revolution which brought to power a political movement with broad support among the workers and peasants. The landed and feudal oligarchy was divested of power, land was distributed to the peasants, large estates eliminated, universal suffrage introduced, the army subordinated to the government, and the extreme contrast between wealth and poverty eliminated. Bolivia's social reforms are far in advance of those of most Latin American countries although the people have yet to experience any significant economic advantage from those changes.

Despite prior U.S. aid of some $220 million, Bolivia has suffered economic stagnation since its revolution in 1952. The main reason why American aid has not shown a more favorable impact on the economy is that it was largely offset by the deficits of the central government and its state-owned enterprises. These deficits were partly the result of certain outside factors such as the large decline in mineral prices and export earnings following the end of the Korean war and the steady increase in the cost of imported equipment and materials. But these deficits were also the result of mismanagement by the Government as reflected in the retention of large numbers of workers in excess of production needs and the refusal of the Government to raise the prices of goods and services as in the cases of the state-owned petroleum entity, the state airline and the state railroads to cover rising costs.

The deficits that resulted were directly or indirectly covered by American aid and there was little left for new investment and development. Similarly, in the private sector the denial to employers of the right to fire excess employees created a climate which discouraged investment either foreign or domestic. Consequently American aid to date has been barely sufficient to keep the Bolivian economy from collapsing.

The approach proposed in the attached memorandum is aimed at overcoming these defects by continuing and expanding the attack started last year on some of these basic causes of economic stagnation. It is a concentrated effort to move away from primarily providing budget support for a stagnant economy to a dynamic development program. The key to this approach is the loan provided for studies which will lead to feasible and loanable economic development projects.

While certain aspects of the U.S. assistance commitment are yet to be determined, for example, the level of budget support in fiscal year 1963, the total U.S. commitment is estimated at $78 million. Of this sum, approximately $37 million will be spent for direct procurement in the United States. The balance of $41 million will be used for the purchase of Bolivian currency for local expenses. These dollars will be placed in a segregated account and used solely for the import of essential commodities from the United States. It is estimated that this $78 million will be disbursed over a period of approximately two and one-half years. An IDB commitment of $21.4 million of which $10 million is from the Social Progress Trust Fund is made for same period.

The announcement of a specific dollar commitment for development loans is a political and psychological necessity. Special Presidential missions by Messrs. Thorp and Egger, President Kennedy's letter to President Paz of May, 1961 (copy attached), together with the Wise Men's recommendations for commitments of $109 million have heightened Bolivian expectations of receiving substantial assistance from the United States. This is further complicated by June 4th La Paz press announcements of a new U.S. assistance commitment of $80 million. The frustration of these expectations by the lack of a specific U.S. dollar commitment would surely be interpreted by the Bolivians as a disavowal of previously expressed intentions. The specific commitment for development loans is tied to projects found feasible which provides safeguards for U.S. loan funds.

The political implications of not going forward with the proposed program would be serious indeed. The Bolivian situation continues to be extremely precarious. President Paz is under intense pressure from the Communists and the extreme left within and outside his MNR party to accept Bloc aid offers. His Government's declining popular acceptance was demonstrated in the June 3rd congressional elections. In the circumstances President Paz and his ministers have suffered acute disappointment that the Alliance has not proved to be the rapid panacea they anticipated. The present mission to Washington of the Ministers who have negotiated the Joint AID-IDB Agreement was announced as intended to establish "whether the Alliance is fact or fiction". The Ministers' return empty-handed to Bolivia would be exploited by the Communists to claim the Alliance is long on words but short on deeds. Similar charges would probably be made by Paz' own Ministers. This would not only be a severe political blow to Paz which would make his efforts to work with us more difficult but could undermine his confidence in President Kennedy's May 14, 1961, pledge to support Bolivia's long-range development.

The Bolivian Ministers have been in Washington since early May and hope to return to Bolivia on Friday. For this reason I hope this matter can be brought to the President's attention today. Before any public announcement of this commitment is made, I will inform the appropriate Congressional committees.

Fowler Hamilton

Attachments:

1. Draft letter from Ministers of Economy and Rural Affairs, Government of Bolivia.
 2. Letter from President Kennedy to President Paz dated May 14, 1961.
 3. Draft Memorandum entitled "Measures to Speed Economic Development in Bolivia Under the Alliance for Progress" dated June 18, 1962.
-

8. Memorandum from Dungan to President Kennedy, July 6¹

July 6, 1962

The attached memorandum requests your approval for the announcement of the $80 million commitment to Bolivia. The proposed program has been under negotiation for several months and the Bolivian negotiators are standing by here in Washington waiting for a decision.

The proposed program is based on a plan submitted by Bolivia and reviewed favorably by the nine Wise Men. It is essentially a political program as have been the some $220 million which have gone into Bolivia since 1952. It is different in that, for the first time, the Bolivians have agreed to a more rational review of their own budget and a better administration of AID funds.

¹ Transmits a memorandum to approve announcement of the U.S. commitment of assistance to Bolivia; handwritten note that Kennedy approved. No classification marking. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Brubeck Series, Bolivia, 1961–1962.

Approximately $41 million of the $80 million would go for the generation of local currency but the dollar account is tied to U.S. procurement. In this case, this is not a subterfuge and there will probably be a very small gold drain.

I recommend that: (1) you approve this proposed program and (2) announcement of it be delayed until after the Foreign Aid debate is completed in the House.

Ralph A. Dungan

Attachment

9. Memorandum from Hansen (BOB) to Dungan, July 19¹

July 19, 1962

SUBJECT

Bolivian Aid Commitment

1. The proposed $80 million commitment to Bolivia should be viewed as a "test" of whether:

a. The Bolivian Government is capable of effectively utilizing a higher level of grant and loan funds to deal with current and pressing economic and political problems;

b. The Bolivian Government is able to take the prerequisite steps to create within this 2½-year period the conditions for a substantial step-up in development financing; and

c. The U.S. can responsibly commit itself and invest its funds in Bolivia without making a mockery of the development concepts of the Alliance for Progress.

2. The hard facts of the Bolivian situation indicate that this commitment is a high-risk undertaking.

Paz Estenssoro evidently lays complete reliance on a U.S. commitment of this nature to bolster his attempt to achieve effective control of the MNR—a party which has become so institutionalized in the government structure that it has a vested interest in the major malfunctions which meaningful reforms must eradicate—a party which is increasingly repressing those few remaining elements in the country upon which progress may ultimately depend.

¹ Concerns about the Bolivian aid commitment. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Brubeck Series, Bolivia, 1961–1962.

Economically, the ineffectiveness of the government is apparent; it has not developed a capacity to absorb and follow through on the technical assistance made available; political interference with the economic mechanism is rampant; and hostility to development of the private sector is pervasive. Nonetheless, some changes in the COMIPOL, railroads and utility price sectors are slowly and painfully being pursued.

The breaking of the vicious circle of political fragmentation and economic stagnation by means of the $80 million commitment and import aid is being looked to by the Estenssoro MNR group and U.S. and international agencies as the chief means of altering the situation favorably.

3. With this political and economic situation as background, the question will be whether this additional U.S. aid will provide the leverage to Paz to gain sufficient party control and general political initiative to move toward the realignments and reforms he professes to seek, or whether in spite of his efforts and our commitment and immediate financial support he is only able or willing to use this support to finance the status quo.

4. To make this a credible test of both Bolivian capabilities and the effectiveness of our own actions, it is essential that we have some agreed set of standards by which to measure performance in both areas. The presently contemplated “conditions” are not specific or sufficiently detailed to provide a yardstick to determine whether the Bolivian Government is taking actions adequate to merit accelerated inputs of development resources, and, on our part, we have not adequately spelled out the uses to which our financial assistance will be put or the targets we seek.

5. With regard to the U.S.-IDB commitments:

a. The IDB does not have detailed and specific conditions for the elements of its $21.4 million commitment.

b. Neither the U.S. nor the Bolivians have any concrete projects investigated or enumerated for the $3 million grant for public works. We do not know whether the public works program will be additive to the current public works projects in the national budget nor whether these projects will be designed for termination.

c. The commitment of unspecified budget support is not based upon any general understandings with regard to budgetary ceilings and relationships to expected sources and magnitudes of receipts.

d. The development loan of $6 million for feasibility studies does not contain a determination of the priorities of studies—nor is its use linked to supplying services to the domestic lending institutions we are financing with other portions of the commitment.

e. With regard to the $10.4 million in loans to the existing three government banks, plus the unspecified funds to the proposed development bank, neither the “Wise Men” report nor the Tannenbaum report set forth the specific reforms required before these institutions may receive support, nor is there an agreed mechanism or chosen instrument for determining the actions which must be taken to make these institutions eligible.

6. With regard to the Bolivian undertakings:

a. The confidential Bolivian letter does not indicate a timetable for actions to be taken, and the “Economic Policy” paper attached thereto describes virtually no tangible undertakings of policy or programs which will form a basis for judgment as to Bolivian performance, e.g., magnitude and scope of customs and tax reform, support of private sector, etc.

7. Moreover, the current memorandum of understanding does not touch upon three specific matters which are being pressed currently in La Paz by Ambassador Stephansky: (a) the chartering of the proposed industrial bank (awaiting Presidential signature for six months and a crucial element in private investor confidence); (b) acceptance by the Bolivians of the customs improvement plan proposed by the UK expert (which is conceived to bring forth increased receipts which could offset external budget support); and (c) more specific undertakings in regard to public utility rates so that a constructive plan of power capacity expansion can go forward, with special attention to the current emergency power shortage in La Paz.

CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

8. The current agreement is so “open-ended” on both sides that unless a major effort is made to follow up with specific requirements and agreed upon programs, this commitment will be subject to charges of bad faith on both sides.

9. A major negotiation should be undertaken in La Paz immediately to provide a program basis of immediate action on an agreed timetable.

10. As an instrument to effectuate this procedure, it is recommended that with Presidential approval of this commitment a special letter be sent from the President, to be delivered by the Ambassador, to the President of Bolivia (draft attached) which would provide more specific terms of reference for the ensuing negotiation and provide leverage for the Ambassador in extracting specific undertakings from the President of Bolivia.

K.R. Hansen
Assistant Director

Attachment

10. Memorandum from Topping (S/P) to Rostow, July 30, 1962¹

July 30, 1962

TO

Walt W. Rostow, Counselor

THROUGH

Howard Wiggins, Policy Planning Council

FROM

J.L. Topping, S/P: SSO

SUBJECT

Observations Concerning the Alliance for Progress and Bolivia

During the course of my examination of the Bolivian scene and our strategy there, I have noted several factors which handicap or confuse our efforts, which for various reasons have not been included in the paper. They are given in somewhat random fashion below, in the thought that you may find some of them useful.

1. Dealing with Bolivia seems to generate an exceptional amount of emotional heat among the majority of the American officials involved, with consequent reduction of objectivity. Some, from what I believe to be a combination of this emotional bias plus a personal conviction that they must make an emphatic presentation to offset the influence of those with contrary views and overcome inertia, frequently take a stand which might be summarised as a conviction that the United States has committed or promised financial and technical aid, and therefore we must give it to Bolivia regardless of the soundness or completeness of the proposed project, and with little consideration for the course of political developments in Bolivia. This drifts into the personality cult when it maintains that we must support President Paz at all costs—that only he can control the situation and work well with us.

¹ Observations concerning the Alliance for Progress and Bolivia. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, S/P Files: Lot 69 D 121, Bolivia.

2. The other extreme, also strongly held and forcefully presented from time to time in the past, now appears more frequently as a personal conviction which influences the officers actions negatively. This holds that in general Bolivian politicians and government functionaries are [1½ lines not declassified] somehow second-rate and undeserving of help because they are lacking in skills. This is the attitude which Ambassador Stephansky sometimes refers to as “The Ray Hill approach”.

3) Both (1) and (2) are inaccurate and disappointing. It should be possible to rely on most American officials concerned with Bolivia, and certainly the senior ones, to take an objective, dispassionate approach in their analysis, coupled with a full measure of sympathy for the Bolivians and their situation, without going overboard. Unfortunately, they seem to be scarce both in Washington and the field.

4) I formed the distinct impression that all of the senior members of the staff of our Embassy in La Paz are disturbed about the presentations which the Ambassador makes of the Bolivian situation. They seem to feel that the situation is more delicate and explosive than he indicates, that disorder and violence are always just beneath the surface, that the MNR is now paying only lip service to the ideal of political freedom of expression, and that the leftist extremists are in greater control of the government than he acknowledges. The staff is making every effort to be loyal and to follow the Ambassador's guidance, and there has been no open and final disagreement that I know of. But there is considerable tension, a great deal of privately expressed worry and concern, and at least one officer has managed his transfer as a result.

5) Particularly in the field, there is the basic problem reported on by Jack Cates as to what the Alliance for Progress really is, and what its terminal goals are.

6) Both in Washington and in the field, there seems to be a lack of appreciation of the extent of U.S. power to affect Bolivian developments, and of the size of our presence there.

7) There is a lack of forward thinking. Many officers involved seem too deeply focused on short-term objectives, without realising it. They talk in terms of immediacy, and of projects which have been unnecessarily delayed, when in truth there is virtually no project that is “ready to go”. Engineering and feasibility studies are incomplete, being worked on, or not begun. With our best efforts, it will be many months before we can actually make the dirt fly.

8) There is a remarkable diffusion and confusion of external agencies interested in Bolivia, both American and international. Some of them now seem working at cross purposes. Pronounced improvement in coordination and cooperation should be possible. As one step, I would suggest that our Economic Counselor undertake that task as a primary responsibility, with an assistant if necessary. We have been perhaps too sensitive about offending the feelings of UN agencies operating in Bolivia, whose work has been spotty. UN representatives in Bolivia expressed dissatisfaction with the state of coordination with American activities, and a desire to improve it. The same situation exists in Washington. There is no central coordination or over-all authority, and our efforts are handicapped thereby.

9) Attitudes and emphasis sometimes seem based on a feeling that we didn't really mean our commitment to assist Bolivia, and that if things are prolonged it may go away. Not everybody involved in the Bolivian program has the desired drive and determination. There is need for convincing presentation and forceful action.

11. Memorandum of conversation, November 15, between Rusk and Andrade¹

November 15, 1962

SUBJECT

Farewell call of Bolivian Ambassador Victor Andrade on Secretary of State

PARTICIPANTS

The Secretary
Ambassador Andrade
Mr. Duke
Mr. Weise

During his farewell call on the Secretary, Ambassador Andrade stated that he had become increasingly concerned over the drift to the left within the MNR party in Bolivia and the failure of his government to act decisively on the Cuban issue. Andrade said that following the visit of the Bolivian Foreign Minister to the United States in early October, the Foreign Minister announced in La Paz that he had "fired" Andrade as Bolivian Ambassador to the United States. This announcement was untrue, Andrade said, since he had submitted his resignation on October 2, 1962 in protest to certain things he felt were wrong within his Government. He said he particularly deplored the vacillation of his government in confronting pro-Castro and communist elements both within Bolivia and their threat to the hemisphere.

¹ Exchange of views during Andrade's farewell call. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 724.00/11-1562.

Andrade said that for some time communist and pro-Castro elements had been making great headway in Bolivia and were extending their control over the MNR party organization, while at the same time subverting the true objectives of the Bolivian revolution. Since Fellman's appointment as Foreign Minister in January 1962, Andrade said that he has had real differences with Fellman over the conduct of both internal affairs and foreign relations. Andrade said that when the Foreign Minister was in the United States last month he had had a show-down with the Foreign Minister over these differences. He remarked that the Secretary may have noticed that he, Andrade, had not participated in any of the meetings of the Latin American Foreign Ministers in New York or Washington and claimed that his abstention was the result of his break with Fellman over the Cuban issue and the attempt by the Government to assume a neutralist position at a time when the security of the hemisphere was being threatened by Communist aggression. He said that under these circumstances, Bolivia had no business flirting with extra-Hemispheric ideas and that he felt it was the duty of his Government to come out "clean and squarely" in support of the United States position in the OAS.

The Secretary remarked that we had appreciated the courageous stand of Emilio Sarmiento on October 23, 1962 when he voted with the overwhelming majority of the OAS membership in favor of the OAS resolution on the Cuban issue. To this Andrade replied that Ambassador Sarmiento had consulted him as to what action he should take in absence of instructions from his Foreign Office and that he, Andrade, had told Sarmiento that he should re-enter the OAS and vote in favor of the U.S. resolution.

Andrade then voiced further differences he had had with his Government. He said that he felt that President Paz was in an extremely weak and vulnerable position with respect to the left wing of the MNR party. He said that during his visit to La Paz in August 1961 he had expressed his objections to President Paz over the use of the Bolivian Government's reserve fund (under the control of the Ministry of Government) for pay-offs to members of the Central Obrero Boliviano (COB). Andrade said that such use of Government funds was not only illegal, but was being used to buy-off the very elements which support Castroism and Communism in Bolivia and are subverting the Bolivian revolution and its economic objectives by creating chaos and anarchy within Bolivia. Andrade said the President dismissed his objection by saying that this was a matter of concern to Andrade's imagination.

Andrade said that after he returns to Bolivia (around December 5) he would direct his efforts toward realigning the moderate forces within the MNR and channeling the Bolivian revolution into its true historic nationalist pattern. He said he intended to enter the political arena, and if it appeared that he could succeed he would play an active part in the presidential campaign in 1964. He emphasized that he had no intention of splitting the MNR party, such as Walter Guevarra had done in 1960, but would work from within toward the realignment of those forces which would be strong enough to confront the Left Sector and prevent a left-wing take-over of the party mechanism in the convention preceding the Presidential elections. He said that politics are played “rough and dirty” in Bolivia and that he had no illusions as to the difficulties which lay ahead of him. He felt, however, a real sense of duty in contributing to the elimination of “thugs and gangsters” who now threaten to control the MNR party.

The Secretary wished the Ambassador well and assured him that we would be pleased to see him should the Ambassador return to the United States for a visit on some future occasion.

12. Memorandum of conversation, April 24, between Kennedy and Ambassador Sanchez de Lozada¹

April 24, 1963

SUBJECT

Presentation of Credentials

PARTICIPANTS

The President
Ambassador Enrique Sanchez de Lozada of Bolivia
Ambassador Duke, U/PR
Taylor G. Belcher, ARA/WST

After an exchange of pleasantries regarding the Ambassador’s former service in Washington and his pleasure at being reassigned to what he referred to as his “second country”, the Ambassador brought up the subject of the proposed Paz visit. Sanchez de Lozada expressed his President’s regret that internal problems in Bolivia prevented him from coming to Washington as had been tentatively planned and he now hoped that it might be possible to arrange a visit sometime in September or October when the internal situation would have clarified. President Kennedy said that he was certain that something could be arranged and indicated that Ambassador Duke should look into the question of the visit schedule. The President went on to inquire about the existing situation in Bolivia. The Ambassador replied that he considered that despite the ever present unrest due to the impoverished condition of many of the people of his country, and despite the efforts of the Communists who did have influence in certain fields, particularly the mine unions, the situation was basically stable. This was due in large part, he said, to the major social changes which the Bolivian revolution had effected. The fact that almost 200,000 new land owners had been created by the Bolivian agrarian reform program made for a solid base of support for the MNR regime in the countryside.

¹ Exchange of views during presentation of credentials. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Bolivia, General 4-7/63.

Although the situation was under control, the Ambassador said that with the country in a crucial pre-electoral period it was necessary to do everything possible to move ahead rapidly with the new $80 million development program in order to show that the Alliance for Progress was in fact moving ahead in Bolivia. The President asked what was holding up the program and Mr. Belcher said that basically it was a question of completing the necessary feasibility and engineering studies in order to be able to give final approval to the development projects. For this purpose a sizeable feasibility loan had been made and the engineering studies were being carried out. Some of them would be completed in the very near future although the major construction projects could probably not get under way until next year. The Ambassador said that during the recent visit of the Foreign Minister the question of moving the AID programs forward had been discussed and it had been agreed that the Ambassador and officials of State and AID would work closely together to ensure that the program moved as fast as possible.

As the meeting broke up the question of a possible Autumn visit came up again and the President told the Ambassador that he was sure that something could be arranged and that Mr. Duke would look into it.

13. Memorandum from Major General Lansdale to McNamara and Gilpatric, June 3¹

June 3, 1963

SUBJECT

Visit to Bolivia

At the invitation of General Andrew P. O'Meara, CINCARIB, I accompanied him on his 26–31 May visit to Bolivia. It gave me an unusual close-up view of one of your senior commanders at work and of one of his twenty country problems.

The trip took us not only to such centers as La Paz and Cochabamba, but also into the remote frontier region of northeast Bolivia, along the borders of Brazil and Peru, where imaginative Civic Action projects are in progress. While much of what was learned and done on the trip is being reported through normal channels by CINCARIB and the Country Team in La Paz, including a harder fix on stories we heard of a current border crossing by Communist guerrilleros, some personal comments might be of interest.

Highlights. Reflecting on what I saw and heard as a newcomer, in little more than five long and full days, my impressions can be summed up as follows:

a. Bolivia is a land of the vexing paradox for the U.S. Its people are warmly friendly towards us (the smiles and waved hands of the children reminded me of the Philippines), yet it has fallen in love with Marxism (of both the Lenin and Trotsky versions). Again, Americans are most excited by Bolivian pioneering over the Andes eastward into nearly empty but fabulously promising country; Bolivians are most aroused by looking westward towards the Pacific, longing for a seaport. Perhaps this is because of the basic paradox; a land of wide-open spaces, Bolivia has hidden its capital city of La Paz down in a crevice, almost as though it wanted its leaders to become moles.

b. "Civic Action" is making a dramatic change in the psychological climate, both for military and civilian Bolivians. The vividly brutish portrayal of the military as monsters inflicting pain on the lowly Indian, as seen in the huge mural in the Presidency, must be striking an increasingly false note to Bolivian viewers. The Civic Action program is stressing the public service role of the Bolivian military, in much the same manner as the U.S. military were the pathfinders, engineers, and guardians in the opening of our own West. The Bolivian people are starting to respond, most favorably.

¹ Report on visit to Bolivia. Secret. 10 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Bolivia, General 4–7/63.

c. Although nearly unspoken, U.S. policy has moved down the Left fork of the political road in Bolivia, mostly because hardly a trace remains of the Right fork. On this Left fork, we now look upon President Paz as being on the right edge, opposed to Vice President Lechin on the left edge—so we have moved in with Paz. Yet, there is the beginning of a path off towards objectives more in harmony with U.S. beliefs, which richly deserves stronger U.S. help in development. The beginning of this path is in the cadastral ideas proposed by Julio Sanjines, director of Civic Action, who wants to convince unbelieving campesino settlers that they really own their own land by including an aerial photo showing property boundaries with each title deed given in Civic Action settlements. A slight shift of emphasis in the Civic Action program, to stress the rights and responsibilities of the individual Bolivian, might well give us the dynamic key we have lacked (spoken of as a missing “political mystique” in the Country Team briefing). Our present in-country resources in the Inter-American Geodetic Survey, U.S. military, AID, and USIS could target in on land ownership by the campesino, as a base to be rapidly broadened into such political objectives as individual liberty, free elections (in the U.S. sense), and the rule of law (rather than militia bands).

d. It is probable that Bolivia serves the Communists as a Switzerland—a transit area to other Latin American places for people, funds, and matériel. There is merit in John Stutesman’s idea of fuller lateral reporting between U.S. Country Teams, [1½ lines not declassified]. The activities of European Bloc Communists, let alone Cuban Communists, seemed to be notorious even out in the villages of the boon-docks.

e. On this trip, General O’Meara showed considerable skill as a U.S. cold war commander. He spotted cold war essentials and acted on them firmly, with a balanced sensing of the political, psychological, economic, and military factors involved, while being warmly human in his encouragement of those Bolivians who are moving towards our objectives. I believe his visit, particularly his traverse into remote areas, did much to bolster the U.S. position in Bolivia.

f. The U.S. Country Team in La Paz has made a remarkably fine start in the closely-integrated teamwork required for a cold war win—in its Civic Action program. I trust that Washington departments and agencies will continue their strong backing of this integrated effort. It is making a vital difference.

Nationalism. The present Bolivian government is generating much enthusiastic nationalism among the people, presumably to create national unity. One was good to see and hear—the singing of the national anthem on all public occasions (every man, woman, and child joined in to sing this lustily and proudly). The other is fraught with problems for us—a Bolivian drive to regain a seaport on the Pacific.

The seaport issue arose early and stayed with us throughout the visit. Knowing that the Bolivians had an Army and Air Force, but no Navy, it was a surprise to see a Bolivian Admiral standing with Bolivian military commanders to greet us when we arrived at the La Paz airport. He was the newly promoted Brigadier General Ronant Monje Roca, Commander, Bolivian River and Lake Force. Later in the trip, General Monje (he doesn't call himself Admiral—yet) gave me a souvenir banner of his River and Lake Force. It shows the ocean rather than a river or lake, and bears the slogan: "Volveremos al mar por la fuerza del derecho!" ("We shall return to the sea by force of law"). In Army schools and installations, on blackboards, on signs, similar slogans such as "The Sea is our Destiny!" were everywhere. At an Air Force luncheon, General Ayala pointedly called my attention to a large mural showing Bolivia reaching the Pacific.

It is evident that a highly emotional drive is on to obtain a Pacific seaport for Bolivia. If the U.S. makes a mis-step and appears to be opposed to this move, the Communists will seize this patriotic issue for their own—and have Bolivia handed them on a silver platter. If present legal moves to obtain a seaport fail, and Bolivian tempers flare, we may yet see two of our Latin American friends at war with each other. Chile is currently working hard to make its northern coastal area an integral and patriotic part of Chile. Somebody surely has lifted the lid of a Pandora's Box in Bolivia.

Civic Action. A major purpose of the trip was to take a look at Bolivia's Civic Action program. It was well worth the long journey.

The marked success of this program seems to stem from exceptional Bolivian leadership and from equally exceptional joint U.S. military-civilian teamwork in support. Bolivian leadership is mostly in the person of one man, Mr. Julio Sanjines, Director, Civic Action Office USAID, although a number of other Bolivian military and civilians have caught the fire of enthusiasm for this program. Sanjines attended West Point (when I asked him who his best friend was in the U.S., he named Lt. Colonel Jack Cushman, whom he identified as a West Point classmate now on the Secretary of the Army's staff—actually, Cushman has transferred to Vietnam), apparently quit a career in the Bolivian Army to become a successful businessman, and recently was made a Lt. Colonel in the Bolivian Army (although he only went by his civilian status when travelling with us). Sanjines is a real "operator," in the best sense of the word.

A story will illustrate, mostly as told me by Sanjines. The miners of Achacachi, dominated by Communists and with their own armed militia, have borne a long and bloody hatred for the Bolivian military.

Achacachi is a dry and dusty place, noted for its shortage of water. It was picked for a Civic Action well-drilling project. Rather than announce this early, as a politico would be tempted to do, Sanjines moved into Achacachi with a crew of engineers, including Army men in civilian clothes, and made a quietly unobtrusive survey for potential water sources; the survey showed promising sites. The well-drilling crews and equipment were readied and put on a standby basis in La Paz, alert to move on signal. Sanjines then had a leading La Paz newspaper (owned by Sanjines, Clarence Boonstra informed me) send reporters to Achacachi to ask the people how they would like a Civic Action project to provide fresh water to the city. The people interviewed replied: "All the government ever does is talk, not act," "The Army is worthless and would never do anything for us," and similar comments. Sanjines met with town officials, told them of the proposed project, and was invited to give it a try. He signaled La Paz, the Army engineers (in uniform) and equipment showed up promptly and went to work, completing the new water works in record time. The La Paz newspaper then publicized the Civic Action triumph, complete with earlier scoffing interviews. It made quite a convincing story.

A large delegation from Achacachi met us at the La Paz airport. They shouted rousing cheers for the Bolivian Army, for U.S. aid, and for General O'Meara. He walked around and shook hands with each of the happily grinning miners, then at their insistence had his picture taken with them. When I followed suit, shaking hands, they enthusiastically insisted on a picture with the U.S. Air Force too, so our Air Force Mission and aircraft crew folks joined me for a group picture with these miners. The moral, of course, is that this is a sharp contrast to their attitude towards the Bolivian and U.S. military just a short while ago.

The whole range of the Bolivian Civic Action program, in public works, in public health, in public education, in agriculture, and in the colonization of the empty areas of eastern Bolivia, has been reported elsewhere by others. Thus, I will not repeat details here. However, it is timely to note two striking features. One is that there is a really dedicated effort being given to Civic Action, particularly by the Bolivian military; the military finished its share of building public schools ahead of time and is being assigned the building of more from the yet uncompleted share of Bolivian civilian agencies; when I asked about an old USAF T-13, the only aircraft stationed at the frontier town of Riberalta, the Bolivian Air Force proudly told me they used it for Civic Action, to bring sick and injured to the hospital from remote jungle farms (the rear cockpit has been altered from a one-seater and now takes four passengers); General Monje stressed that a major mission of his River and Lake Force will be Civic Action.

The second striking feature of Civic Action in Bolivia is the fine teamwork evident between civilians and military, both Bolivian and U.S. CINCARIB seems to have made a special effort to get U.S. military advisors and equipment into places where they count; AID, particularly Alexander Firfer, has backed Civic Action projects aggressively with plans, funds, advice, matériel, and other help. At the colonization project at Santa Ana (500 families—from the Altiplano—2,000 persons—settled so far in this extremely productive area), it was deeply stirring to note the catchy, enthusiastic teamwork under Walter Gonzalez, Alto Beni Project Engineer (for the Corporacion Boliviana de Fomento); his team included the Bolivian 2nd Engineer Battalion advised by U.S. Army Engineers (now putting finishing touches on a 3,000 meter long airfield runway hacked out of the jungle and eager to extend the highway now connecting La Paz on into further fertile areas of the Alto Beni), Bolivian and U.S. civilians (including young Peace Corps Americans helping start nuclei of settlers), Bolivian and U.S. Air Force personnel helping with some airlift, and an unusual U.S. Army doctor, Captain Lavern G. Borg, providing support to a medical team from the Middle American Research Unit (which arrived on 24 March 1963 and has since eradicated the main reservoir of infection of “Pinta disease”—which depigments the skin—among the Mosestenean Indians who live at Santa Ana, and who were warned by the Communists that the doctors would be bad for them; Borg’s dramatic treatment of the chief’s brother, who had turned blue, has made him a revered person locally). The Washington officials who backed his concept of combined teamwork can be deservedly proud.

Propaganda. The U.S. Military Mission officers told me that they were getting strong support from USIS in the psychological battle with the Communists in Bolivia, especially in material for use with the Bolivian military. I noticed evidence of this in the military schools we visited, USIS comic books being particularly dog-eared from much reading, and was impressed most favorably by the skilled use made of this material in Cochabamba by Lt. Colonel Hector Aranda, both in the Bolivian Special Forces Center of Instruction which he commands and in his classes on Counterinsurgency at the nearby Command and General Staff College. Lt. Colonel Malcolm Nurnberg, who commands the U.S. Air Force Mission to Bolivia, gave me details of how Mission aircraft carry out constant distribution of USIS matériel, each flight in-country carrying hundreds of pounds for delivery at every stop made.

However, the Communists are a strong, entrenched, persistent enemy in this psychological battle. At times, their work has a quaint touch to it. Two examples during our visit illustrate the Communist work. The first was at a new school-house built by the Bolivian military for the colonization project at the little settlement named Puerto Rico.

The school's teacher, Miss Justa Chamairo, had requested a U.S. flag for the school. Thus, there was a ceremony in the school-house, with General O'Meara presenting a U.S. flag and with Alex Firfer presenting a handsome Alliance for Progress metal plaque—both received with warm gratitude. The pupils crowded into the one-room school, after a lusty singing of the Bolivian national anthem, were called upon by the teacher to give recitations (with gestures). The oldest girl pupil proudly recited, in Spanish, a poem circulated by the Communists about the labor martyrs of Chicago, apparently dated to the Haymarket Riots. (Sanjines inquired, then hastily explained that it was the only poem about the U.S. the girl could find—she intended to honor the visit of the Norte-Americanos!)

The second example was at the colonization project at Santa Ana. The 500 families in this fine Bolivian-U.S. jungle settlement, where reading matter is scarce, are the target of a special Communist propaganda effort, according to Walter Gonzales, the project engineer. He commented that truck drivers, in the transport union, were smuggling in loads of Communist literature with the regular supplies they hauled from Caranavi. U.S. Country Team members accompanying us on the trip immediately ordered delivery of USIS material to the Santa Ana settlers. I trust that this effort will be continued as thousands of new settlers arrive; it would be a macabre joke if the U.S. and Bolivian governments helped these people get a fresh start in life—and the Communists then taught them how to live it, the Communist way.

Relations. As in other countries, I was alert in Bolivia for signs of the human spirit breaking through the international barriers. Comments already have been made above about the warmly friendly attitude of the Bolivian people towards us. Also, I noted that U.S. personnel at all places visited seemed to be working in close friendship with their Bolivian associates. This was particularly evident in an evening get-together at the home of Colonel Truman Cook, Chief of the U.S. Military Group. Beyond this, there are some further significant stories.

On the orbital space flights of Astronaut Gordon Cooper over South America in May, the Bolivian campesinos toiled to construct huge signs on the mountains above La Paz, in the hope that Cooper would read them. The signs were made of 50-gallon oil drums, filled with kerosene—all brought up the mountain by hand—and lighted at night when Cooper was due to orbit above. One sign read: "Cooper in Orbit." The second read: "Man of the Century." Lt. Colonel Nurnberg of our Air Force Mission said that the Mission had a surprise visit, after Cooper's successful flight, by a big delegation of Bolivian youngsters from the La Paz Model Airplane Club—bearing a huge bouquet of flowers for the U.S.

Relaxing in the evening with local Bolivian officials in Cobija, I made mental notes on two USAF officers whom the Bolivians seemed to hold in special affection. One was Lt. Colonel Louis McAdory who accompanied us, who was welcomed with enthusiastic bear hugs, and upon urging danced the La Quaca with a local girl. The other was in La Paz, but really introduced to me in Cobija from the many local Bolivians asking anxiously: "Where is our friend, Zorro of the Andes? Why didn't you bring him with you?" Upon inquiry, I learned that "Zorro of the Andes" is Lt. Colonel Ed Fox. Those who know Latin temperaments will understand the esteem associated with Zorro.

Air Travel. There was a marked change in the air travel to and from Panama this time over my recent trip to Venezuela. National and PanAm gave me luxury treatment, as if they knew of my previous report. I hope other U.S. officers benefit, too.

Note: I have omitted a number of events, such as border crossing by Communist guerrillas, which are being reported through normal channels. Also, I spent a day in Panama visiting CINCARIB schools and units, as well as the Inter-American Police Academy, and am passing along items of special interest—such as Project Pista—separately.

This was a well-planned trip, with a full schedule for every hour, to permit a good look at known developments for which U.S. officials making the trip had assigned responsibilities. It made sense, but was quite different from my usual approach to an area. An operational look would dig below surface into such matters as:

[text not declassified]

b. How do we put some effective bare-knuckles into our psychological operations? There's a tough, scrappy nature just below the surface of the Bolivian campesino, so do we just want to make friends with him or do we want to have him aroused to action on our side with much of that energetic devotion he put into the carbineros? Isn't it time to tip off this resourceful campadre that he can start helping on our side, as quickly as he realizes it is his own? (This is worth an executive look by practical realists, with a view towards getting more meaningful results. Bolivia reminded me too much of Laos, where we did a technically beautiful psychological operation, but the Communists just kept going for the jugular. Who can forget the Laos election of May 1958, when the people of Laos fell in love with candidates helped by U.S. airdrops of bulldozers, food, and other matériel—and the people voted for Pathet Lao candidates, simply because some of the best candidates on our side were out "doing good" for the people with our help—and forgot to ask the people to vote for them? Are we going to have this all over again in Bolivia?)

c. How much of a transit, staging, resupply or safe area is Bolivia to the Communists? (If I were a responsible U.S. official in Lima, I would be pressing my counterpart in La Paz to get me a hard-fix on whether or not the Communist guerrilla leader Blanco actually had found a safe-haven in Bolivia; from Rio, I would ask La Paz to tell me about Communist passengers of local airlines who fly to Brazilian towns near the Bolivian border, which can be crossed with no questions asked). Jose Arze Murillo, Minister of Government of Bolivia, has asked for U.S. help in tracking down facts about the Communist situation in Bolivia; [2 lines not declassified]. At the same time, lateral reporting and tips to potential leads between U.S. agencies in several countries seem well worth an executive look; with eyes up on Cuba, a lot might be going on underfoot locally of real significance. Also, the U.S. military might well find it timely to get in on the 30 May opportunity opened by the Bolivian Minister of Government, to help create an effective counter-intelligence capability in the Bolivian military. The NCO School at Cochabamba appeared to be a most tempting haven for a Communist aparat, yet I was unable to get any fix for lack of information: there must be other such invitations to the Communists among the Bolivian military, which we have been thwarted from exploring before 30 May 1963. [1½ lines not declassified]

(While time and program didn't permit a full exploration of the three topics noted above, with General O'Meara and U.S. officials in La Paz, I believe you will find them sympathetic towards further development somewhat along the lines indicated).

14. Memorandum from Read (S/S) to McGeorge Bundy, July 20¹

July 20, 1963

SUBJECT

The Situation in Bolivia

In reference to Mr. Bromley Smith's oral request to Mr. Martin today, I am forwarding herewith a memorandum on the situation in Bolivia.

D. Rowe (for)
Benjamin Reed
Executive Secretary

¹ Transmits memorandum on the situation in Bolivia. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Bolivia, General 4-7/63.

Enclosure

SUBJECT

The Situation in Bolivia

In our discussions with Ambassador Stephansky during his recent consultation the developments reported in La Paz telegrams 93 and 99, dated July 19, were foreseen. Our planning, based on the Ambassador's conversations with President Paz and the recommendations resulting therefrom, has provided for financial assistance, [less than 1 line not declassified] and for equipment. The question of possible need for United States personnel did not arise. Under our contingency planning a special fund of $4,000,000 has been set up, and in response to an emergency request received yesterday $325,000 has been authorized for two projects to assist in the mining area.

The Ambassador's analysis to date has not indicated that armed intervention was likely to be required in the confrontation which we have expected as a result of President Paz' apparent decision to enforce labor discipline in the mines. While we are not surprised that General Barrientos has suggested that Special Forces might be needed to back up the Bolivian Armed Forces (Embassy telegram 93) we should not take his démarche too seriously until we have had a further report and recommendation based on Ambassador Stephansky's forthcoming conversation with President Paz.

In the event President Paz decides that he requires more than money and technical assistance we would wish to consider his request in the multilateral framework of the OAS. We would be most reluctant to act unilaterally. With regard to a possible OAS response, we must recognize there may be certain problems arising out of Bolivia's withdrawal from the Council, aside from those deriving from the inherent reluctance of many members to "interfere" in the affairs of a neighboring state.

We will be awaiting the Ambassador's recommendations as well as General O'Meara's comments in response to Stephansky's messages. It should be noted that the Ambassador stopped in Panama last week for consultation with the General.

15. Memorandum from Cottrell (ARA) to the Special Group (Counter-Insurgency), July 31¹

July 31, 1963

TO

Special Group (Counter-Insurgency)

THROUGH

M—Governor Harriman

FROM

ARA—Sterling J. Cottrell

SUBJECT

The Situation in Bolivia

As stated in the Bolivia Internal Defense Plan approved by the Special Group on May 16, the major internal security threat is the danger of an extreme left wing takeover that would place in power a sector of the governing National Revolutionary Movement (MNR) which is heavily infiltrated by communists. This MNR left sector is headed by Vice President Juan Lechin.

The Department's contingency planning foresaw the development of the present show-down between management and labor in the Bolivian state mining corporation (COMIBOL). Our planning is based on conversations Ambassador Stephansky held with President Paz, and on the Ambassador's recent consultation in Washington. This show-down, brought about by our insistence that the Bolivian Government should carry out reforms which would allow the COMIBOL management, among other things, to move men and equipment without union interference, also has important political implications related to the main internal security threat. The struggle for power in Bolivia today is chiefly between the MNR center forces supporting President Paz and the MNR left sector and communist forces supporting Lechin. The COMIBOL management of labor reforms will tend to weaken the mining unions which form Vice President Lechin's major base of support, thereby lessening the possibility of his winning the MNR nomination for President late this year and subsequently being elected in June 1964. Thus the Vice President is opposing these reforms with all means at his disposal.

¹ The internal security threat in Bolivia and contingency planning. Secret. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Bolivia, General 4-7/63.

Under our contingency planning a special fund of $4 million has been set up. In response to emergency requests, $325,000 has been authorized for projects to assist in the mining area, $65,000 has been authorized to aid Bolivian military movements in connection with the crisis and $118,000 of police riot control equipment is being airshipped to Bolivia (most of the shipment has already arrived in La Paz). In addition, funds are being made available from the regular A.I.D. public safety program for the supply on an emergency basis, of arms, communications, and transportation equipment to outlying police units. We have sent two special public safety advisers to Bolivia on TDY to look into possible further matériel as well as organizational needs. We are also considering a special factory rehabilitation program; which would allow the GOB to offer a solution to problems in the manufacturing field, thereby lessening the likelihood of a solidarity move by these workers with the mine unions. Certain [less than 1 line not declassified] programs designed to influence the direction of these developments are in operation and others are awaiting approval.

A threatened general strike did not occur this past weekend, since negotiations are under way between the mine workers and the mining corporation management. If an agreement is not reached, the miners have indicated a general strike may be called over the Bolivian independence holidays which begin on August 5.

Union leaders have threatened to seize quantities of ore and export it themselves, and they have made threats to destroy mining machinery and equipment. The unions wish to settle the dispute on the basis of certain wage increases and job reclassification. The mining corporation management, backed by the Bolivian Government, has insisted that the mine unions accept the entire COMIBOL reform program, that is, cut costs, increase production, and end union interference in management decisions. In the meantime, the management has informed the unions that the large Catavi mine, where the strike began, will be removed from the $38 million Operation Triangular rehabilitation program which is sponsored by the United States, West Germany, and the Inter-American Development Bank, unless a satisfactory agreement is reached.

Our Ambassador informs us that the situation remains explosive although negotiations between management and labor (i.e., between the Government and the Lechin-communist group) are continuing. On July 29 the first of what may be growing armed clashes between Paz and Lechin forces took place. A group of Catavi armed miners attacked a pre-Paz peasant militia group and killed its leader. The peasants had been sent by Paz to the mining area for a show-down, and apparently were attacked while sleeping. The miners outnumbered the peasants three to one. Paz has plans to send larger peasant and miners militia groups loyal to him to the mine areas. They are to be used in an attempt to break up a miners strike if it occurs, and to prevent a march on the capital. The GOB first plans to use the militias in a confrontation with the Lechin forces, since use of the armed forces might cause a violent reaction in other sectors in the country. Meanwhile the Bolivian Army commander has stated publically that the Army will take action if necessary.

We are not averse to seeing a violent confrontation between Paz and Lechin forces since this will tend to place them in irreconcilable positions from which they will find it difficult to retreat, and we believe that Lechin's political standing will suffer in the event of such clashes. However, it is still by no means certain that a violent confrontation in the form of a general strike and/or widespread armed clashes will occur. The Communist Party reportedly is split on whether or not to support a violent confrontation with Paz forces, since many leaders believe Paz would win. At present, leaders who wish to avoid a violent show-down appear to be in control of the Party. Nevertheless, major communist labor leaders at the mines do not always follow Party instructions. Lechin in the meantime is in Rome at his Ambassadorial post, apparently waiting to judge developments.

Meanwhile, the Bolivian Government has taken steps to prepare for violence. Troops are on the alert and units have been strategically located in the mining areas. A top Bolivian Air Force official has suggested that Bolivia might consider calling on the aid of the United States special forces if the situation should deteriorate. It is not now planned to send such special forces. Were the situation to indicate the desirability of sending special forces, this would require a decision at the highest level of government and would involve consultations with the Organization of American States.

At present it appears that the GOB and the armed forces are fully capable of handling any foreseeable crisis. Nevertheless, it is always possible in a backward and disorganized nation like Bolivia, which is only now developing in its people a feeling of national patriotism, that a crisis of this nature could develop beyond the ability of the government to control it. The Embassy has made plans for the possible evacuation of dependents and others if events should make this necessary.

16. Memorandum of conversation, October 22, among Kennedy, President Paz, and U.S. and Bolivian officials¹

Part I (of 3)

October 22, 1963

SUBJECT

Meeting between President Kennedy and President Paz of Bolivia: Latin America—Importance; Chinese Communist Appeal; Military Coups

PARTICIPANTS

Bolivia

President Victor Paz Estenssoro
Minister of Foreign Relations José Fellman Velarde
Minister of National Economy Alfonso Gumucio Reyes
Ambassador Enrique Sanchez de Lozada
Mr. José Paz, President of Bolivian Oil Enterprise (YPFB)
Mr. Jorge Paz, President Paz' uncle
Mr. Raul Vivado (Interpreter)

United States

President Kennedy
Under Secretary George W. Ball
Mr. Ralph A. Dungan, Special Assistant to the President
Assistant Secretary Edwin M. Martin
Ambassador Ben S. Stephansky
Ambassador-designate Douglas Henderson
Mr. Teodoro Moscoso, Coordinator for the Alliance for Progress
Mr. Ragnar Arnese, Acting Director, Office of West Coast Affairs, AID
Mr. Herbert B. Thompson, Acting Director, Office of West Coast Affairs,
Department of State
Mr. Fernando A. Van Reigersberg (Interpreter)
Mr. Donald F. Barnes (Interpreter)

President Kennedy welcomed President Paz and described the importance we attach to Latin America as one of the most critical areas in the world today. For many years our efforts were directed primarily towards Europe. It is regrettable that just at the time we began to make a greater effort in Latin America, we ran into serious balance of payments problems of our own. Of course, the major burden of the Alliance for Progress effort falls upon the Latin American nations themselves. Nevertheless, within the limits of available resources, we want to help Latin America to achieve the objectives of the Alliance for Progress.

President Paz agreed concerning the current importance of Latin America. He said it was to be hoped that with the beginning of improvement in US-Soviet relations opportunities to devote resources to assistance to underdeveloped areas in the world would increase.

¹ General exchange of views. Confidential. 4 pp. DOS, President's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.

President Paz said he was concerned at two political developments in the hemisphere. The first is that the Chinese Communist thesis of violence is proving to be very appealing in Latin America.

President Paz described the military coups that have taken place in Latin America as a second motive for concern. Actually, he said, the Communists welcome military coups. These coups are generally against relatively progressive and democratic governments. This suits the Communists because the counter to a military government is not a democratic, progressive government, but a radical one.

President Kennedy noted that we have broken relations with Honduras and the Dominican Republic. He said that in the Dominican Republic we think perhaps we can achieve something akin to the Peruvian situation, with the government promising to hold elections at a specified time. While the Dominican situation could become a full dictatorship, it still has a civilian facade. President Kennedy inquired whether our policy should be to ignore such regimes or to work toward the restoration of constitutionality in these countries.

President Paz remarked that US influence was decisive in these cases as it had been in the case of the overthrow of Trujillo. However, the problem is not simply one of holding elections. The real solution lies in achieving basic structural change to alter situations of injustice which prevail under the anachronistic social systems in some countries. Democratic government in most Latin American countries is a short-term solution which has no real viability without structural change. He drew attention to Bolivia's past history of 166 revolutions in a period of 130 years but noted by contrast that despite severe economic problems, there has been political stability in the country since the revolution of 1952. Bolivia's experience is not a recipe appropriate for all countries since each must achieve changes in its own way. President Paz noted that President Belaunde of Peru is seeking his own way toward change at the present time. Belaunde is concerned with how to achieve changes without violent reactions.

President Kennedy inquired about the coup in Ecuador. President Paz said that Ecuador was a less clear case than the rest. Other factors were present, including the discredit into which Arosemena had fallen, which made the Ecuador case different. The case of Bosch in the Dominican Republic was a much better illustration of the kind of problem he had been describing. The danger of a coup against Betancourt is a further illustration. The problem is, he said, that the Communists believe in the dialectic of thesis, antithesis, and synthesis, and regard themselves as the antithesis of the military and therefore as the beneficiaries of military coups. President Paz said that Bolivia has always been extremely sensitive to influences from neighboring countries. He said this added to Bolivia's concern because of the danger of contagion.

Foreign Minister Fellman noted that consideration is being given to holding a meeting of Foreign Ministers to consider the problem of military coups. He said Bolivia would attend an MFM for this purpose if held. Given the possibility that an MFM will not be held, he said consideration is being given to a meeting of those democratic countries, including Bolivia, willing to attend. While Bolivia believes in nonintervention, it also believes the countries in the hemisphere can take some action to deal with this problem in line with the Rio Treaty.

President Kennedy asked President Paz what kind of resolution hemisphere countries could approve which would be adequate to cover the last six military coups in Latin America, all of which have been somewhat different. Also, should the resolution provide that diplomatic relations should not be re-established until elections are actually held or should it permit relations when elections are scheduled? The Foreign Minister responded that no such resolution can refer to past coups but what seemed desirable was a general resolution to sever diplomatic and commercial relations whenever a military group seizes power.

President Kennedy inquired about Brazil, which seems involved in a continuing crisis. President Paz said he thought the Brazilian situation was very serious and that this was also Tito's impression. President Kennedy agreed that Tito had thought the Brazilian situation was very dangerous.

17. Memorandum of conversation, October 22, among Kennedy, President Paz, and U.S. and Bolivian officials¹

Part II (of 3)

October 22, 1963

SUBJECT

Meeting between President Kennedy and President Paz of Bolivia: Bolivian-Chilean Relations

PARTICIPANTS

Bolivia

President Victor Paz Estenssoro
 Minister of Foreign Relations José Fellman Velarde
 Minister of National Economy Alfonso Gumucio Reyes
 Ambassador Enrique Sanchez de Lozada
 Mr. José Paz, President of Bolivian Oil Enterprise (YPFB)
 Mr. Jorge Paz, President Paz' uncle
 Mr. Raul Vivado (Interpreter)

United States

President Kennedy
 Under Secretary George W. Ball
 Mr. Ralph A. Dungan, Special Assistant to the President
 Assistant Secretary Edwin M. Martin
 Ambassador Ben S. Stephansky
 Ambassador-designate Douglas Henderson
 Mr. Teodoro Moscoso, Coordinator for the Alliance for Progress
 Mr. Ragnar Arnesen, Acting Director, Office of West Coast Affairs, AID
 Mr. Herbert B. Thompson, Acting Director, Office of West Coast Affairs,
 Department of State
 Mr. Fernando A. Van Reigersberg (Interpreter)
 Mr. Donald F. Barnes (Interpreter)

The Foreign Minister said Bolivia was concerned that in 1962 Chile received six times the military assistance that went to Bolivia. The Foreign Minister said Bolivia did not want more military assistance but felt it desirable that military assistance to the two countries be in proportion. He said he believed the disproportion in this assistance contributed to the lack of progress toward a solution of the unfortunate conflict between Chile and Bolivia.

The Foreign Minister noted that Bolivia has two serious problems with Chile—the problem of the Lauca River and that of access to the sea. Mr. Fellman said he believed that the exertion of U.S. influence at an appropriate moment—and he wished to emphasize that he had said at an appropriate moment—would be a critical factor in achieving a solution. He said the dispute with Chile is a factor making for unrest in that part of the continent. He said that Bolivia was willing to go half-way to seek a solution and hoped that it might count on U.S. support at the right moment.

¹ Bolivian-Chilean relations. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, President's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.

The President inquired how far from agreement the Foreign Minister felt he was and what evidence there was that Chile was ready to make concessions. The Foreign Minister said that the two countries were not far from an acceptable solution on the Lauca River problem. However, on the problem of Bolivian access to the sea, which he described as closely related to the Lauca problem, the two countries were much farther apart. He said that on the access problem Bolivia only asks Chilean fulfillment of a commitment made in 1946 and reiterated in 1950 when Chile proposed negotiations looking toward satisfying Bolivian aspirations for her own sovereign access to the sea in return for non-territorial compensation.

On the matter of military assistance President Kennedy said we have only committed about $57 million in the whole Hemisphere in the past year. We have continued this program, with some reluctance, on the grounds that the military would certainly be getting some matériel from somewhere in any case, and we have given special emphasis in this program to civic action.

Mr. Martin explained that in total Chile has received more military assistance than Bolivia. However, much of this was provided Chile prior to 1961 when our program was geared toward continental defense and much of it has been for assistance to the Chilean Navy. Since 1961 our military assistance program has been reoriented away from continental defense. In fact FY 1963 military aid furnished Chile was no greater on a per capita basis than that provided Bolivia, whereas Bolivia received more economic aid per capita than any other Latin American country. Mr. Fellman referred to reports that economic aid to Chile last year was higher per capita than aid to Bolivia. Mr. Martin said such a calculation would have had to include our earlier extraordinary assistance to Chile for rehabilitation of areas of earthquake devastation.

President Kennedy said that even given this explanation, we would certainly bear in mind the Bolivian concern about our military assistance program. He did not know whether the time would ever come when the United States could be helpful in restoring good relations between Bolivia and Chile. However, he assured the Foreign Minister of our desire to be helpful should the time come when it is generally believed that we can be.

President Paz interjected that he would not want the Foreign Minister's statement that Bolivia was not seeking more military assistance to be taken as absolute, since most of the military assistance for Bolivia goes into a very effective civic action program.

18. Memorandum of conversation, October 22, among Kennedy, President Paz, and U.S. and Bolivian officials¹

Part III (of 3)

October 22, 1963

SUBJECT

Meeting between President Kennedy and President Paz of Bolivia: Bolivia—The Alliance for Progress; US Aid Programs; COMIBOL; Petroleum; Tin Smelter

PARTICIPANTS

Bolivia

President Victor Paz Estenssoro
Minister of Foreign Relations José Fellman Velarde
Minister of National Economy Alfonso Gumucio Reyes
Ambassador Enrique Sanchez de Lozada
Mr. José Paz, President of Bolivian Oil Enterprise (YPFB)
Mr. Jorge Paz, President Paz' uncle
Mr. Raul Vivado (Interpreter)

United States

President Kennedy
Under Secretary George W. Ball
Mr. Ralph A. Dungan, Special Assistant to the President
Assistant Secretary Edwin M. Martin
Ambassador Ben S. Stephansky
Ambassador-designate Douglas Henderson
Mr. Teodoro Moscoso, Coordinator for the Alliance for Progress
Mr. Ragnar Arnese, Acting Director, Office of West Coast Affairs, AID
Mr. Herbert B. Thompson, Acting Director, Office of West Coast Affairs,
Department of State
Mr. Fernando A. Van Reigersberg (Interpreter)
Mr. Donald F. Barnes (Interpreter)

President Kennedy invited President Paz' views on the situation in Bolivia, particularly in the mines. President Paz said that the rehabilitation of the nationalized mines is a prerequisite to Bolivian development. This has required that the Government impose its authority on the mine union extremists. He said the Government had been successful in this effort. However, with the Communist union leadership brought to heel, the rehabilitation effort must enter a new phase involving a technical approach to administrative reform.

The Bolivian Government has a suggestion for the beginning of this phase. Heretofore the Governments of the United States and West Germany and the Inter-American Development Bank, partners in the ¹ Alliance for Progress; U.S. aid to Bolivia; development assistance; petroleum. Confidential. 7 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Bolivia, Paz Visit, 10/63.

Triangular Operation for the rehabilitation of the state mines, have sought to deal with this problem through an Advisory Group in Bolivia. The difficulty is that, in addition to acting in a purely advisory capacity, the Advisory Group is made up of a heterogeneous group of technicians without a sense of organizational responsibility and loyalty. These people are rather like international civil servants. They have been recruited as individuals for a relatively brief period and will then move on to other employment. The Bolivian Government believes that an effective beginning of the administrative reform phase could be made by contracting a business firm to administer a group of the COMIBOL mines. This might be on the basis of a fixed fee with a bonus for production increases. This would have to be accomplished by means of a contract under which the business firm would administer the mines for the Government. There can be no question of denationalization, which is not to be considered. It would be well to begin with a limited group of mines. This would be a step toward decentralization of the vast state mining enterprise and would provide a test of the effectiveness of the arrangement. If it is successful, further efforts can be made in the same direction. If not, other approaches will have to be tried. In response to President Kennedy's question, President Paz said that the problem of achieving more efficient production in the mines had originally been one of labor discipline but that this problem has been overcome and the problem now is one of effective management.

President Kennedy inquired whether an American firm contracted for this purpose would be resisted as exploiters; would it be preferable to get a Canadian, German, French or other firm? President Paz said either alternative would be acceptable. He said that just as the trade union leaders have not received support in their resistance because the Government had allowed attitudes to mature and a consensus to develop before acting, so there is now a consensus for more efficient operation of the mines. President Kennedy said we would examine this proposal and be in touch with the President concerning it after his talks with the Inter-American Bank and others.

President Paz said the matter of the mines was the most important problem; however, there are others. He said the Minister of Economy would be talking to the World Bank and to Mr. Moscoso about some problems connected with roads.

President Paz then drew attention to the problem of petroleum. He said the Bolivian Government had pursued a very realistic petroleum policy. Bolivia has opened her doors to private capital in this field, and a number of private companies are at work. The Gulf Petroleum Company has found oil. At the same time the Bolivian Government wants to preserve the state petroleum company (YPFB) to supply the internal market while allowing Gulf to produce for export. Certain problems have arisen because YPFB must conduct exploration in order to be able to supply the domestic market. Failing that, significant amounts of foreign exchange will have to be spent for petroleum imports.

President Kennedy inquired about the status of Gulf's offer to loan $5 million to YPFB and the question of whether Gulf can sell natural gas to companies engaged in production for export. With regard to the latter problem, he said large companies operating internationally do have a problem of precedents inasmuch as actions taken in one place affect their situation elsewhere. He hoped that something could be worked out to permit Gulf to begin exporting because this will provide important new foreign exchange earnings. President Paz expressed confidence that a solution to the problem with Gulf would be worked out. He said the Government was preparing a decree which they would be showing to Gulf. The Government believed that it would be appropriate to permit Gulf to make sales directly to new companies entering Bolivia to produce for export and which would be consumers of large quantities of natural gas. President Paz said that Bolivia needs the loans both from the United States Government and from Gulf.

President Kennedy said he understood that we would be able to make our decision on the basis of the DeGolyer-McNaughton report which will be submitted next month and that meanwhile the Bolivian Government will be talking with Gulf in the hope of working something out.

President Paz observed that any loan from the United States Government to YPFB had psychological impact out of all proportion to its financial magnitude. He said such a loan, because of its great psychological value, would be very helpful in connection with a Government agreement with Gulf.

The Minister of Economy introduced himself as the expert in negotiations with the United States. He said he did not know why this should be so, since he speaks no English, but he has been successful in these negotiations and over the past years U.S. aid has come to help the Bolivian economy. He described Bolivia's situation as one great mining camp with very limited work opportunities in other fields. President Paz is anxious to provide new job opportunities. Thanks to U.S. help, Bolivia has contracted for engineering studies of the roads on which her future depends. Naturally the inauguration of projects such as road construction takes time. This means that there is an anguishing delay between the first consideration of these projects and their actual inauguration. U.S. officials in the field are great friends of Bolivia and are doing all they can, but there are many delays in the program which create problems. The Bolivian Government believes the program should be accelerated to permit the Government to meet the promises it has made to its people. Mr. Gumucio pointed out the interim help obtained in the form of a public works program last year, though small, had been very helpful. He said that interim help of the same character was badly needed to cover the next 18 months or so because the Alliance is not fully under way. Its machinery is still being built.

On the other hand, the Peace Corps, of which the Minister said he had originally been very skeptical, has been a genuine success. Americans are present in the villages and jungle areas of Bolivia sharing the day-to-day life of the Bolivian people. Civic action programs also have been successful. Nevertheless there remains a requirement for activity to fill the waiting period and the Alliance should be more flexible with fewer rigid requirements for an endless series of feasibility and other studies.

President Kennedy remarked that he believed Mr. Moscoso had heard this before. Mr. Moscoso said we are doing better in Bolivia. For example, in August we signed $17 million in loans. There are delays but they are not greater than elsewhere nor are they unusual given the extremely difficult problems posed by Bolivian topography. It is true that the new roads under construction are the hope of the future. This is demonstrated by the important impact of the Cochabamba-Santa Cruz Highway. However, there will soon be not this one but seven or eight roads from the highlands to the eastern lowlands. Naturally there are difficulties. We are using aerial photography for surveys and bad weather delays completion of these studies. On the other hand, activity is under way. Contracts for the construction of the first of these roads should be let in about six months. The El Alto road should be contracted out next April or May and the El Alto warehouse construction in four or five months. The latter was delayed for lack of a decision as to where it should be located. El Alto Airport is about finished, although we must now consult with the FAA on a possible runway extension since Panagra says it believes an extension will be required in order to permit jet service. Mr. Moscoso observed that elections are in the offing in Bolivia and that perhaps with their advent we shall see a more rapid utilization of public works monies the United States has already made available. In any case, it seems clear that such action would help in the situation the Minister described.

President Kennedy asked whether it was Mr. Gumucio's feeling that feasibility studies were not required. The Minister said he had been working in the engineering field for some 24 years, although not an engineer, and was well aware of the necessity for feasibility studies. On the other hand, he believed that if given the funds he could have the feasibility studies done in half the time presently required. He said these delays have serious effects. For example a road study project under way last year has now become bogged down and if the problem is not resolved it will be necessary to lay off some 300 or 400 workers, each of whom has several mouths to feed. President Kennedy suggested that we look into the problem of this road very carefully.

President Paz said that with regard to the Alliance it is apparent that at the outset the United States lacked the machinery to implement its new approach to Latin America just as the Latin American countries lacked machinery for taking full advantage of it. Nevertheless, both sides are improving. There is great concern, however, at the attitude of the U.S. Congress toward the Alliance. The history of the Alliance might be summarized as follows: First, President Kennedy's speech launching the Alliance; then delays in its implementation; finally, action which has led to popular belief in the Alliance. This confidence in the Alliance is in the interest of Latin American governments and of the United States Government. However, if Congressional cuts are made in Alliance funds, the effect will be very disillusioning. The President said he agreed completely and hoped President Paz would express himself in exactly these terms to the Congressional leaders with whom he would be in contact. He noted that some success has been achieved in restoration of Alliance funds and we shall continue to attempt to obtain the funds needed.

President Paz referred to Bolivia's long-standing desire for a tin smelter. He said Bolivia was asking that the United States finance a study of the feasibility of a Bolivian tin smelter. This would require no new funds. One million dollars remain of monies previously authorized for feasibility studies. The Bolivian Government would like to devote these funds to contracting a United States firm to study the feasibility of a tin smelter. President Paz added that the political effect in Bolivia of mentioning a tin smelter in the joint communiqué would be very great. Mr. Moscoso pointed out that we already have a flotation research project under way seeking to improve methods of treating Bolivian ores. The Bureau of Mines has sent a man to Bolivia in connection with this project. President Kennedy asked to be informed when the results of that study might be expected in order that this matter might be considered further. He expressed his appreciation for this opportunity of talking with President Paz and looked forward to the opportunity to continue the discussion on the following day.

19. Memorandum of conversation, October 23, among Kennedy, President Paz, and U.S. and Bolivian officials¹

Part I (of 4)

October 23, 1963

SUBJECT

Meeting between President Kennedy and President Paz of Bolivia: Cuban Subversion

PARTICIPANTS

Bolivia

President Victor Paz Estenssoro
Minister of Foreign Relations José Fellman Velarde
Minister of National Economy Alfonso Gumucio Reyes
Ambassador Enrique Sanchez de Lozada
Dr. Carlos Serrate Reich, Private Secretary to President Paz
Under Secretary for Foreign Relations Luis Alberto Alipaz
Mr. Jorge Paz, President Paz' uncle
Mr. José Paz, President of Bolivian Oil Enterprise (YPFB)
Mr. Raul Vivado (Interpreter)

United States

President Kennedy
Under Secretary George W. Ball
Mr. Ralph A. Dungan, Special Assistant to the President
Assistant Secretary Edwin M. Martin
Ambassador Ben S. Stephansky
Ambassador-designate Douglas Henderson
Mr. Teodoro Moscoso, Coordinator for the Alliance for Progress
Mr. Ragnar Arnesen, Acting Director, Office of West Coast Affairs, AID
Mr. Herbert B. Thompson, Acting Director, Office of West Coast Affairs,
Department of State
Mr. Fernando A. Van Reigersberg (Interpreter)
Mr. Donald F. Barnes (Interpreter)

After the Presidents had agreed on the text of the joint communiqué, President Kennedy asked Mr. Martin to discuss the matter of the control of travel to and from Cuba. Mr. Martin described the high priority we give to efforts directed at controlling Cuban subversion in Latin America. A key measure for the control of Cuban subversion is travel control. He noted that many governments have constitutional problems in controlling the travel of their citizens. At the same time, the difficulties have been somewhat lessened by success in isolating Cuba through a reduction in channels of communications. At present, the only regular direct air service between Cuba and other hemisphere countries is Cubana Airlines' Mexico-Habana flight. The Mexican Government has agreed to cooperate with any hemisphere government which requests Mexico to seek to control the travel to Cuba of the nationals of the other country by requiring such documentation as the other government considers necessary. In the face of this situation, Castro is making every effort to establish alternate means of communications. So far, he has not been successful. It will be recalled that the group of American students who managed to make their way to Cuba earlier this year were obliged to travel by an extremely circuitous route which involved long delays. This is an example of the kind of difficulty Castro is experiencing in this regard. We assign importance to efforts to control this travel because it is clear that people undergoing training in Cuba prior to the missile crisis are now ready to return to their own countries where they can make the kind of violent trouble we now see in Caracas. These people will return with subversive skills such as the manufacture of Molotov cocktails and other explosive devices. We have seen a recent increase in bomb-throwings in Colombia and are now beginning to see some of the same sort of thing in Ecuador.

¹ Cuban subversion. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, President's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.

President Paz said the Bolivian Government was interested in preventing or reducing the movement of students who go to Cuba not for academic study but for subversive training. He said his Government had some proof that training in guerrilla tactics is going on. However, the movement of these trainees goes on not only via Mexico but via Arica. He pointed out that Bolivian citizens do not need travel documents to go to Arica and that Cuban air service exists between Arica and Habana.

Mr. Martin said that it was our understanding that the only regular air service with Cuba is that from Mexico and it would seem likely that irregular flights from Arica would make stops in Mexico because of the difficulties of flying non-stop.

President Paz said Bolivia would take up this matter with Mexico but he believed the Arica air link was of importance. President Kennedy said we would certainly want to look into the Arica problem and be in further touch with the Bolivian Government about it. It would seem, however, that if each government in the hemisphere required its citizens to have passports with visas for Cuba in order to travel there, control would be greatly simplified.

There was some mention of Cuban flights to Brazil. Mr. Martin said we are watching those very carefully and that they have proved to be occasional flights undertaken with some other excuse. So far, there is no regular air service between Cuba and Brazil.

The Foreign Minister emphasized that it is in Bolivia's own interest to stop the flow of Bolivian youth to Cuba and gave assurances Bolivia would take the measures necessary for this purpose.

President Paz said that the traditional enemies of the MNR have been political rightists. This has changed rapidly. Opposition from the right is being eliminated or reduced to ineffectiveness, whereas increasingly the enemies of the revolution are those of the extreme left. This political development is one reason for Bolivian Government action on this travel problem. While there is no terrorism in Bolivia now, there may be tomorrow.

20. Memorandum of conversation, October 23, among Kennedy, President Paz, and U.S. and Bolivian officials¹

Part II (of 4)

October 23, 1963

SUBJECT

Meeting between President Kennedy and President Paz of Bolivia: Communist Propaganda

PARTICIPANTS

Bolivia

President Victor Paz Estenssoro
 Minister of Foreign Relations José Fellman Velarde
 Minister of National Economy Alfonso Gumucio Reyes
 Ambassador Enrique Sanchez de Lozada
 Dr. Carlos Serrate Reich, Private Secretary to President Paz
 Under Secretary for Foreign Relations Luis Alberto Alipaz
 Mr. Jorge Paz, President Paz' uncle
 Mr. José Paz, President of Bolivian Oil Enterprise (YPFB)
 Mr. Raul Vivado (Interpreter)

United States

President Kennedy
 Under Secretary George W. Ball
 Mr. Ralph A. Dungan, Special Assistant to the President
 Assistant Secretary Edwin M. Martin
 Ambassador Ben S. Stephansky
 Ambassador-designate Douglas Henderson
 Mr. Teodoro Moscoso, Coordinator for the Alliance for Progress
 Mr. Ragnar Arnesen, Acting Director, Office of West Coast Affairs, AID
 Mr. Herbert B. Thompson, Acting Director, Office of West Coast Affairs,
 Department of State
 Mr. Fernando A. Van Reigersberg (Interpreter)
 Mr. Donald F. Barnes (Interpreter)

¹ Communist propaganda. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, President's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.

President Paz remarked that, interestingly enough, a significant amount of communist propaganda reaches Bolivia via United States universities. President Paz agreed that this material was being sent by student groups rather than by the universities themselves. He could not identify the groups sending the material but said it reached Bolivian universities, where communists are quite strong, as second-class mail.

President Kennedy said we would want to look into the matter, and President Paz agreed to furnish more specific information about U.S. sources. President Kennedy inquired whether Bolivia receives substantial quantities of propaganda from the Soviet Union and Cuba. President Paz said the volume of such propaganda was large but that it did not reach its addressees. He said the Government had a problem akin to that of the United States with its agricultural surpluses in trying to handle this propaganda material. President Kennedy inquired about the effectiveness of USIS and the Voice of America. President Paz said local radio programs produced by USIS in Bolivia, such as the very useful "Cronica", were more effective in Bolivia than the Voice.

21. Memorandum of conversation, October 23, among Kennedy, President Paz, and U.S. and Bolivian officials¹

Part III (of 4)

October 23, 1963

SUBJECT

Meeting between President Kennedy and President Paz of Bolivia: US Aid Program; COMIBOL; Alliance for Progress

PARTICIPANTS

Bolivia

President Victor Paz Estenssoro

Minister of Foreign Relations José Fellman Velarde

Minister of National Economy Alfonso Gumucio Reyes

Ambassador Enrique Sanchez de Lozada

Dr. Carlos Serrate Reich, Private Secretary to President Paz

Under Secretary for Foreign Relations Luis Alberto Alipaz

Mr. Jorge Paz, President Paz' uncle

Mr. José Paz, President of Bolivian Oil Enterprise (YPFB)

Mr. Raul Vivado (Interpreter)

¹ Alliance for Progress; U.S. assistance. Confidential. 5 pp. DOS, President's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.

United States

President Kennedy

Under Secretary George W. Ball

Mr. Ralph A. Dungan, Special Assistant to the President

Assistant Secretary Edwin M. Martin

Ambassador Ben S. Stephansky

Ambassador-designate Douglas Henderson

Mr. Teodoro Moscoso, Coordinator for the Alliance for Progress

Mr. Ragnar Arnesen, Acting Director, Office of West Coast Affairs, AID

Mr. Herbert B. Thompson, Acting Director, Office of West Coast Affairs,

Department of State

Mr. Fernando A. Van Reigersberg (Interpreter)

Mr. Donald F. Barnes (Interpreter)

President Kennedy suggested that the discussion return to some of the items considered in the previous day's conversation. He asked Mr. Moscoso what had been worked out in the interim.

Mr. Moscoso said it had been agreed in July that AID would send an engineer to look into the matter of road no. 2 when requested to do so by the Bolivian Government. Now that Mr. Gumucio has made the request, an engineer will be sent immediately. The problem of a management contract for a group of state (COMIBOL) mines had been discussed with President Paz and Felipe Herrera, President of the Inter-American Development Bank. The Bank has the names of a number of management firms, one of which will be agreed upon with Dr. Bedregal, the President of COMIBOL, when he comes to Washington. It has been generally agreed that President Paz' idea of utilizing this firm for a limited number of mines is very good.

Mr. Moscoso added that financial controls in COMIBOL are also necessary. There is no requirement that the firms that have been involved in discussions of this matter to date should be used, but some firm of good reputation should be selected not only to train COMIBOL people in financial control procedures but actually to keep COMIBOL accounting up to date in the interim period. The need for improved financial controls has been agreed upon with Dr. Bedregal but there are disagreements over how much improvements should cost and with regard to personnel to be trained. AID and the IDB are willing to finance the training of COMIBOL employees in financial control techniques for the one-year period considered necessary.

President Paz said he would like to make one clarification with regard to Minister Gumucio's remarks of the day before. The Bolivian Government thinks that regulations—not persons—impede progress. No one could seek to be more helpful than U.S. officials like Mr. Moscoso. However, the problem is to establish which requirements are really necessary and which others can be dropped in the interest of speed and flexibility.

In this connection President Paz said he did not consider the Lleras-Kubitschek proposals concerning the Alliance as a solution. Implementation of their proposals would only involve new delays. Ultimately the decisions must be made by the United States. Dr. Paz said he had told Kubitschek as much when he was in La Paz. Moreover, he said, in any organizational structure controlled by the Latin Americans, Argentina, Brazil, and Chile are going to take the lion's share of Alliance help without regard for the problems of the smaller countries. The Bolivian Government definitely prefers to deal bilaterally with the United States with regard to the Alliance.

Mr. Moscoso said we had thought it desirable that Latin Americans be more involved in the Alliance. He expressed the opinion that the CID could, if organized, make recommendations on procedures as to how to accelerate the Alliance effort. He noted that it was precisely in response to a request to Dr. Lleras and Mr. Kubitschek for recommendations on such procedures that they had produced their report recommending the CID. On the other hand, he noted that AID is improving its procedures. Regional administrators now have authority to approve loans up to $2.5 million and he would like to redelegate that authority to the field.

President Paz said this was a notion Bolivia had favored for some time. The people in the field know the problems and are capable of dealing with them. Referral to Washington inevitably involves delays because Washington is dealing with the problems of the world.

President Kennedy wondered how many of the delays were due to statutory limitations, how many were the result of Congressional caprice, and how many had been created by the country involved. Mr. Moscoso noted that long lists of statutory criteria must be satisfied for the approval of a single project and someone must certify on each point that we are not violating the law. Some of our requirements are related to our serious balance of payments problem.

President Kennedy inquired about Bolivia's balance of trade with the United States. President Paz said Bolivia imports from the United States about ten times its exports to the United States. It was observed that the difference is made up of loans, direct investments, and sales to Europe.

President Kennedy said it was precisely on the basis of situations like this that he had made the point to Congress that Latin American trade is so oriented that the dollar loss involved in the Alliance effort is much less significant than in the case of Europe.

President Paz said Bolivia was experiencing some difficulty in the use of dollar aid. Not only do existing documentation requirements involve delays but purchases of certain items in the United States are significantly more expensive than elsewhere. Tires, vehicles, milk and milk products are prominent examples. This has a cost-of-living effect which creates certain problems. He said a memorandum had been left with Mr. Moscoso on this subject. President Kennedy said that the problem is that in the last eight or nine years the U.S. has lost in the neighborhood of $15 billion. This creates tremendous pressure for cuts in the aid program and a retrenchment in our military security efforts. Moreover, if the loss were to continue at this rate it would seriously jeopardize the entire exchange system of the Western world.

Minister Gumucio said Bolivia expected to resolve difficulties on use of dollars by working with AID, although flexibility in the application of the procedures would be needed to avoid a sharp impact on prices.

President Paz said that Bolivia is now sending some 5,000 tons of tin ore a year to Wah Chang in Texas City. It seems that Wah Chang is not in good financial condition. As a result Wah Chang is unable to make advances on ore shipments. The transactions with them thus turn out to be less advantageous than those with the British smelters. These advances on ore shipments are extremely important because there is a six-month delay before final settlement for ores shipped to the smelters. As a result the Bolivian Government has a need to finance the maintenance of this ore pipeline. A similar problem is the financing of the Bolivian sugar harvest. At present counterpart funds are used to finance the harvest but this immobilizes funds which otherwise might be used for development purposes for which they are badly needed. The Bolivian Government has tried to interest Grace in financing this harvest because Grace is the sugar distributor in Bolivia, but Grace is not willing to substitute its financing for the present system of counterpart financing. Mr. Moscoso said that these are essentially commercial banking problems and we are exploring the possibilities of interesting U.S. banks in doing this financing. It may be possible to use the investment guaranty to encourage this. We are also talking to the International Monetary Fund about these problems.

President Paz said he would like to endorse Mr. Gumucio's remarks in the previous meeting concerning the need to fill the gap between the present and the full-scale work on large projects. Last year's $3 million for public works had been very useful and very visible. Mr. Moscoso said that we were prepared to look at projects of this kind. He suggested that an effort be made to combine public works projects with the layoff of surplus workers from COMIBOL.

President Paz said that this could be done to some extent but not completely. The fact is that miners tend to be miners for life and are not easily transferred to other employment. A much better device for absorbing excess COMIBOL workers is the expansion of private mining activities on the basis of credits from the Mining Bank. He agreed that U.S. funds were available for the bank, once prerequisites have been met, and acknowledged that responsibility for the delay was on the Bolivian side.

22. Memorandum of conversation, November 20, between Kennedy and Ambassador Henderson¹

November 20, 1963

SUBJECT

Ambassador Henderson's Mission to Bolivia

PARTICIPANTS

The President
Ambassador Douglas Henderson

The President inquired about President Paz and we discussed generally President Paz' helpful attitude toward the Alliance for Progress.

I told the President that I had recently been in New York and Pittsburgh discussing the possibility of private investment in Bolivia with American businessmen. The President inquired about business attitudes after the Argentine action on American oil investment. I said that the American businessmen with whom I had spoken generally took the view that the Bolivian climate for private investment could be distinguished from the Argentine situation. We also spoke briefly of the privileged position of some American private investors in foreign countries, particularly in the extractive industries.

The President then inquired about the living conditions in La Paz connecting this with the possibility of a visit by him to Bolivia as well as to Chile and Peru early in 1964. He also inquired about whether a visit to one of the three countries would affect his reception in another. I said that no American President to my knowledge had ever visited Bolivia and that he would be sure of a very hospitable reception there. I suggested that he should consider visiting Bolivia first and then going to Peru before visiting Chile, since Chilean-Bolivian relations at the present time are strained.

The President authorized me to say to President Paz he remembered his commitment to visit Bolivia and that he is considering the possibility of such a visit shortly.

¹ Discussion of Henderson's mission to Bolivia. Confidential. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Bolivia, General, 8/63-1/64.

Chile

23. Memorandum of conversation, February 20, between Rusk and Ambassador Mueller¹

February 20, 1961

SUBJECT

Financial Assistance to Chile

PARTICIPANTS

The Secretary
Chilean Ambassador Walter Mueller
Mr. Fausto Soto, Minister, Chilean Embassy
Mr. Samuel O. Lane, WST
Robert M. Phillips, WST

In the course of a courtesy call on the Secretary, the Chilean Ambassador mentioned the credits which the Chilean financial mission had recently negotiated with the International Monetary Fund and United States official and private lending institutions. He also said that he had discussed with Under Secretary Ball the pending request for appropriation of $100 million for Chilean reconstruction and had expressed the hope that this would be made available as soon as possible.

The Secretary said we were experiencing something of a legislative log jar, largely because many important domestic bills were being considered, but we hoped to be able to act promptly in presenting the appropriation request for Chilean reconstruction. He asked what progress Chile was making towards meeting the housing problem, and also what was being done in the agricultural sector.

The Ambassador briefly outlined the operation of the Caja Central which had been set up to encourage the growth of private savings and loan associations as a means to encourage private investment in housing. He pointed out that Chile was carrying on an extensive agricultural colonization scheme which involved substantial elements of agrarian reform. He went on to mention Chile's new 10-year development plan and also expressed the idea that the same amount of economic development assistance now being extended to the underdeveloped countries could do much more if there were better coordination among the various lending agencies, both United States and international. The Ambassador considered that it was particularly desirable that project credits be made available to cover all costs, including local currency costs, and that the International Cooperation Administration's participant training programs should be related to the needs of development projects.

¹ Financial assistance to Chile. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 725.5-MSP/2-2061.

The Secretary, commenting that coordination was desirable but not always easily achieved, suggested that perhaps the coordination of credits from a number of sources could be best effected by the recipient country. For our part, he added, we were studying a plan for more effective integration of the activities of United States official lending institutions.

24. Memorandum from Achilles to Berle, April 13¹

April 13, 1961

SUBJECT

Chile

Perhaps the principal cause of the equivocal Chilean attitude toward the Cuban problem is the political fragmentation of the country. You recall that Alessandri, the rightist candidate, was elected with only 32 per cent of the popular vote, and largely due to the number of competing leftist candidates. Of the three parties supporting his Government, the largest (Radicals) has both rightist and leftist factions, and gives the Government only conditional support. Related to this situation is the desire of the Government and Alessandri not to rock the boat by doing anything which would cause avoidable controversy or criticism, particularly from the left. The Chilean government has shown itself not only unwilling to take any stand against Castro, but similarly unwilling to take measures against domestic communists or international communist meetings or visits in Chile.

Alessandri, furthermore, is both extremely stubborn and reluctant to take advice from anyone.

While we should continue, of course, to work on the Chileans along the usual lines in Santiago, here, and in the UN, I doubt that we can expect much improvement in the Chilean attitude except (1) as part of a general improvement in Latin American opinion, or (2) from some development in direct Cuban-Chilean relations, such, for example, as in the discovery of incriminating documents in the Cuban Embassy as happened in Peru and El Salvador.

¹ Chilean attitude toward Cuban problem; aid to Chile Christian Democratic Party. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, Task Force on Latin America Files: Lot 61 D 298, Chile.

In the longer run and less directly, we have our assistance in Chilean earthquake reconstruction to work with. The best approach here will be one of flexibility in permitting the Chileans to use our aid along lines which will contribute to social and economic development in the devastated areas rather than simple reconstruction. We will also want to keep urging the Chilean Government to get on with the implementing of the Act of Bogotá. The Government should be receptive, since apparently the principal losses which the rightist parties suffered in the March elections to the Popular Action Front were in areas where the need for land reform is greatest.

Probably the principal group to which we should give attention is the Christian Democratic Party. In the March elections it increased its strength in the Senate from 2 to 5, while it slipped in the Chamber from 25 to 23. Party leaders have recently concluded that while it is gradually gaining strength, the prospects of single-handedly electing a president in the foreseeable future are dim, and that they should therefore develop alliances with other groups, including the Conservatives (largely clerical) and the Radicals (anti-clerical). Party President Eduardo Frei is expected here before long and will be worth cultivating. This will have to be done discretely to avoid ruffling Alessandri.

Two things which are applicable in Chile should be of wider application: One is that the lack of unity and drive on the part of coalitions might well be remedied, with significant concrete political benefits by active political action to implement the Act of Bogotá. The other is that we should presumably include Christian Democratic parties, at least in some countries, among those popular parties whose development we wish to encourage.

25. Memorandum of conversation, April 17, between Dillon and Agriculture Minister Casanueva¹

April 17, 1961

PARTICIPANTS

Secretary Dillon
Manuel Casanueva, Minister of Agriculture of Chile
Luis Mackenna, Central Bank of Chile
C. R. Harley
A. M. Rosenson

TIME & PLACE

April 14, 1961, Copacabana Palace Hotel, Rio de Janeiro

Minister Casanueva thanked the Secretary for the opportunity of speaking to him. He said Chile is now going through a process of economic adjustment and planning for the future. Inflation has been brought under control. The cost of living last year rose only between 5% and 6% and the exchange rate has been kept steady for the last two years.

The Minister expressed his pleasure with the Kennedy plan for economic development and technical assistance which, in its broad outlines, accords closely with the Chilean Government's thinking on these subjects. Chile has formulated a 10-year plan for economic and social development which is directed toward an improvement in the standard of living of the Chilean people. This plan is the result of careful studies made by the Chilean Development Corporation in collaboration with the Ministries of Agriculture and Economy and other Chilean Government agencies and with the help of the FAO, Point IV and ECLA.

The Minister expressed his thanks for the help received from the United States for rehabilitation from the effects of last year's earthquake. The earthquake affected not only the area immediately involved but the whole Chilean economy and resulted in a loss equal to total investment in Chile in a year, or about $500 million.

Minister Casanueva then referred to the $100 million credit now being considered by the U.S. Congress. He said it was important that this credit be used not only for construction but also for economic development; the two are inextricably linked. He hoped that it would be possible for our Congress to enact this legislation before May 21st, on which date the President of Chile goes before Congress with his annual message. As in other democratic countries, the Chilean Government has an active political opposition, including opposition from the extreme left and Communists. Should the U.S. Congress fail to appropriate the money by that date, the Administration of President Alessandri would be subject to severe criticism from these elements. Therefore, it is very important that in his message to the Congress President Alessandri be able to announce the granting of the credit.

¹ Chilean economic adjustment and planning for the future. Official Use Only. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 611.25/4-1761.

The Minister then said that the Chilean Government had under consideration two programs in the field of agriculture: (1) "colonization", involving the sub-division of large tracts of land both public and private, which are being inadequately utilized; and (2) assistance to small agricultural proprietors at the lower income levels. He said that they have applied for assistance on the first program from the Inter-American Development Bank, to be made available from the Bogota funds, and expect to submit an application on the second program.

The Minister said that among other less important problems was a request for a $5 million credit from the Export-Import Bank for the purchase of agricultural equipment. Such a loan would be used in much the same way as the $5 million which the Central Bank had previously received from the Export-Import Bank to assist small and medium-sized businesses to purchase industrial equipment.

The Secretary said that he was happy to have the opportunity to speak to the Minister and to obtain the Chilean point of view. He said he had the greatest respect and admiration for President Alessandri's program of development and stabilization. The Chilean achievement has indeed been remarkable.

The Secretary added that he hopes it will be possible for the legislation on the $100 million to be enacted by May 21st. He said he would pass on the information given him by Minister Casanueva to the State Department and others in Washington, with a view to expediting action. This information provided a good reason for the Executive Branch to prod the Congress into somewhat faster action. However, he intimated that there should be no insuperable obstacle in the way of obtaining the funds by that date. In fact, he would have ventured the opinion that the bill would be through Congress by June 1 in any event.

As regards the small pending loan application with the Export-Import Bank which the Minister had mentioned, the Secretary said he would take this matter up with Mr. Linder and ask him to look into it.

Referring to the Minister's remarks regarding Chile's programs in the field of agricultural development, the Secretary said that the U.S. Government is very much interested in this field and that these are just the type of programs that the Bogota funds were intended for. Hence, there is every reason to believe that Chile's applications in the IDB for this purpose will receive careful attention from the Bank as soon as it receives its share of the Bogota funds. He reminded his listeners, however, that these funds are not to be used for the purchase of land, which the Minister assured the Secretary was well understood.

Alexander M. Rosenson

26. Memorandum of conversation, June 2, between Barall and Chargé Soto¹

June 2, 1961

SUBJECT

Difficulties in Programming U.S. Assistance for Chilean Reconstruction

PARTICIPANTS

Deputy Assistant Secretary Barall, ARA
Chilean Chargé d'Affaires Fausto Soto
Mr. Jorge Burr, Minister Counselor, Chilean Embassy
Mr. Jose Zabala, Attaché, Chilean Embassy
Mr. Joseph Carwell, Acting Director, WST
Robert M. Phillips, WST

After expressing his Government's warm appreciation for the generosity of the U.S. in appropriating the $100 million for Chilean reconstruction and rehabilitation, Mr. Soto asked Mr. Zabala to explain some of the difficulties which had arisen between representatives of the Chilean Government and the United States Operations Mission concerning the proposed utilization of this assistance. Mr. Zabala said the GOC was having a hard time adjusting to the views of the USOM that "rehabilitation" should be narrowly defined and that emphasis should be placed on the concentration of projects in order to achieve maximum public impact. He also feared that the strict administrative requirements of the USOM might delay the execution of agreed projects.

Mr. Barall pointed out that the USOM's position was not necessarily an unreasonable one. In the interest of our aid programs in Chile and elsewhere, ICA had to be guided by the intent of Congress as established not only in the law but also in the legislative history. We expected, nevertheless, to be fairly flexible with regard to defining “rehabilitation,” so long as it could be shown that effective use was being made of the money and that it was not diverted to unrelated projects outside the devastated area. Concerning the concentration of projects, past experience had demonstrated that our Congress wanted our development assistance devoted to durable, easily identifiable projects rather than to a number of scattered, small projects which might involve funds from various sources. Basically, what the USOM wanted, in the interest of Chile and other aid-recipient countries, was to be able to show our Congress that our assistance was being effectively utilized.

¹ Difficulties in programming U.S. assistance for Chilean reconstruction. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 725.5-MSP/6-261.

Mr. Barall went on to state that we expected to know within the next week the terms and conditions to be offered to the GOC for this loan, and we hoped that these would be considered advantageous. We intended to do everything possible to expedite the necessary administrative procedures, and for this purpose ICA was appointing a well-qualified man who would work full time on this program. Being a separate piece of legislation, the loan was not subject to the administrative requirements of the Mutual Security Act, and this should expedite matters.

Mr. Carwell stated that our Ambassador at Santiago would be instructed to negotiate the corresponding bilateral agreement.

Mr. Soto expressed appreciation for this information and said he would leave with us an aide memoire. [Attached to this aide memoire, dated June 2, are copies of a memorandum of a meeting held on May 5 between representatives of the GOC and USOM, and a letter from the USOM Housing Division to the Ministry of Public Works dated May 16. These documents were cited by the Chileans as illustrating the difficulties mentioned by Mr. Zabala.]

27. Memorandum of conversation, October 10, between President Kennedy and Foreign Minister Martinez¹

October 10, 1961

SUBJECT

Interview—President Kennedy and Chilean Foreign Minister Carlos Martinez Sotomayor

PARTICIPANTS

The President
Mr. Wymberley DeR. Coerr,
Acting Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs
Mr. F. van Reigersberg, LS interpreter

Sr. Carlos Martinez Foreign Minister
Ambassador Walter Muller

1. Recent Political Changes in Chile

The Foreign Minister explained to the President the significance of the entrance of the Radical Party into President Alessandri's Administration. Together with the Conservatives and Liberals, the Administration now has more than 60% of Congress behind it. The Radical Party is of the "democratic left" and has tenets very close to those of President Kennedy. The Alessandri Administration fully endorses the Alliance for Progress, and new Radical support means added support for the Alliance.

2. Alliance for Progress

The President said the US is prepared to give important help to Latin America during the next ten years, towards economic and social development. But it will be necessary to show the Alliance is a joint effort, with sacrifices from both sides, if the Congress and the American people are to support the Alliance.

The Foreign Minister described the new Chilean Ten-Year Development Plan, and told how it coincides with the President's ideas. Commissions comprised of Congressional representatives of the three Administration parties are currently studying planned legislation in agrarian reform, tax reform, customs revision, and administrative reorganization.

¹ Recent political changes in Chile; Alliance for Progress; economic development; land reform; Cuba. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, October–December 1961.

3. Economic Development

Under the Chilean Ten-Year Plan, per capita income would increase 25% in the decade. The Foreign Minister hopes this can be increased, as the people expect rapid social and economic progress and their patience is running short. He thanked the President for the favorable position taken by the US regarding a possible IBRD-sponsored consortium, which would aid the GOC in the Ten-Year Plan.

4. Land Reform in Chile

The Foreign Minister explained the program would be in stages, beginning with the GOC dividing public lands for distribution to the peasants. Second, the government would expropriate private lands which were not being utilized to the optimum. However, division of large estates must not lead to small, uneconomic holdings. Agricultural villages will be built complete with schools and credit institutions. Agrarian reform must be for the purpose of implementing social change, as well as improving the economic situation.

5. Cuba

According to the Foreign Minister, the US-sponsored invasion attempt had been a serious mistake, lowering US prestige. Opposition in Cuba to Castro seems to be increasing, for both political and economic reasons. More and more internal troubles will weaken Castro and eventually bring his downfall. It would be a serious error to take collective measures through the OAS.

The President asked the Minister's opinion on whether measures similar to those taken at San José against the Dominican Republic could be taken by the OAS if executions in Cuba continue.

The Foreign Minister believes the two situations are different. Nevertheless, if executions were to continue, consultations might be held very privately at the Foreign Minister level to determine if sanctions would be appropriate and, if so, their extent.

28. Instructions for Moscoso Mission, undated¹

undated

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE MOSCOSO MISSION

In response to requests made by the Government of Chile for U.S. assistance to meet its current foreign exchange crisis and support its Ten-Year Economic Development Plan, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Goodwin is authorized to commit the United States to a two-phased proposal of conditional U.S. financial assistance set forth below.

First, an offer of $80 million for development and capital projects partly within the Government of Chile's budget, conditional on Chile's putting into effective operation a stabilization plan agreed with the IMF and supported by IMF standby credits. These project loans would be provided by AID in the amount of $50 million and by the EXIM Bank in the amount of $30 million.

Second, an offer to help establish and through a long-term commitment of U.S. funds provide substantial financial assistance for a consortium organized to make available the external resource requirements of Chile's Ten-Year Economic Development Plan contingent on Chile's acceptance of the following conditions:

- acceptance and effective operation of a stabilization plan as outlined in the first phase of the U.S. assistance proposal.

- agreement with the U.S. or other mutually acceptable consortium manager on the plan as it may be modified in IBRD and Wise Men review.

- enactment of tax reform legislation to minimally increase public revenue to 16% of GNP.

- enactment of agrarian reform legislation that fulfills the pledge of Article 6, Title I of the Charter of Punta del Este.

If the Chileans indicate that they will not be able to accept the conditions without some indications of the amount of funds the United States would be willing to commit to their long term development plan, Mr. Goodwin will—at that time—inform them that funds in the rough order of magnitude of approximately 50% of the needed external resources can probably be provided by the U.S. if the rest is obtained from other countries and financing institutions.

If the Government of Chile accepts this two-phased offer of conditional U.S. assistance, Mr. Goodwin is authorized to invite the Government to send to Washington as soon as possible a Chilean financial delegation to develop and agree with the IMF on a stabilization plan.

¹ Two-phased proposal of conditional U.S. financial assistance to Chile. Confidential. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, January–June, 1962.

29. Telegram 746 from Santiago, March 8¹

Santiago, March 8, 1962

Priority. For Hamilton and Woodward. From Moscoso and Goodwin.

Following is text of agreement worked out with Chilean cabinet and which will be presented to Alessandri tonight.

1. The Government of the United States undertakes to extend to Chile loans up to $80 million for high priority economic and social development projects. The loans will be made available to Chile by the Agency for International Development (AID) and the Export-Import Bank. The loans will be available, subject to prior approval of each project in 1962 with no more than $40 million being made available before September 10.

2. The Government of Chile, for the achievement of its program of stabilization recognizes the need of reaching an agreement with the IMF which will permit it to draw at that time on standby credits from this Agency, simultaneously establishing the conditions under which other agencies or countries may be disposed to participate in the formation of the consortium destined to complete the financing of the external resources necessary for the public sector of the National Development Plan. The stabilization agreement will be concluded no later than September 10, 1962.

3. The Government of the United States also undertakes to participate in a consortium of international lending agencies and national governments which is to be constituted for the purpose of making long-term loan commitments to help finance specific projects approved pursuant to Chile's long-term development plan, after approval of such a plan by the nine-man panel of experts of the OAS which we understand will be finished by July 1962. For that purpose, the Government of the United States undertakes to make loan commitments of approximately

¹ Text of agreement worked out with Chilean cabinet re U.S. loans to Chile. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, January–June, 1962.

$350 million to help finance the first five years of the public sector of Chile ten-year development plan subject to the following conditions:

That the loan commitments made by the United States Government for specific projects in the public sector in any year shall not exceed 50 percent of the sum of the loan commitments for projects in the public sector made in that year by all members of the consortium including the United States;

That the long-term loan commitments by the Government of the United States shall be contingent upon annual review by the panel of experts of the OAS for determination as to whether the Government of Chile is implementing its development plan satisfactorily and carrying forward with sufficient speed the necessary social and structural reforms. The Government of the United States will be relieved of its obligation to extend loans for specific development projects pursuant to this understanding whenever the Government of the United States determines, on the basis of this annual review, that the Government of Chile is not implementing its development plan, including its stabilization program, or is not carrying forward adequately its necessary social and structural reforms within the spirit and concept of the Alliance for Progress. The considerations which will be taken into account for this purpose by the Government of the United States will include the following:

A. Whether the Government of Chile has enacted necessary tax reform legislation and has taken the necessary administrative measures to attain the level of tax revenues necessary for the financing by the Government of Chile of at least 80 percent of the total costs of the public sector development projects being implemented as estimated in Chile's ten-year plan submitted to the panel of experts of the OAS, and to improve adequately the equity with which the tax burden is distributed among the different income groups of Chile.

(B) Whether the Government of Chile has enacted necessary agrarian reform legislation and has vigorously implemented that legislation. This would include the question, in particular, of whether a land tax has been enacted and has been so enforced as to encourage better land utilization and/or the voluntary sale of land by the owners of large tracts whenever they find that the possession of large holdings does not offer significant productive advantages.

4. It is understood that the loan commitments by the United States Government for future fiscal years are subject to Congressional appropriation of the funds required and Congressional approval of the necessary commitment authority.

30. Telegram 58 to Santiago, July 20¹

July 20, 1962

From Martin for Ambassador. Embtel 23 and 66.

I should like to repeat basic assumptions behind relatively hard line we take with respect to Chile's economic problems and programs.

First, it is not just a stubborn insistence upon carrying out the letter of the Moscoso-Goodwin agreement, important as this is in our relations with other Latin American countries, with our Congress, and in the end, I believe, to our future relations with the Chileans themselves.

Nor are we, as it may sometimes seem, trying to convert Alessandri to anti-Americanism, even though, if he continues his do-nothing posture, this might help us with the Chilean people.

Nor are we, finally, insisting upon withholding aid until Alessandri's Government takes certain measures, trying to employ our aid merely as a club to secure actions by the GOC that might please us in the abstract.

As I see it, the measures which we have discussed with the Chileans, and which in general have commended themselves to other outside observers of the Chilean scene, are measures which must be taken not only for the long-term benefit of the Chilean people but also, and most importantly, because of the contribution they will make to the success of the kind of center political forces that we (and we hope Alessandri) want to win the 1964 election. Failure to take such measures may save some political difficulties this year but it would only be at the expense of creating much more serious difficulties in succeeding years because the fundamental problems will not have been tackled. This is the basic politico-economic calculation which we seem to have so much difficulty in getting across to Alessandri.

The withholding of aid (other than that pre-September tranche agreed upon in March) is not just to secure enactment of these various measures but reflects our belief that without them our money, whatever the amount, cannot create the kind of political and economic climate in Chile which is essential to the achievement of the goals for Chile of the Alliance for Progress and of the US and, we believe, the Alessandri Government. There are too many demands on our funds and they are secured with too much political blood, sweat, and tears here for us to be able to make them available where there is a substantial risk that they will not contribute proportionately to these shared objectives.

¹ Reiteration of U.S. hard line with respect to Chile's economic problems and programs. Confidential. 4 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, July–October, 1962.

I want also to make clear that this is not just a Chilean policy but one which is being followed with considerable vigor everywhere.

I hope that you and your mission will continue to do everything possible to make this basic United States attitude toward our relations with Chile in connection with the Alliance for Progress widely understood within and outside the Government. Only if it is understood, could there be any possibility of a meeting of minds between the President and Alessandri, and thereby a fruitful visit.

On possibility Alessandri visit Washington we still considering various aspects question, and need your reaction following considerations. There appears at present to be substantial danger Alessandri would see in invitation opportunity exert pressure directly on President Kennedy to relieve Alessandri from necessity taking various self-help and reform measures contemplated in Moscoso-Goodwin understandings. Invitation might accordingly encourage Alessandri resist recommendations made by his advisers as well as by foreign advisers for measures necessary in Chile's own interest as well as for purpose reaching agreement with IMF.

If Alessandri were to come to Washington without prior performance in affecting minimum tax and fiscal reform and land reform measures and without having reached agreement with IMF, he would find no receptivity his efforts persuade Washington agencies waive conditions Moscoso-Goodwin understanding. On contrary we would expect Alessandri to receive a stiff lecture on necessity taking measures he so far has shunned. Any communiqué could only reflect this need. Accordingly visit might prove counterproductive for Alessandri's political position at home, particularly assuming Chilean press build-up in expectation dramatic results his visit.

On other hand, we recognize that invitation to Washington might stimulate Alessandri to exert sufficient leadership to obtain IMF agreement and passage some reforms in order provide atmosphere for constructive conversations here. Likelihood this possibility presumably would be increased if Alessandri could be convinced our firmness in holding to conditions Moscoso-Goodwin understanding.

On balance, we are reluctant encourage Alessandri visit in view our conclusion invitation would decrease rather than strengthen his determination take necessary internal measures. On other hand, we might be willing propose to President Kennedy that visit be scheduled only on understanding firm date will not be set until after those measures have been taken. However, will be extremely difficult to attempt arrange visit during remainder this year and particularly prior US election due heavy Presidential schedule. Therefore this message FYI only and not for discussion outside Embassy, in order avoid raising false hopes.

Ball

31. Letter from Charles W. Cole to Edwin M. Martin, July 23¹

July 23, 1962

Dear Ed:

This letter attempts to set forth the most urgent and crucial points in the present situation as regards U.S.-Chile relations. It represents only my own views, though I believe that a good many of the Embassy staff would agree with all or part of it. I wrote this letter before receiving Deptel 58 but found that communication of no real help on any of the major points. I am sending copies to Ted Moscoso, Walt Rostow and Mac Bundy, in the hope that they will be interested. I want to cover three important matters.

1. As I have indicated in various telegrams, I think that President Alessandri and the Government of Chile have a good deal of justice on their side when they ask for a fairly firm indication as to the dollars they may actually expect to receive from us in 1962 and 1963 under the Moscoso-Goodwin agreement and a reasonably clear estimate as to the timing.

The way things have worked out, it has become clear that the PL 480 component of the $120 million of the Moscoso-Goodwin can not amount to more than $20 or $21 million at the very best. Quite probably it will be as small as $14 million and will not be all received in 1962 in any case. As to the $40 million CORFO loan, the difficulties on matching with U.S. imports and with the exchange rate seem to me to indicate that not all of it, either, can be received in 1962. As to the second tranche of $40 million, what with the Ex-Im Bank situation and with the first tranche slow-down, I would guess that not more than $2 or $3 million could get to the Government of Chile in 1962, if any.

So, because of restrictions, legalisms (probably necessary), new developments, etc., it has worked out as with an insurance policy. The big print insures you and the fine print uninsures you. And there has been a lot of fine print. If we have to make the Government of Chile accept a shortfall of 50% or 60% on Moscoso-Goodwin, it seems to me that to enable them to plan and budget we really owe them a pretty firm commitment on amounts and timing. Further, by so much as we fall short on the $120 million, by that much we drive them to expand Central Bank credit and thus make more difficult the IMF agreement which we are urging.

¹Crucial points in U.S.-Chile economic relations. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 611.25/7-2362.

So let us do two things. First, let us give them the best estimates possible on amounts and timing, as mentioned above. Second, let us figure out just what we can do in the way of stand-by and balance of payments support when they do make an agreement with the IMF and tell them about it. I believe that firm information on this score will lead the Government of Chile to conclude such an agreement.

The second step is the more necessary because of the way things have worked out. The second tranche of $40 million under Moscoso-Goodwin was designed as bait to encourage the Government of Chile to agree with the IMF. It is now apparent that they can receive little or nothing of this second tranche for budget support. There is no bait left. The situation is so bad that they may well be driven to believe that an IMF agreement is impossible and there is no use trying for it. If we could tell them that stand-bys, etc. amounting to x million dollars (say $85 million) would be available after the agreement, we would recreate the bait and encourage them at least to try.

2. I think that the Policy Planning memorandum, "Our Alliance for Progress Strategy in Chile", of May 25 struck at the main point of the problem here in a most effective and persuasive way. If we are to prevent a victory of the FRAP, if we are to improve stability and prosperity here, if we are to make even a partial success of the Ten-year Plan, we must maintain the forward momentum that has developed.

Despite discouraging developments on the exchange and budgetary fronts, and despite the 1960 earthquake, it is clear that Chile has been moving forward. It seems evident that from January 1, 1961, to June 30, 1962, production has been increasing at a rate equal to and probably greater than the 5½ % called for by the Ten-year Plan. At the same time, real wages have been definitely rising, unemployment has been declining, labor strife has decreased markedly. And all this in the face of exchange and financial difficulties and uncertainties.

It seems to me that we simply have to keep aid flowing and to prevent the taking of deflationary or restrictive steps, for a slow-down could be economically and politically disastrous. We are pushing them hard on devaluation. We want to be sure that at the same time we help them to maintain and increase the forward movement of the last eighteen months we also see to it that devaluation does not produce inflation, strikes and unrest.

3. In the last year I have talked with a number of distinguished economists of American or worldwide repute who have grave doubts about the IMF and its policies as regards underdeveloped countries. I find myself joining them in wondering whether the IMF orthodoxy is adequate for the situation of a country like Chile. A lot of competent observers think that when the history is written, the Argentine debacle will be laid at the IMF door, and we know what IMF-type stabilization did to Bolivia.

I sit here every day pushing the Government of Chile hard to reach an agreement with the IMF and realizing that the Government of the United States is hiding behind the IMF and wondering in my heart if IMF has the right prescription for Chile. You and I are going to feel a little odd if Chile lapses into economic chaos and the FRAP takes over and makes another Cuba out of Chile. We will feel even worse if it is recognized by everybody in 1965 or 1966 either that Chile could not possibly have lived with the terms set by the IMF or that, having accepted them, they were quite the wrong medicine.

Can't somebody with real economic depth and an understanding of underdeveloped countries (Ed Mason, Carl Kaysen, Willard Thorp) be gotten quickly to take a hard look at the IMF and see if we don't want either to get it to modify and liberalize its views or stop using it as a substitute for policies developed and approved by the State Department itself?

I feel the case and the plight of Chile are of the utmost importance. Right now Chile looks to me like the only country south of Colombia where stability and democracy can possibly be maintained and where the Alliance for Progress can possibly succeed. Let's stop worrying because the Chilenos don't do things our way, because they are short on follow-through, because they are too political, etc., etc., and look at the larger picture of the Hemisphere and the next decade.

As ever,

Charles W. Cole

cc: Teodoro Moscoso
Walt W. Rostow
McGeorge Bundy

32. Memorandum from Belcher to Edwin M. Martin, July 25¹

July 25, 1962

TO

ARA—Mr. Martin

THROUGH

ARA—Mr. Goodwin

FROM

WST—Mr. Belcher

SUBJECT

Ambassador Cole's Position on Chilean Situation

The following is a summary of Ambassador Cole's analysis of the situation in Chile and his position as to what US policy should be in view of that situation, for your background information during the Ambassador's consultations.

Our basic objective at this juncture is to prevent the victory of a FRAP candidate in the 1964 elections. Since the FRAP forces do not have a majority, their chances of victory depend on obtaining support of either the Christian Democrats, or the Radicals. [illegible in the original] the chances of defeating the FRAP are almost assured if the Radicals, Christian Democrats, and the far right unite. While less certain, in a three-way race between FRAP, Christian Democrats, and Radical-Liberal-Conservative forces, the latter probably would win.

The chances of achieving a coalition of the parties to the right of the FRAP are more likely if affairs in Chile are going [illegible in the original] well. Also, the chances of the victory of a Radical candidate, if supported only by Liberals and Conservatives, are more likely under these conditions. [illegible in the original] our policy to avert crisis, to insure progress, and to create an [illegible in the original] lack of progress will only strengthen the FRAP and make it more likely that the Christian Democrats or Radicals will join it.

The Department's policy seems to be to provide minimal assistance just sufficient to keep the Alessandri Government from collapsing, and to cut such [illegible in the original] further if the Government does not do what we want in the way of reforms and [illegible in the original] to come through on stabilization and reform, it still would be necessary for us to continue aid to Chile. We are going to have to continue to give aid to prevent the situation deteriorating in a fashion that would strengthen the left.

¹ Ambassador Cole's position on the situation in Chile. Confidential. DOS, CF, 725.00/7-2562.

We must seek to keep the Radicals in the Alessandri Government, and seek to prevent a joining of either Radicals or Christian Democrats with the FRAP. Therefore we should help the Chilean Government in avoiding the following developments:

1. Economic deterioration in general.
2. Exchange and budget crises.
3. Failure to advance with the Ten-Year Plan.
4. Lack of visible indications of economic and social improvement.
5. Inflation, with accompanying labor troubles and disorders and declining real wages.
6. Anything that creates a sense that the present Government (and therefore any government of the Right Center) cannot cope with Chile's problems.
7. Anything that creates an atmosphere of general discouragement.

In general, then, our aid policy should be designed to prevent the developments listed above. Our aid therefore should not be minimal. In fact it probably should be more massive than planned. In addition, it must not be slow in coming, have too many strings attached, or be continued with too many pressures.

At the present moment, the political situation is serious and [illegible in the original]. President Alessandri feels he is not receiving the assistance promised him in March, a feeling justified by the serious reduction in the PL-480 agreement, and the delay in providing the AFP loan through CORFO. Alessandri wants to see President Kennedy, to explain the political problems arising from economic difficulties. The Embassy recommends that Alessandri be invited to visit the US at the earliest opportunity, and that we provide direct balance of payments support to Chile, insisting on a devaluation simultaneous with announcement of such support.

The Ambassador also believes that relations between the Chilean Government and the IMF are at an extremely crucial stage. If we can inform Alessandri just exactly how much he can expect to receive from the US this year and next, from the Moscoso-Goodwin understandings, Alessandri will then be able to make budget plans and calculate what adjustments must be made in order to reach agreement with the IMF. If Alessandri does not know how much he can count on the US providing, he will be unable to move on the IMF problem. We should, therefore, tell Alessandri how much he will receive from the PL-480 agreement, from the CORFO loan, and from the second $40 million tranche. The latter implies resolving the issue of whether the Export-Import Bank will furnish $30 million only for imports from the US; the GOC always has maintained that this does not help it in its budget problem.

Finally, in viewing our problems with Chile it must be remembered that there is an inherent difficulty in Chile's democratic system for the Executive to get action through the Congress. Many of the delays and compromises affecting reform measures (and the 1960 earthquake recovery measures) have not sprung from willful neglect on the part of the Alessandri Administration, but from the need to obtain parliamentary support. There is a similar misunderstanding in Chile regarding the role of the Executive in the U.S., and a tendency to expect too much too rapidly.

33. Memorandum of conversation, December 11, among President Alessandri, President Kennedy, and other officials¹

Part I (of 5)

December 11, 1962

SUBJECT

Current Situation in Chile, and the Alliance for Progress

PARTICIPANTS

CHILE

President Alessandri
Foreign Minister Martinez
Finance Minister Mackenna
Senator Angel Faivovich
Ambassador Walter Muller
Budget Director Sergio Molina
Sr. Alfonso Echeverria (Interpreter)

UNITED STATES

President Kennedy
Ambassador Charles Cole
Assistant Secretary Edwin Martin
Mr. Teodoro Moscoso, Coordinator, Alliance for Progress
Mr. Herbert May, ARA
Mr. Ralph Dungan, White House
Mr. Fernando Van Reigersberg, LS
Mr. Neil Seidenman, LS

¹ Current situation in Chile; Alliance for Progress. Limited Official Use. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, January-June, 1963.

At President Kennedy's invitation, President Alessandri made a general review of the Chilean situation, covering political and economic developments in the first four years of his administration. While much has been accomplished, the national development program will require foreign assistance. United States policies on credits have created certain difficulties, but new approaches on credit administration have been introduced. The Alliance for Progress has awakened the enthusiasm of the people, the Government of Chile supports the Alliance, and it is complying with the Charter of Punta del Este. The interest and efforts of the Chilean Government in fulfilling the commitments of Punta del Este are evident, and it is hoped that assistance of the nature and scope suggested by the OAS Ad Hoc Committee of Experts will be forthcoming, to enable Chile to continue its progress.

President Alessandri described the agricultural sector of Chile, commenting on much erroneous information about Chile's agrarian problems. While better land distribution is a goal, particularly important is the adjusting of farm prices in relation to industry; the latter sector has been favored in past development programs.

President Alessandri mentioned certain difficulties in implementing the Alliance for Progress. A particular problem is the United States procedure on development loans, which requires Chile to carry out investment projects, with reimbursement after construction. Another problem is in the foreign exchange field, with the United States restricted account system. While $160 million has been authorized in aid, the Chilean Government has only received $84 million.

Mr. Moscoso said that a remedy was being developed on the development loans, in order to adopt a system of program financing on a revolving fund basis, as opposed to project financing. On restricted accounts, he commented that a modification of present procedures was being studied, but that the burdensome questionnaire required from shippers was a measure introduced to control the United States balance of payments problem.

President Kennedy said that the United States balance of payments position required certain controls, including these forms. The United States was faced with either stopping aid or providing it under certain controls. A letter of credit procedure could be used to remedy part of the difficulty to which President Alessandri referred, and these difficulties could be worked out on the ministerial level.

President Alessandri stated that he did not see insurmountable economic or social problems over the next two years, and predicted that there would be no economic or social factors that could bring an electoral setback for the democratic parties (in the 1964 elections). He thanked President Kennedy for the cooperation extended by the United States, and praised the 100 members of the Peace Corps now in Chile.

34. Memorandum of conversation, December 11 among President Alessandri, President Kennedy, and other officials¹

Part II (of 5)

December 11, 1962

SUBJECT

Problems and Importance of American Investment in Chile

PARTICIPANTS

CHILE

President Alessandri
Foreign Minister Martinez
Finance Minister Mackenna
Senator Angel Faivovich
Ambassador Walter Muller
Budget Director Sergio Molina
Sr. Alfonso Echeverria (Interpreter)

UNITED STATES

President Kennedy
Ambassador Charles Cole
Assistant Secretary Edwin Martin
Mr. Teodoro Moscoso, Coordinator, Alliance for Progress
Mr. Herbert May, ARA
Mr. Ralph Dungan, White House
Mr. Fernando Van Reigersberg, LS
Mr. Neil Seidenman, LS

President Kennedy assured President Alessandri that the United States has every desire to assist Chile's progress, in cooperation with other countries and international agencies. The United States also is concerned that Chile makes maximum use of available help, in its economic and social development. While the United States is making every effort to obtain more funds for Latin America, we have heavy commitments elsewhere. It is hoped, therefore, that Western Europe will play a larger role in the future in aid to Latin America.

Another source of capital is private investment. While there are obvious political problems involving American copper companies in Chile, President Kennedy expressed the hope that Chile would maintain a climate which would encourage private capital.

President Alessandri replied that American investments, particularly in copper, warranted special consideration. The problem is not that these companies have reduced their investment, but whether they will see fit to increase investments. While he always had had due respect for private capital, such capital should adjust its interests to those of the country where it operates. Profit must not be the only consideration; the company's activities must be consistent with the good of the community.

¹ Problems and importance of American investment in Chile. Limited Official Use. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, January-June, 1963.

As much as President Alessandri desires an agreement with the copper companies for new investment, certain of their demands tend to obstruct such an agreement. President Alessandri thought, frankly, that President Kennedy and the Department of State should take particular note of the problem. The companies at present enjoy far more safeguards than under the Government of President Ibañez; there is a special law governing relations between the companies and the Government of Chile; and, there is the Copper Department.

President Alessandri said the companies now ask that he accept certain changes, which would amount to using his powers to reduce the regulatory powers of the Government of Chile. Such a proposal would be used by certain elements in the Congress as proof that Chile is a dependency of the United States. The companies are asking the government for a 20-year guarantee on taxes and insisting on a five-year amortization period. These requests can be exploited by Marxist opposition, to claim that the Alessandri administration is a tool of United States imperialism.

President Alessandri said he has every intention of meeting the requests of private investment, but uniting private interests with the public good. He commented that the situation of the American telephone company was another issue on which the Department of State was inaccurately informed. This, he said, could be discussed by members of his party, and also would be discussed with IT&T officials in New York.

President Alessandri said that the problem is to meet the needs of the companies, but in a way that will not make a political controversy detrimental to the company and Democracy. The problem is not only of money and must be considered from the political standpoint as well. He is not personally opposed to the requests of the American companies, but they are not practicable.

President Kennedy expressed his understanding of the political vulnerability of the American copper companies, and said that the United States Government could not afford to appear to endorse all their wishes. He emphasized his concern with capital flight in Latin America, noted the serious financial situation in Brazil, and repeated that some way must be found to induce the copper companies to reconsider their large investment plans. The precise way of reconciling the companies' interests with the Government of Chile's was, of course, a matter involving President Alessandri's judgment. But, an environment must be created that will attract private capital to Chile.

President Alessandri said that no other administration has been so disposed as his, to meet the companies' interests. However, the companies seem to increase their requests with every new guarantee given. His task is to persuade the companies to modify their demands within the framework of the legal guarantees they now have. President Alessandri again expressed his understanding of the importance of additional capital for Chile, but thought it would be highly useful for the companies to be made aware of the views of President Kennedy's administration and of the Department of State on these questions; namely, that in view of the political problems, the companies should adjust their position. While Chile needs to apply every resource for development, there are political problems, and businessmen must be brought to see the need for considering that aspect. President Alessandri suggested the desirability of having the Department of State explain to the copper companies that the political problems cannot be ignored, and thought that once this was done, the prospects of an early solution would be enhanced.

President Kennedy replied that even in the United States, private capital often goes its own way, despite arguments about the national interest. We would like to see an increased flow of investment to Latin America, our interest not being that of Anaconda or any other company, but the good of Chile. Our aim is stability for Chile, and have tried to make these issues clear to the companies. The fact remains, however, that private capital is quite sensitive to conditions, preferring for example to go to Europe if investment there yields more than the 4% from United States bonds, and investment decisions are based on private interests. We can only hope that negotiations will persuade capital to remain in Chile. The Alliance for Progress is not for the benefit of the private companies, but is aimed at bringing economic development and preserving freedom. One way to do this is to stimulate private investment. Therefore, an effort should be made to convince the copper companies that they have a sound future in Chile.

President Alessandri again expressed his full agreement with such views, but added that he merely wanted to stress the origins of the existing problem. He and former Finance Minister Eduardo Figueroa had agreed to many of the requests of the companies, but he could not entertain hopes of congressional approval. Given the great need for investment in Chile, he was only desirous of obtaining a quick solution and was not concerned with questions of fractions of profits. However, he does need the support of the Chilean Congress, and must work with the Congress (for the sake of preserving democratic institutions) in seeking the best solution.

35. Memorandum of conversation, December 11, among President Alessandri, President Kennedy, and other officials¹

Part III (of 5)

December 11, 1962

SUBJECT

The Cuban Problem

PARTICIPANTS

Chile

President Alessandri
 Foreign Minister Martinez
 Finance Minister Mackenna
 Senator Angel Faivovich
 Ambassador Walter Muller
 Budget Director Sergio Molina
 Sr. Alfonso Echeverria (Interpreter)

United States

President Kennedy
 Ambassador Charles Cole
 Assistant Secretary Edwin Martin
 Mr. Teodoro Moscoso, Coordinator, Alliance for Progress
 Mr. Herbert May, ARA
 Mr. Ralph Dungan, White House
 Mr. Fernando Van Reigersberg, LS
 Mr. Neil Seidenman, LS

President Kennedy brought up the subject of Cuba, noting that while Castro has lost a great deal of prestige, the Castro regime would continue to present problems for some time to come, judging from Minister Guevara's recent speech pledging support for "popular liberation movements". The support of the OAS in the recent crisis showed that the problem was not a struggle between the US and Cuba, but rather a hemispheric problem and a challenge to the sovereignty of all the American countries. We should not allow the image that the problem is a struggle just between Cuba and the US to be maintained; anything that can be done to demonstrate our determination to oppose collectively the purposes of communism will increase the security of our nations.

President Alessandri said that the Chilean position always has been clear and could be no cause of problems in US-GOC relations. Chile, of course, is greatly attached to legal principles, in both domestic and foreign matters. At the Santiago meeting of consultation of Foreign Ministers, the Rio Treaty was a subject of serious discussion, concerning its precise scope. Differences of view arose as to the legal scope of the Treaty. But the recent situation in Cuba, which led to President Kennedy's action, was in flagrant violation of Article VI of the Treaty, which Chile could not countenance; appropriate instructions were issued immediately to the Chilean Embassies.

¹ Cuban problem. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, January–June, 1963.

President Alessandri agreed that Castro's prestige has suffered. He had spoken with Senator Allende (note: Chilean Socialist Senator, and potential Popular Front candidate), stressing that the present Cuban situation constituted a threat warranting application of the Rio Treaty, and that Chile would proceed in a manner consistent with her responsibilities.

Both Presidents agreed that the free press has exaggerated the importance of Castro and Castroism, in many instances. President Kennedy noted the anticipated demonstrations on his Mexican visit, which never materialized. He said the problem is not "Castro", but rather difficult domestic problems which provide a breeding ground for the extreme left. In this connection, it would be a severe blow to see communism win an important election in a democratic country, when we have said that communism can remain in power only by building a wall.

President Alessandri said that exaggeration on the part of the press often creates fear, both inside and outside a country. As for Castro and the communists, a strong campaign against them is putting them on the defensive. He does not fear for the future. However, a democracy is at a disadvantage since its enemies take advantage of the right of free expression. Furthermore, it is always an easy matter for a dictatorship to use resources for propaganda, and therefore can organize anti-administration activities in the country concerned. The problem is to find ways to combat this propaganda. It is of the utmost importance that the press turn from a defeatist approach (on Chilean affairs).

36. Memorandum of conversation, December 11, among President Alessandri, President Kennedy, and other officials¹

Part IV (of 5)

December 11, 1962

SUBJECT

US Military Assistance Programs, and Chilean Relations with Bolivia

PARTICIPANTS

Chile

President Alessandri
Foreign Minister Martinez
Finance Minister Mackenna
Senator Angel Faivovich
Ambassador Walter Muller
Budget Director Sergio Molina
Sr. Alfonso Echeverria (Interpreter)

United States

President Kennedy
Ambassador Charles Cole
Assistant Secretary Edwin Martin
Mr. Teodoro Moscoso, Coordinator, Alliance for Progress
Mr. Herbert May, ARA
Mr. Ralph Dungan, White House
Mr. Fernando Van Reigersberg, LS
Mr. Neil Seidenman, LS

President Kennedy raised US MAP to Latin America in general, asking if President Alessandri wished to make any comments about the possibility that our military aid was stimulating an arms race, thus creating an additional financial burden on the recipient countries.

President Alessandri assured President Kennedy that he had no criticism whatsoever to make on this subject, and could only express his appreciation for US help in this field. He had to request US help, after certain disturbances. While he had repeatedly advocated disarmament in Latin America, other countries, while expressing agreement in principle, had responded in practice by increasing their armed forces. The US had reassured the Chilean armed forces by extending a helping hand, so there is no cause for reproach, but rather for gratitude.

President Alessandri then referred to Chilean relations with Bolivia. The present Bolivian Government originated in a popular movement, which disbanded the army after assuming power, and provided for local militia. When President Paz began having severe economic and unemployment problems, the local militia became centers of opposition to the administration. The Government then began to rebuild the regular army, and asked the U.S. for help, which the U.S. granted. Help also came from Argentina, which assured President Alessandri that its shipments were only defensive weapons.

¹ U.S. military assistance programs; Chilean relations with Bolivia. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, January–June, 1963.

Thus the Bolivian army began to grow in power, and from that point on any interpretation of events is largely a matter of conjecture. There may have been a desire to offset the army's growing influence by regrouping the militia. But it was in this atmosphere that the Lauca River dispute arose.

President Alessandri said that while the Lauca had been the subject of attention by both governments for 20 years, good relations always had prevailed. But, as soon as the GOC opened the first sluice gate on the Lauca project on an experimental basis, Chile was accused of violating Bolivia's sovereignty. It was against the resulting dispute that the Bolivian army and militia were regarded as constituting a possible threat to Chile's security. After an exchange of notes, the Argentine Government agreed to stop arms shipments to Bolivia.

President Alessandri repeated that in no way was he criticizing U.S. military aid. It had been of great help to Chile, and the destroyers which he hoped to obtain from the U.S. would certainly be of great service. He did note later that, while concurring with military assistance to countries who request it, in view of present relations with Bolivia, any strengthening of Bolivia's military potential would mean additional pressure and possible aggression against Chile.

37. Memorandum of conversation, December 11, among President Alessandri, President Kennedy, and other officials¹

Part V (of 5)

December 11, 1962

SUBJECT

Press Reports about Chile

PARTICIPANTS

CHILE

President Alessandri
 Foreign Minister Martinez
 Finance Minister Mackenna
 Senator Angel Faivovich
 Ambassador Walter Muller
 Budget Director Sergio Molina
 Sr. Alfonso Echeverria (Interpreter)

UNITED STATES

President Kennedy
 Ambassador Charles Cole
 Assistant Secretary Edwin Martin
 Mr. Teodoro Moscoso, Coordinator, Alliance for Progress
 Mr. Herbert May, ARA
 Mr. Ralph Dungan, White House
 Mr. Fernando Van Reigersberg, LS
 Mr. Neil Seidenman, LS

During the discussion about Cuba, President Alessandri said that Chile has been the subject of much unfair publicity in regard to hemispheric problems; much has been said and written, domestically and externally, that distorts the facts of the Chilean situation. Alarmist propaganda is given out by certain interest groups within the country attacking domestic policies, and tends to weaken the cause of democracy. The opposition groups in Chile fear any success of the Alessandri Government which may produce good results. Therefore, they manufacture propaganda against the Government, aimed at lowering its prestige and placing obstacles in the way of foreign aid.

President Alessandri recognized that the United States stands for complete freedom of the press, as does Chile (and England). But the press of the United States and England is poorly represented [illegible in the original] by those correspondents who apparently are either [illegible in the original]. He already has spoken with Embassy representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom, and has instructed his own ambassadors to talk about the dangers involved in this situation. The Chilean correspondent of the London Economist, for instance, is a Communist or linked with the Communists and consistently distorts the situation in Chile. The same applies to the Time correspondent.

¹ Press reports about Chile. Limited Official Use. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, January–June, 1963.

President Kennedy said that Time has not always been friendly to the administration here either. However, President Alessandri's visit was highly successful in that it provided an excellent opportunity for the visiting Executive to tell a story that needs to be told, particularly to the press and therefore to the people of this country. This would clarify many things about Chile and dramatize the progress that is being made, notably through the tax and agrarian reforms now under way. President Kennedy suggested that the Chilean Government might benefit by designating a full-time press attaché in Washington. He emphasized again his understanding of the peculiarities of the press, and invited President Alessandri to attend his own press conference the next day.

38. Memorandum of conversation, December 12, among President Alessandri, President Kennedy, and other officials¹

December 12, 1962

SUBJECT

Chile and Cuba

PARTICIPANTS

CHILE

President Alessandri
 Foreign Minister Martinez
 Senator Angel Faivovich
 Finance Minister Mackenna
 Ambassador Walter Muller
 Ambassador Sergio Gutierrez
 Ambassador Manuel Trucco
 Sr. Alfonso Echeverria (Interpreter)

UNITED STATES

Acting Secretary Ball
 Assistant Secretary Edwin Martin
 Ambassador Charles Cole
 Mr. Fernando van Reigersberg, LS
 (Interpreter)

¹ Chile and Cuba. Secret. 4 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Brubeck Series, Chile, December 1963.

Mr. Ball started the meeting after the Chilean luncheon by reviewing the current situation in Cuba. The U.S. had determined that the Soviet missiles had been dismantled and removed, and the IL-28 aircraft were being returned to the USSR. While some four or five thousand military technicians had left, some 12,000 still remained. The U.S. does not know whether the latter would also leave, but this would be demanded by the U.S. in negotiations with the USSR. The outcome of those negotiations is uncertain. The continued presence of those forces, equipped with sophisticated weapons and antiaircraft surface-to-air missiles, has to be regarded as a serious danger. While the weapons are defensive, they represent a serious Soviet commitment to Cuba. The cost of Soviet military matériel in Cuba has been estimated at $1 billion, which is a serious commitment indeed.

Mr. Ball continued that the first phase of the Cuban crisis has been overcome, and the U.S. is "substantially satisfied" with the removal of weapons of aggression. But the situation will not be over completely until the Soviet forces leave, and Castro ceases to be a threat to the peace and security of this hemisphere. Since the Soviet record is one of deception, U.S. surveillance must continue. While Khrushchev had promised the removal of offensive weapons and adequate safeguards, the latter have not been forthcoming, as the Soviets are adamant in opposition to on-site inspection. The Soviets may have no choice because Castro himself probably has told them that inspection is out of the question. Thus, the U.S. has no choice but to continue systematic surveillance of Cuba, through regular, high-altitude flights. The U.S. hopes that the first phase of the Cuban crisis will be over in a few weeks, when negotiations with the Soviets are completed.

Mr. Martin emphasized that this would still leave the problems of Soviet ground forces and Castro. On the latter, there are no encouraging signs. Recent Cuban radio broadcasts have been as vitriolic as ever, especially against Guatemala, Honduras, Haiti, Venezuela, the Dominican Republic and, interestingly enough, Peru. Minister Guevara's recent speech clearly indicated his objective is to propagate guerrilla warfare in this hemisphere, and for some reason he singled out Peru.

President Alessandri strongly indicated that the GOC's position had been well-known, clear and "eminently juridical". The GOC interpreted recent Cuban developments as a violation of Article 6 of the Rio Treaty and the GOC gave its warmest support to the OAS resolution of October 23. Now it was up to the OAS, and not to any one country, to apply the provisions of the Treaty. He described how he personally had acted at the time of the OAS resolution, to avoid possible harmful delay by the GOC.

Mr. Martin expressed the gratitude of the U.S. for that quick response. He apologized for the speed with which the entire matter had been handled, but emphasized that no other procedure would have worked so effectively. He said that now Cuba has to be watched very carefully; Castro has collaborated with the Soviets on one risky venture, and there is no reason to believe it could not happen again.

[text not declassified]

President Alessandri asked Mr. Martin what he should say if questioned by the press on Cuban-Chilean relations. Mr. Martin replied that this was a decision that only the GOC could make. The interests of the Chilean people were paramount, but Chile also should take into consideration its position in the hemisphere and its obligations within the OAS.

President Alessandri replied, somewhat humorously, that he had hoped for a briefer answer, but that he would emphasize that Chile's position on Cuba has been made very clear and that the issue now has become one which the OAS will have to handle.

Mr. Martin said that if it were thought that a break in relations between Chile and Cuba could be helpful, it should be considered very seriously. The matter also could be discussed in the OAS. The issue is a hemispheric one, and not a dispute between the U.S. alone and Cuba. The U.S. often has stressed the danger of Soviet Embassies in unstable, underdeveloped countries, because of their espionage and subversive activities. By the same token, a Western embassy could play a very useful role in a Communist country such as Cuba. President Alessandri indicated his agreement.

Foreign Minister Martinez said that an example of Chilean-U.S. cooperation was when Chile joined with Brazil, Mexico and Uruguay in requesting the Cuban Government to accede to removal of the IL-28 aircraft. If Chile can play such a valuable role in the future, it would welcome the opportunity to contribute to the security of the hemisphere. It is important that the dialogue between Chile and Cuba remain unhampered, to permit the flow of information of value to the hemisphere.

Mr. Martin agreed, but emphasized that this could not be done publicly and that the utmost secrecy is vital.

President Alessandri asked what the positions of Brazil and Mexico were, regarding Cuba.

Mr. Martin said that Mexico seems to have a position similar to Chile. The U.S. believes that if a general decision regarding Cuba were taken by the OAS, the Mexican Government would agree. In Brazil, the situation is not quite as clear. Brazil still thinks that it can help Cuba to re-enter the inter-American community, and build up Castro as a true Latin American revolutionary.

Mr. Ball commented that Brazil's position was very ambivalent. President Alessandri agreed with that statement, ending the meeting by saying there could be no doubt as to Chile's position on this matter.

39. Memorandum of conversation, December 12, between President Kennedy and President Alessandri

December 12, 1962

[Text not declassified. Secret. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, November–December 1962.]

40. Memorandum of conversation, December 12, between President Alessandri and President Kennedy¹

Part II (of 3)

December 12, 1962

SUBJECT

Communists in International Organizations

PARTICIPANTS

Chile

President Alessandri

Sr. Alfonso Echeverria, (Interpreter)

United States

President Kennedy

Fernando van Reigersberg, LS, (Interpreter)

President Alessandri said he was very concerned about the question of Communists and "fellow-travelers" who work for international organizations. The Chilean Ambassador in Venezuela has reported that six or eight of the 14 Chilean international civil servants stationed in Carácas or working out of Carácas offices are Communists or sympathizers. Asked by President Kennedy as to what organizations are involved, President Alessandri replied that all United Nations agencies were included, and at times the OAS. He singled out ECLA as a nest of Communists, and also mentioned FAO, UNESCO, and the ILO.

¹ Communists in international organizations. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, November–December 1962.

President Alessandri said that Chilean opposition politicians constantly are referring to statistics published by these organizations, as being extremely accurate. He said this is not true, since the international Communist movement is interested in casting disrepute on development efforts, and its agents will twist figures around to serve their purposes.

President Kennedy indicated his grave concern with this matter, stating he would inform Assistant Secretary Edwin Martin and ask him to investigate. The question raised was serious enough to warrant close scrutiny. The US also is interested in the movement of students to and from Cuba.

President Alessandri indicated there was nothing the GOC could do to keep its citizens from traveling freely throughout the world. He knows that over 150 Chilean technicians are in Cuba, however.

Many of them might later be hired by international organizations. Since the international civil servants form a small, close group, this group could play a very dangerous role. He said the number of Communists in these international organizations is constantly increasing, and the heads of the agencies do not seem to be concerned.

President Kennedy assured President Alessandri that he was very much interested in his remarks, and the US would look into the situation. The US also was concerned about student travel to Cuba, and hoped additional and more specific information about this could be obtained from Chile. He noted that at times it is difficult to make clear distinctions between Communists and other groups, and any information that would be of assistance on this would be very helpful.

41. Memorandum of conversation, December 12, among President Alessandri, President Kennedy, and other officials¹

Part III (of 3)

December 12, 1962

SUBJECT

US Aid, and Relationship of EEC with LAFTA

PARTICIPANTS

Chile

President Alessandri
 Foreign Minister Martinez
 Finance Minister Mackenna
 Senator Angel Faivovich
 Ambassador Walter Muller
 Ambassador Sergio Gutierrez
 Budget Director Sergio Molina
 Sr. José Zabala, CORFO, N.Y.
 Sr. Alfonso Echevarria, (Interpreter)

United States

President Kennedy
 Ambassador Charles Cole
 Assistant Secretary Edwin Martin
 Mr. Teodoro Moscoso, Coordinator, Alliance for Progress
 Mr. Herbert May, ARA
 Mr. Ralph Dungan, White House
 Mr. Taylor G. Belcher, WST
 Mr. John Robinson, LA/VC
 Mr. Fernando Van Reigersberg, LS, (Interpreter)
 Mr. Neil Seidenman, LS-(Interpreter)

While awaiting release of the joint communiqué, Mr. Moscoso told President Alessandri that the question of the use of counterpart funds had been taken up, following an unofficial request received one week before. He was able to say that $20 million would be released immediately, which hopefully would relieve pressures on Central Bank credit ceilings. Additional funds would be available for 1963, including $10 million from the Treasury Stabilization Fund. Mr. Moscoso suggested it would be desirable for this information not to be made public, but hoped that advance knowledge of this assistance would be helpful to President Alessandri in dealing with Congress (on tax reform). The Treasury funds would be available pari passu with those of the IMF.

¹ U.S. aid; relationship of EEC with LAFTA. Limited Official Use. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, January–June, 1963.

Mr. Moscoso commented that the tax reform bill would be of urgent significance in this connection.

After approval of the communiqué, President Kennedy mentioned the possibility of the Latin American countries making a joint representation on behalf of LAFTA to General De Gaulle, perhaps through Messrs. Kubitschek and Lleras Camargo. This would be a direct approach separate from what the US alone or together with Latin America might say. De Gaulle is, of course, more interested in Africa than in Latin America, because of close former ties. So, the Latin American approach should be to stress the community of interests with Latin America, cultural affinities, and so on. A country-by-country approach would be too dispersed and weak. The best procedure would be to bring all of Latin America together through representatives such as Messrs. Kubitschek and Lleras Camargo.

42. Memorandum of conversation, January 24, between President Kennedy and Ambassador Muller¹

January 24, 1963

SUBJECT

Farewell Call of Ambassador Muller on the President.

PARTICIPANTS

The President
Ambassador Walter Muller of Chile
Angier Biddle Duke
Taylor G. Belcher, Director, West Coast Affairs.

Ambassador Muller opened the conversation by referring to his regret at having to leave Washington after a very satisfactory and pleasant tour of duty. In reply to the President's question, he said that he was returning to take up his private business again after an absence which in some ways had been too long. He had undertaken the assignment as Ambassador for a maximum of two years and had hoped to be able to get back to his personal affairs sooner but that the advent of the Alliance for Progress and the prospects of a visit by President Alessandri had persuaded him to stay on. He said he felt the Alliance program was now well started as far as his country was concerned and that with the very successful completion of the Presidential visit, he could leave in good conscience.

¹ Farewell call on the President. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 725.00/1-2463.

The President asked the Ambassador for his views regarding the situation in Chile in the next two years, particularly leading up to the elections. The Ambassador stated his belief that the Left Wing in Chile had suffered serious reverses as a result of the recent events in Cuba and that he had heard on good authority that Senator Allende was no longer confident of winning the election as the candidate of the Popular Front. The President expressed gratification upon hearing this opinion but emphasized how much more important it was that we weaken the appeal of the Left in Chile through the effective carrying out of the reforms that were now beginning in Chile. He added that he well understood, from U.S. experience, how difficult it was to institute tax reforms. The Ambassador spoke at some length regarding those measures which had already been taken emphasizing particularly the successful housing programs already carried out by CORVI and Mr. Belcher mentioned the recently concluded IDB loan to the Trade Unions in Valparaiso and Vina del Mar for low-cost housing.

The President expressed his hope that the Ambassador would continue to interest himself in Chilean-U.S. relations and the Ambassador responded that the President could be assured that he would be a vocal, unpaid Ambassador of the U.S. in Chile. The President reiterated his continued deep interest in Latin American progress, saying that Europe enjoyed the luxury of the limelight attention, but that in many ways Latin America was much more important to us, more important than Africa, for example.

After an exchange of pleasantries during which the Ambassador was able to say goodbye to Mrs. Kennedy, the Ambassador took his leave.

NOTE: During a brief conversation prior to his meeting with the President, while discussing the political situation in Chile, Ambassador Muller made the interesting comment that Eduardo Frei Montalva, as leader of a Christian Democratic centered coalition "would not make a bad president". He added that he could not foresee any possibility of the Christian Democrats joining with the FRAP in the 1964 elections. More likely was the possibility of the recently announced PDC-Padena coalition becoming a focal point for dissident Radicals and Socialists.

43. Telegram 37 to Santiago, July 24, 1963

July 24, 1963

[Text not declassified. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 12 CHILE.]

44. Memorandum of conversation, August 19, between President Kennedy and Senator Duran from Chile¹

August 19, 1963

SUBJECT

Meeting between Senator Duran of Chile and the President

PARTICIPANTS

United States

The President

Mr. Ralph Dungan, Special Assistant to the President

Mr. Edwin M. Martin, Assistant Secretary, ARA

Mr. Fernando van Reigersberg, LS Interpreter

Chile

Senator Duran

Ambassador Sergio Gutierrez

The President indicated his pleasure at having this opportunity to meet Senator Duran and asked for his estimate on the outcome of the forthcoming elections in Chile.

Senator Duran explained that three main groups are vying for the Presidency: the Socialist-Communist group should poll approximately 600,000 votes; the Christian Democratic party (whose vote has been increasing these past years) should be able to poll about 450,000 votes; and the Conservative-Liberal-Radical Front vote is expected to reach 1 million.

The President inquired into the political significance of a close election. In that case the Senator felt that Congress would make the final decision. The Radical Party controls from 57 to 59 percent of the vote in Congress and would therefore select the Radical candidate.

¹ Political situation and upcoming election in Chile. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Chile, July–November 1963.

Asked by the President whether he would care to speculate on the Christian Democrat reaction to this possibility, the Senator replied that it was still premature to forecast any definite trend. However, the Christian Democratic Party has begun flirting with the Socialist-Communist group. Specifically, he referred to the election of the President of the University of Chile, in which the Christian Democrats had supported the FRAP candidate who defeated Sr. Escobar, the Democratic Front candidate, by only eight votes. Senator Duran also criticized the Christian Democratic Party of campaigning on an allegedly strong Catholic position, while constantly justifying Castro. The uninformed, but pious, Chilean electorate could interpret this as a Catholic endorsement of Castro-like reforms.

The President expressed amazement and inquired into the rationale for such a policy.

The Senator called attention to the “opening-to-the-left” attitude of the Christian Democrats. However curiously, instead of trying to woo the Socialists away from the Communists, they are trying to attract the Communist group (sic). The Communist party is in a difficult position and needs help. It might, therefore, support a Christian Democratic candidate in the next election, if it believes he can win.

The President indicated interest in Chile because a Communist candidate and the Communist party do not often appear on the ballot. The U.S. would look with favor upon the election of a democratic candidate who would carry out Alliance for Progress reforms in the future.

Senator Duran indicated that if Alliance for Progress projects and programs continue to be carried out at the present level of intensity, or if they are accelerated even further, he will hold a strong political position by the time the next elections take place. He indicated that the three parties supporting him, although sometimes divided as to procedure and strategy, agreed to give him carte blanche in his campaign and to present him to the electorate not as a Democratic Front candidate, but as a “national candidate.”

The President stated that he considered the development of Latin America the primary goal of American foreign policy today. The Senator expressed his concern about the fact that after signing the limited nuclear test ban treaty, the Soviet Union may intensify its subversive efforts even more and especially in Latin America.

The President wished Senator Duran much success in his forthcoming trip to Europe, hoping that he would convince European Governments to do their share in Latin America’s development and also expressed his best wishes for the next year’s election.

Senator Duran indicated his grief over the death of the President’s third child, and thanked him for giving him an opportunity to exchange views.

45. National Intelligence Estimate 94-63, October 3¹

October 3, 1963

THE CHILEAN SITUATION
AND PROSPECTS

THE PROBLEM

To estimate the situation and prospects in Chile with particular reference to the September 1964 presidential election.

CONCLUSIONS

A. Chile has a longstanding tradition of respect for constitutional order and civil liberties. It has accomplished a considerable political evolution by electoral means. Its human and material resources are adequate to provide a decent living for its rapidly growing population. Nevertheless, for half the population real wages have been declining since 1950, and a large portion of the population is ill-housed, ill-clothed, and ill-fed. (Paras. 1-6, 17, 18)

B. Consequently increasing popular dissatisfaction has been expressed in a steadily leftward political trend. In the presidential election of 1958, Salvador Allende, the nominee of FRAP,² failed of election because a minor candidate diverted from him a small part of the leftist vote. These election returns raised apprehension that the 1964 presidential election might bring to power a government under strong Communist influence, if not control. (Para. 7)

C. Subsequent congressional and municipal elections have shown that the leftward trend in Chile is continuing, but that the present beneficiary of this trend is not FRAP, but rather the Christian Democratic Party. This hitherto minor left-center grouping is attracting the votes of frustrated reformists who see little hope in the traditional political parties and are antagonized by the communistic tendency of FRAP. (Para. 9)

D. The outcome of the 1964 presidential election cannot be predicted a year in advance. The political situation is extremely fluid. Allende's candidacy now appears less dangerous than in 1958. The campaign of Durán, the candidate of the coalition of the traditional parties, has failed to gather momentum. On present showing, Frei, the

¹ "The Chilean Situation and Prospects." Secret. 25 pp. CIA, ODDI Registry, Job 79-R01012A.

² Frente de Acción Popular, a coalition of the Communist and Socialist parties.

Christian Democratic candidate, appears to be the leading contender. (Paras. 10–16, 36)

E. If Durán should be elected, the Chilean government's policies and performance would remain much as they have been under Alessandri. The government would profess reformist purposes, but the effectiveness of its reform measures would be limited by its need to placate various vested interests. Frei would strive to transform the economic and social structure of Chile, but he would be resisted by the vested interests. (Paras. 8, 37–38)

F. If, through the defeat of Allende, the Communists and Allende Socialists should be frustrated in their once-lively expectation of achieving power by electoral means, the Chilean Communists probably would not turn at once to revolutionary violence. The Carabineros and the military would almost certainly be able to cope with any attempt at either urban or rural insurgency. The Communists would prefer to preserve their present legal status and bide their time, trusting that conservative political influences will continue to prevent effective social reform and that the cumulative frustrations and resentments of the masses will eventually bring them to power. (Paras. 42–44)

I. THE SOCIAL BACKGROUND

1. Chile's rapidly growing population now numbers about eight million. Racially and culturally, it is one of the most homogeneous in Latin America.³ About 95 percent of the population are at least nominally Roman Catholic. About 80 percent of the adult population are literate. Three-fourths of the people live in the central one-third of the country, a fertile area with a climate like that of California. (See map.) About 60 percent live in urban communities. Almost all participate in the money economy.

2. Chilean national unity is impaired, however, by strong class distinctions. The upper class—large landholders, and commercial and industrial magnates—conforms to the pattern of conspicuous consumption familiar elsewhere in Latin America. It is able to maintain this style of living in part through the avoidance of direct taxes. These magnates have had to share political power with a rapidly growing middle class, one of the largest in Latin America, now about 40 percent of the population. Within this middle class there are divergencies of interest between independent professional and business men on the one hand and white collar employees on the other. These politically effective social elements have defended and promoted their respective interests without much regard for the generally deplorable lot of the lower class.

³ The Chilenos (90 percent of the population) are of predominantly Spanish stock, but, except in the upper class, most have some Indian admixture. The only considerable group of unassimilated Indians are the Araucanians of south-central Chile, who were not finally subdued until 1887. In the same general area there is also a considerable native-born community of German origin and culture.

3. Chile's regressive tax system and chronic inflation have borne heavily upon the lower class—and, to a lesser degree, upon the white collar employees of the lower middle class. Since 1950 the real wages of unskilled and unorganized workers have declined. Although some organized workers, such as the employees of the US mining companies, live relatively well, an estimated half of all industrial workers are ill-fed and ill-housed. The employment and housing problems are rendered increasingly acute by the high rate of population growth (2.5 percent per annum) and by the migration of peasants to town in search of economic and social betterment.

II. THE POLITICAL TRADITION AND TREND⁴

4. Chile has a longstanding tradition of respect for constitutional order and civil liberties. Resort to force in politics has been rare.⁵ Election results are normally accepted. Consequently, it has been possible to accomplish a significant political evolution by electoral means. In contrast to the executive domination characteristic of most Latin American countries, in Chile the legislative and judicial powers are respected and effective. A highly competent national constabulary, the Carabineros, is normally able to maintain law and order without the intervention of the military.⁶

5. The upper class monopoly of political power was broken by the presidential election of 1920, but the political predominance of the middle class was not consolidated until the period 1938–52. In the elections of 1938, 1942, and 1946, the largely middle class Radical Party won the Presidency with the support of the Communists and sometimes with that of the Socialists as well. This period of Radical administration illustrates the Chilean adage, "Elect with the left, rule with the right." Once elected, Radical Presidents usually followed moderate policies and often appointed conservatives to cabinet positions. The Radicals enlisted conservative support for their program of rapid industrialization by tacit agreement not to press for agrarian reform. The Communists received three cabinet positions as a reward for their support in the election of 1946, but, when the Party proceeded to foment industrial and agrarian unrest, the Radicals combined with conservatives to pass legislation outlawing it. In general, as upper middle class Radicals have prospered, politically and economically, their interests have come to coincide with those of the upper class.

⁴ For a description of the principal Chilean political organizations and pressure groups, see Annex A.

⁵ This generalization is not true for the period 1924–38, which was marked by disturbances attributable to economic dislocations and to the strains inherent in the transition from upper class to middle class political predominance.

⁶ For a summary description of the Chilean armed forces, see Annex B.

6. The Radicals' program of rapid industrialization failed to live up to expectations, and the distortions which it introduced into the economy resulted in uncontrolled inflation. Consequent popular distress and dissatisfaction defeated the Radical candidate in the presidential election of 1952. The winner of that election was a nationalistic and demagogic "strongman" without party affiliation, General Carlos Ibáñez del Campo.⁷ The voters who elected him evidently desired a strong patrón who would enforce order and relieve distress without reference to any ideology. During Ibáñez' administration, however, real wages continued to decline and unemployment became a serious problem. In their disillusionment and despair, lower class voters began to turn to the ideological left for salvation.

7. Leftist candidates won a majority of the popular vote in the presidential election of 1958. Salvador Allende, the Socialist candidate of a leftist coalition including the Communists,⁸ failed of election because a minor candidate diverted from him a small part of the leftist vote. This fortuitous circumstance permitted the conservative candidate, Jorge Alessandri,⁹ to win the Presidency. Nevertheless, the 1958 election returns foreshadowed the possibility that a coalition including the Communists might come to power by electoral means in 1964.

8. In the face of this threat, and in keeping with his campaign promises, Alessandri has striven to increase production, reduce unemployment, curtail inflation, and carry out moderate agrarian and tax reforms. To obtain needed congressional support, he took Radicals into his cabinet; they stipulated that sufficient reforms must be undertaken to provide a good record for a Radical candidate to run on in the presidential election of 1964. The administration's reform program, however, has been hindered and watered down by the resistance within the government coalition, whose controlling members are not by nature enthusiasts for reform. Although some progressive measures have been adopted, the administration has not accomplished enough to arrest the leftward trend in Chilean politics.¹⁰

⁷ Although the legal proprieties were observed, Ibáñez had ruled Chile as virtually a military dictator, 1926–31, first as Minister of War, then as elected President.

⁸ The Frente de Acción Popular (FRAP). See Annex A.

⁹ Although the candidate of the Conservative and Liberal parties (see Annex A), Alessandri had a good reformist name. His Liberal father had been Chile's outstanding proponent of reform, twice elected to the Presidency (1920–25, and 1932–38) with Radical support.

THE COMPOSITION OF THE CHILEAN CONGRESS

NOTE: 20 Senate seats, distributed as shown in parentheses below, and all Chamber seats will be subject to election in March 1965.

Party	Senate	Chamber
Conservative	4 (2)	17
Liberal	10 (5)	28
Radical	13 (7)	39
Christian Democratic.....	4 (1)	23
National Democratic.....	— —	12
Socialist	7 (3)	12
People's Vanguard.....	1 —	—
Communist.....	4 —	16
Independent.....	2 (2)	—
	45 (20)	147

9. The congressional election in 1961 and the municipal elections in early 1963 have shown that the leftward trend in Chile is continuing. The municipal elections show also, however, that at present the principal beneficiary of this trend is not FRAP, but the Christian Democratic Party (PDC). In the Chilean political spectrum, this reformist offshoot of the Conservative Party stands generally to the left of the Radical Party, but it is explicitly anti-Communist. Its present emergence as the strongest single party in Chile has coincided with a decline in the voting strength of the Conservative and Liberal parties, and also of PADENA,¹¹ the non-Marxist member of FRAP. The PDC is increasingly attracting the votes of frustrated reformists who see little hope in the traditional parties and are antagonized by the communistic tendency of FRAP. This trend is likely to continue, and to make the Christian Democratic Party a formidable contender in the presidential election of 1964.

¹⁰ The resignation of the Radical cabinet members in September 1963 will reduce the pressure for reform within the Alessandri administration. Although the Radicals remain disposed to support further reforms, not much more is likely to be accomplished before the 1964 election.

¹¹ Partido Democrática Nacional. See Annex A.

Party Electoral Strength, 1961 and 1963

	1961 Congressional Elections ^a		1963 Municipal Elections ^b
		Percent		Percent
Democratic Front (FD)
Radicals (PR)	296,704	22.0	427,842	21.60
Liberals (PL)	221,361	16.5	259,683	13.11
Conservatives (PUC)	197,151	14.7	225,075	11.36
Democrats (PD)	—	—	19,409	1.00
Totals	715,216	53.2	932,009	47.07
Popular Action Front (FRAP)
Communists (PCCh)	157,451	11.7	254,178	12.83
Socialists (PS)	149,420	11.1	224,071	11.32
National Democrats (PADENA)	95,282	7.1	101,427	5.12
People's National Vanguard (VNP)	—	—	3,101	.15
Totals	402,153	29.9	582,777	29.42
Christian Democrats (PDC)	213,559	16.5	452,843	22.86
Independents	—	—	12,759	.65

^a The Democratic Front was not yet operative in the 1961 elections but the totals of the parties now comprising it are listed together for comparison with the 1963 totals.

^b In Chile, as elsewhere, municipal elections are normally dominated by local factors. In 1963, however, the national party organizations fought them on national political issues, as a demonstration of party strength in anticipation of the 1964 presidential contest. The estimate of a strong trend toward the PDC does not depend solely on these 1963 returns, but is confirmed by other current indications.

III. THE 1964 PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION

10. Although the 1964 presidential election, to be held in September, is still a year off, the three principal candidates have already been designated. They are Senator Julio Durán Neuman, a Radical, for the Democratic Front (a coalition of the traditional political parties); Senator Salvador Allende Gossens, a Socialist, for the Popular Action Front (FRAP); and Senator Eduardo Frei Montalva for the Christian Democrats. A minor candidate, independent rightist Jorge Prat Echaurren, is also in the race.

11. Durán, 45, is a wealthy lawyer and financier. His nomination was dictated by the inner circle which controls the machinery of the Democratic Front parties. Although his platform professes reformist purposes, he is hardly credible as a champion of reform. For this reason, he has little appeal for independent voters, or for the reform-minded elements of the Democratic Front parties. Moreover, many of the Conservatives, an explicitly Catholic party, may be alienated by the fact that he was once a Mason. For these reasons, many voters who would otherwise have supported the Democratic Front are likely to switch to the other candidates.

12. Disgruntled elements within the Democratic Front now privately contend that Durán cannot win and that President Alessandri should be substituted for him as the Front's presidential candidate. The trouble with this proposal is that the constitution does not allow an incumbent President to succeed himself. To amend this provision in the midst of a presidential campaign would antagonize many voters. Even if the substitute were not Alessandri, but, for example, the generally popular former President Gabriel González Videla, the displacement of Durán would antagonize his supporters and might destroy the Front. It could split the conservative vote between two rival candidates, ensuring the defeat of both. In addition, because the Communists hate and fear González Videla, who outlawed them in 1948, they might decide to support Frei covertly if González Videla became the Democratic Front candidate. For these reasons, and for lack of an adequate substitute candidate, the party managers are presently disposed to stick with Durán.

13. Allende, 55, is running for the third time as the nominee of FRAP. Originally a moderate Socialist, Allende, as a candidate, has adopted a strongly pro-Castro and pro-Soviet line. Some of his Socialist followers are more vehemently revolutionary than are the Communists. (The Communists' present policy, called the vía pacífica is to pursue their ends by strictly political means, with special care to avoid the suppression which they suffered from 1948 to 1958.) Allende's identification with Castroism and communism is likely to antagonize some independent voters and to cause further defections from FRAP. Already most members of PADENA have broken away, two groups declaring themselves for Frei and another for Durán. On the other hand, Allende is an established political figure with considerable personal prestige, a factor not involved in the municipal elections. Moreover, he may gain the support of leftist Radicals unwilling to support either Durán, a plutocrat, or Frei, a Catholic.

14. Frei, 52, a well-known and attractive personality, is certain to benefit from the existing disarray within the Democratic and Popular Action fronts. Although his party won only 23 percent of the vote in the municipal elections, as compared with 29 percent for the FRAP parties and 47 percent for the parties of the Democratic Front, the tide appears to be running strongly in his favor. He will probably outrun Allende in the presidential election. He may even be able to surpass the vote which the Conservative, Liberal, and Radical party machines will be able to deliver for Durán.

15. Prat, 45, is a strong rightist without organized party support. He is likely to attract votes which would otherwise have gone to Durán, or to Frei. Prat recognizes that he might thus bring about the election of Allende; he says that, if this result seems likely, he will withdraw his candidacy. In that event he would probably throw his support to Frei, since he supported the PDC in the municipal elections.

16. The Chilean constitution provides that, if no presidential candidate receives a majority of the popular vote, the Congress (the Senate and Chamber in joint session) shall choose between the two leading contenders. This choice normally devolves upon Congress, as it almost certainly will in 1964. Hitherto, Congress has always chosen the candidate with the greater popular vote. The present Congress, which will hold office until the congressional election in 1965, is composed of 111 representatives of the Democratic Front, 52 representatives of FRAP, 27 Christian Democrats, and two independents. It would almost certainly prefer Durán, but would probably elect Frei if he were to lead in the popular vote. It would not be likely to elect Allende unless he were to lead the poll by a clear margin.

IV. THE ECONOMIC SITUATION

17. Chile's political future will depend to a very considerable extent upon the ability of its economy to increase output and productivity and thereby to provide adequate levels of living for the rapidly expanding population. Chile's basic resources are adequate for this purpose, but only if they are more rationally utilized, and if there is a more equitable distribution of the national income. Since the war Chile's economic growth has lagged behind much of the rest of Latin America. Between 1950 and 1960, GNP increased by an average of 3.5 percent per year, but this represented only about a 1 percent increase per capita. Nevertheless, the real wages of urban blue collar and rural workers declined over the same period. These workers and their families make up somewhat more than half of the Chilean population.

18. Chile's extensive natural resources include the world's largest known deposits of nitrates and medium-grade copper ore, and large deposits of high-grade iron ore. The country has sizable deposits of medium and low grade coal, but lacks coking coal. A large but little exploited hydroelectric power potential exists near the largest concentration of population. Petroleum reserves in the South are probably adequate to meet domestic requirements. The amount of arable land, if properly utilized, is more than adequate for Chilean needs. The country has extensive forests, and its rich fishery resources have barely been tapped. The largely homogeneous population and a relatively well-developed educational system provide human resources that are also considerably above the Latin American mean.

19. Many of Chile's economic problems stem from the shortcomings of its agriculture. A large proportion of the best Chilean agricultural land is organized in large holdings; much of it has been underutilized. At the other end of the scale there are many tiny properties inadequate to provide more than a bare subsistence living. Agriculture as a whole has suffered from technical backwardness, inadequate investment, and poorly developed distribution and marketing facilities. As late as the early 1940s Chile was a net exporter of agricultural commodities, but now it must spend an increasing share of its foreign exchange earnings on agricultural imports, over half of which consists of foodstuffs that could be produced domestically. While agriculture accounts for only 12 percent of GNP, it employs about 30 percent of the country's labor force. Thus labor productivity is low and the cash income of the rural laborer is substantially below the national average. Between 1950 and 1960 agricultural production grew at an average rate of 1.8 percent, less than the annual average population growth of 2.5 percent.

20. Industrial development has had the solicitous attention of successive Chilean Governments for most of the present century, and has since 1938 received the principal emphasis in Chilean economic policy. The objective has been to provide employment opportunities for workers who could no longer be absorbed in agriculture, and to help conserve foreign exchange. Industry was assisted in various ways, including high tariffs, easy credit, and exchange policies favoring imports of raw materials and foodstuffs for the expanding industrial labor force. Favoritism for industry intensified the urban-rural imbalance and increased pressures from other sectors of the Chilean economy. Neglected agricultural interests, penalized by low farm prices, fought to maintain their relative freedom from taxes. Lacking incentives for investment in farm production, large landholders increasingly clung to unproductive estates primarily as a hedge against inflation. Organized labor secured periodic wage adjustments to compensate for steady rises in the cost of living—due in large part to increased food costs. As a consequence, industry was allowed to raise its prices to re-establish working capital and profit levels reduced by increased wage bills. The result of this combination of the drive for industrialization and concessions to pressure groups has been unbalanced growth, declining productivity, and inflation that has ranged from 15 to as high as 80 percent per annum.

21. There has been a considerable growth in industry since the war and it now accounts for over one-quarter of GNP and provides 75 percent of Chile's consumer goods. Industry has not, however, realized the hopes originally held out for it. It is heavily dependent upon imported capital equipment and raw materials, and, far from relieving the balance of payments, has been a continuing burden upon it. Because much of Chilean industry is monopolistic and inefficient, it is handicapped in competing for foreign markets, and inflates the internal price structure. The limited size of the domestic market, so long as it is coupled with depressed living standards for nearly half the population, makes it difficult for industry to achieve economies of scale. In these circumstances Chilean industry has virtually exhausted the opportunities for substituting its own products for imported consumer goods and lacks the capital and know-how to compete with imported heavy industrial products. Industry has not been able to absorb more than a fraction of the annual additions to the labor force.

22. The inability of industry and agriculture to provide employment opportunities for the growing labor force has led to the development of a large service sector, which accounts for over 50 percent of GNP and about one-third of the labor force. Commercial activities make substantial contributions to GNP, but the balance of the service sector—particularly government and personal services—has become a reservoir for surplus labor and is highly inefficient. Successive national governments, committed to a policy of full employment and extensive welfare services, have increased public expenditures to support a growing bureaucracy and other service sector activities. Although underemployment as well as unemployment have been reduced by the upturn of the economy since 1960, both persist as serious basic problems.

23. Inflation has been a major Chilean problem since the last century. It became particularly acute after World War II, despite recurrent efforts by the government since 1956 to curb it. The expanding role of the government in the economy has been a major cause of inflation as revenues, largely dependent on foreign trade, have failed to keep pace with the rising level of government expenditures. Inflation has been fed by easy credit policies and the success of politically influential groups in repeatedly securing relaxation and subsequent abandonment of stabilization programs. Other basic causes of inflation have been the slow growth of Chilean agriculture, a long term worsening of the terms of trade over the past 25 years, and an official policy of annual wage increases to offset rises in living costs. In the year ending 1 July 1963, the cost of living index rose 45 percent, and even sharper rises have occurred during the past decade.

24. The persistent balance of payments problem has been aggravated rather than aided by efforts to protect both agriculture and industry and by substantial flights of capital. As a result Chile has not been able to accumulate a sizable foreign exchange reserve to cushion the impact of sharp variations in earnings from mineral exports, which provide over 85 percent of export income. Despite continued expansion in the output of the mining sector, net deficit on current account totalled $186 million in 1960 and $225 million in 1961. In 1962 the Alessandri administration was able to reduce the deficit to $115 million by imposing severe restrictions on imports and by devaluing the escudo in October. Large-scale foreign financial assistance has been necessary, however, to prevent a serious curtailment of economic activity. The US, the principal source of outside assistance, has committed some $570 million since 1958 in support of the present administration's programs.

25. Foreign private investment by Europeans and Japanese is increasing, but US direct private investment (est. $800 million) accounts for 70 percent of all foreign investment in Chile. The US investment is located principally in mining and public utilities, activities in which foreign capital is particularly vulnerable to political attack in Latin America. Because the mining industry is isolated from the main stream of Chilean life—located in geographically remote areas and employing relatively few workers—it has made little contribution to local technology or the modernization of business outlooks and management. These companies are threatened by proposals for nationalization and are subjected to discriminatory treatment such as the new tax boosts which, in 1961, caused the two big US copper companies to postpone plans for large new investments to expand production.

26. The Alessandri administration announced in 1960 a 10-year development plan which would need to be supported by an estimated $8 billion investment, including $1.3 billion of foreign capital. The plan envisages an overall annual growth in GNP of 5.5 percent through increased investment in various fields with particular emphasis upon economic infrastructure—roads, ports, power, irrigation, and housing. The plan has been criticized for its failure to address itself to the basic problems of rural-urban imbalance, to take much cognizance of Chile's increasingly urgent social problems, and to provide for the self-help measures called for under the Alliance for Progress.

27. Chilean efforts, since October 1962 to carry out a new stabilization plan essential to the 10-year plan's success are being supported by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the US has provided financial assistance for both programs.¹² Much of the substantial aid Chile has received from other official Western sources has also been committed during the Alessandri administration.¹³ However, Chile still faces a major problem in financing its development program because of its limited ability to service additional external borrowings on conventional terms. At present over one-quarter of the country's free exchange earnings go to service existing convertible currency obligations, estimated at close to $1 billion. Debt service will take $110 million in 1963 and $109 million in 1964, and is manageable only because much of the new external assistance coming from AID and IDB is on "soft" terms.

¹² The IMF standby agreement allows drawings up to $40 million in balance of payments aid during 1963. The US aid includes a $35 million program support loan from AID; a $15 million balance of credits payment from the Export-Import Bank; and a $10 million exchange agreement with the US Treasury Department.

28. Under urging from the foreign sources of needed credits and from domestic advocates of reform, the Alessandri administration has initiated agrarian and tax reform proposals, in accordance with the Alliance for Progress, some of which have been passed while other portions continue to face serious congressional opposition. The administration has made considerable progress in housing and school construction, which has had a salutary social effect but does nothing to produce needed foreign exchange. It has not been able to correct the underuse of land, which would increase productivity and improve Chile's payment situation. Although a modest agrarian reform law has been passed, its implementation has been impeded by the political power of the large landholders.

29. At present, the Chilean economy looks healthy, with sales, employment, mining, construction, and agricultural output at high levels. This stems principally from the large budgetary and balance of payments support from the IMF, Ex-Im Bank, and IDB, and developmental assistance made available by the Alliance for Progress. At the same time, the political-economic obstacles to growth and stability still persist. Any government coming to power will have to contend with the vested interests which control agriculture, finance, and industry. These interests have successfully resisted much of the present government's attempts at structural economic reform, and it can be expected to fight strongly any more far-reaching encroachments on their traditional privileges. Elements of the Right have come to realize that inflation will not generate lasting economic growth and that some rationalization of the country's economic structure is necessary. Nevertheless, the conservatives continue to dispute with one another and the rest of the population how far and how fast the reforms which would achieve this rationalization should be implemented. The present government can be expected to pursue sufficiently disciplined fiscal-monetary policies, and a token rate of reform enactment, to qualify for continued US and IMF support. But after September 1964, the direction the economy will take will depend heavily upon the ideology of the new President, and his success—or lack of success—in pushing through economic and social reforms.

¹³ This includes a loan of over $50 million from the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB); loans of $97 million from the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (IBRD); International Development Association (IDA) loans of $19 million; and Development Assistance Commission (DAC) country assistance of $173 million.

V. FOREIGN RELATIONS

30. Successive Chilean administrations, including Alessandri's, have in general sought to maintain close and cooperative relations with the US, the major source of new investment capital and the country's most important single trading partner. Underlying this general policy, however, there is a widespread nationalistic concern to assert Chile's dignity and independence in foreign relations. This nationalistic sentiment finds expression in a tendency to criticize US policies and actions, and to pursue divergent policies on particular occasions.

31. Many factors contribute to Chile's nationalistic sensitivity and its anti-US manifestations. The Communists, of course, and many Socialists also, do their utmost to foment and exploit such sentiments expressly in order to impair US-Chilean relations. They attack as Yankee economic imperialism not only such targets as the US mining companies, but also the Alliance for Progress. But economic nationalism is also characteristic of the Chilean middle and upper classes. The latter, in addition, resent the self-help and reformist terms of the Alliance for Progress. There is a widespread tendency to consider that Chile's economic difficulties result from US control of copper mining, Chile's major export industry.

32. The status of the US-owned copper mining companies is likely to continue to cause serious difficulties in US-Chilean relations. The Chilean economy depends heavily on the export earnings of these copper mines. Their development has been beneficial to Chile, and particularly to their Chilean employees, as well as profitable to the investors. Nevertheless, there is agreement across the entire political spectrum, from Communists to Conservatives, that the copper companies should be made to contribute more to Chile. The question is how to derive more income and employment from the industry. Moderates recognize that the companies already pay more taxes and labor benefit than any other enterprise in the country. Moreover, they know that punitive measures only discourage new company investment that is needed to support Chile's Ten-Year Plan of Development. Only the most radical elements favor outright nationalization, for which Chile would not be able to pay promptly, if at all, thus jeopardizing its international credit. An approach which has considerable support would be to "Chileanize" the companies by insisting on 1) incorporation under Chilean law with Chilean capital participation; 2) use of more Chilean managers and top-echelon technicians; 3) greater government control over copper production and sales; and 4) an increase in the amount of copper refined in Chile.

33. Although Chile gave prompt and unequivocal support to the US during the missile base crisis of October 1962, it is one of the five Latin American countries that still maintain diplomatic relations with Cuba. The Alessandri administration defends this position on juridical grounds. Its chief reason appears to be fear of the strength shown by the pro-Castro FRAP in the presidential election of 1958 and a desire not to inject such an emotional issue into the election of 1964. It has also found it beneficial to exchange Chilean agricultural products for Cuban sugar.

34. Chile maintains diplomatic relations with only one other Communist country, Yugoslavia, but permits the USSR, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Communist China to maintain small commercial or cultural (propaganda) missions in Chile. This permission reflects the official and popular view that Chile must develop new trade wherever it can. There is a persistent popular belief that the Communist countries could absorb far larger amounts of Chilean copper. Despite the best efforts of these missions, however, Chile's trade with Communist countries so far remains negligible.

35. Chile's territorial aggrandizement at the expense of Bolivia and Peru during the War of the Pacific (1879–1883) leaves a residue of underlying tension in Chile's relations with those countries. It is this factor which has rendered so intractable Chile's dispute with Bolivia over the waters of the Rio Lauca. Chile's relations with Argentina are normally cordial, despite a minor unresolved boundary dispute.

VI. CONTINGENT POLITICAL PROSPECTS

36. The outcome of the 1964 presidential election cannot be predicted a year in advance. The political situation is extremely fluid, with dissatisfaction rife within both the Democratic Front and the Popular Action Front, and with an apparent trend toward the Christian Democrats, who, however, start from behind. The electoral campaign, as it develops, may produce further political fragmentation and realignments, or may produce a rallying effect. In these circumstances, we shall briefly consider post-election prospects in contingent terms.

37. If Durán should be elected to the Presidency in 1964, the Chilean Government's policies and performance would remain much as they have been under Alessandri, but without the benefit of Alessandri's personal prestige and sincerity. The administration would profess reformist purposes, but its reform measures would be watered down by its need to placate various vested interests. It would be interested in economic development, and any accomplishments on that line might produce some social amelioration.

38. If Frei should be elected to the Presidency, he would be dependent, at least initially, on the cooperation of a Congress not under his control. It is likely, however, that the same trend which had brought him to the Presidency would give him a sympathetic Congress in 1965. There is no doubt that Frei would strive to transform the social structure of Chile through the constitutional enactment of a far-reaching agrarian reform and a steeply progressive income tax, and through increased government planning and participation in the economy. Frei would be generally sympathetic toward the self help and social goals of the Alliance for Progress, but selective with respect to the participation of foreign private capital in Chilean economic development. He would move toward the "Chileanization" of the US-owned mining companies. In all this he would, of course, be strongly resisted by the affected vested interests.

39. If Allende were to be elected, he would face a hostile majority in Congress, at least until the congressional election in 1965. In return for patronage, however, some Radicals might be induced to collaborate with him in Congress. The Christian Democrats also might support him on some issues.

40. In office, Allende would be likely to moderate his extremism, at least initially, in order to obtain Radical and PDC support and also to avoid provoking a military reaction. The military commitment to a non-political role is not unconditional, as was demonstrated during the turbulent years, 1924-1932. If Allende should impatiently attempt to override Congress, the military would almost certainly intervene to preserve constitutional order. If he should too abruptly seek to impose his personal control on the military establishment, there might also be a reaction. Otherwise, the military and the Carabineros would be likely to support the duly elected regime.

41. Despite the tactical moderation indicated above, an Allende administration would be strongly nationalistic and therefore, in effect, anti-US. It would, of course, endeavor to gain control of Congress in the 1965 election and move administratively to gain secure control of the armed forces as soon as practicable. It would seek to consolidate leftist and nationalist support by presenting a program of radical social reform and economic statism, and by increasing demands on the US copper mining countries and other foreign interests. In this it could count on the sympathy of some Radical and Christian Democratic elements. In the name of the independent foreign policy, it would also seek to expand relations with Cuba and other Communist countries.

42. If, through the defeat of Allende, the Communists and Allende Socialists should be frustrated in their once-lively expectation of achieving power by electoral means, they might consider abandoning the vía pacífica and seek to foment a proletarian revolution in Chile. The odds are against their doing so. Despite peasant grievances, there is at present no significant potential for rural insurgency in Chile. The landlords and the Carabineros have the rural situation under close control. There is greater danger of a revolutionary explosion in the slums of the urban proletariat, but this too could almost certainly be controlled by the Carabineros and the military.

43. In these circumstances, the Chilean Communists' post-election strategy would probably be to preserve their legal status and bide their time, trusting that conservative political influences would continue to prevent effective social reform and that the cumulative frustrations and resentments of the masses would eventually enable them to come to power, by election or by revolution. In the meantime, the Communists would, of course, continue their efforts to exacerbate social tensions in Chile and to disrupt US-Chilean relations.

44. It is hardly likely that any Democratic Front administration could satisfy the rising popular demand for social reform. The political effect of increasing popular dissatisfaction could be a continuation of the current trend toward the Christian Democratic Party, with PDC gains in the congressional elections of 1965 and 1969 and the election of a Christian Democratic president in 1970. It is equally possible, however, that the increasingly embittered lower classes would turn to the far-left for leadership, as the Communist hope and expect they will.

Annex A

POLITICAL ORGANIZATIONS AND PRESSURE GROUPS

I. POLITICAL PARTIES AND COALITIONS

A. The Democratic Front (Frente Democrática—FD)

1. The Democratic Front, composed of Chile's three traditional parties, the Conservatives, the Liberals, and the Radicals, was formally organized in October 1962, in order to regularize the existing informal collaboration of those parties in support of the Alessandri administration and to present a single joint candidate in the 1964 presidential election. These traditional parties, originally formed to contend against each other, have common interests in opposition to the rising new parties of the Left and realize that they must combine to have any hope of coping with the leftward trend in Chilean politics. Because Radical participation was indispensable, the Conservatives and Liberals had to agree to support a Radical candidate in 1964.

2. Despite this community of interest, there are tensions and conflicts within the Front, not only among the three constituent parties, but also within them. These tensions have been accentuated by the withdrawal of the Radicals from the cabinet in September 1963.

3. The Conservative Party (Partido Conservador Unido—PCU) represents primarily the landed aristocrats who ruled the republic in its earliest years and still exercise great social and political influence, no matter what party is in power. They determine party policy. The party's voting strength is provided by their tenants. It polled 11 percent of the vote in the 1963 municipal elections. Every member of the party is required to be a practicing Catholic.

4. The Liberal Party (Partido Liberal—PL) was founded in 1842 by aristocratic youths who were inspired by the tenets of contemporary French liberalism and desired to modernize Chile in those terms. It has come to represent primarily the well-established commercial, industrial, and banking interests, upper middle class professional men, and some substantial landholders. The party polled 13 percent of the vote in the 1963 elections.

5. The Radical Party (Partido Radical—PR) was founded in 1862 by dissident Liberals advocating more radical political reforms. It became primarily the political vehicle of the rising middle class, although it includes also some elements of organized labor. It has developed the most pervasive party organization in Chile, with particular strength in the small towns, and was for years the largest single party in the country. It is still a close second, with 22 percent of the vote in the 1963 municipal elections.

6. Despite its elaborate organization, the Radical Party is no longer a cohesive political grouping. It is led by a right-wing minority which controls the party machinery, but the bulk of the membership are centrists and there is a small but vigorous left wing. The center and left-wing Radicals are uncomfortable in coalition with the Conservatives and Liberals, but so far the party organization has held the Party together and there have been no important defections.

7. Inasmuch as most Radical party functionaries are not independently wealthy, as are most Conservatives and Liberals, access to patronage is vital to the party. This consideration contributed to the party's decision to collaborate with the Liberal-Conservative Alessandri administration. The same consideration would move it toward accommodation with any other party in power—with the Christian Democrats, for example, or even with FRAP. Already there are some indications of Radical collaboration with FRAP to stop the Christian Democrats.

B. The Popular Action Front (Frente de Acción Popular—FRAP)

8. The Socialist Worker Party was organized in 1912 as a means of proletarian protest against the status quo. From it are derived both the Communist Party and Socialist Party. These parties participated with the Radicals in forming the first Popular Front (1938–1941). They formed the Popular Action Front in 1951, primarily as a device which would permit the outlawed Communist Party to continue political activity, to the advantage of Socialist candidates. A more recent adherent to the Front is the National Democratic Party (PADENA), formed in 1960.

9. The Popular Action Front, composed mainly of extremist elements, is far from harmonious. Although the Socialist party leadership, often seems more militantly revolutionary than the Communists, many Socialists have serious misgivings about close association with the Communists, on both ideological and practical political grounds, and conflicts between the two elements occasionally flare up. The National Democrats, a radical, but non-Marxist, middle class party, have had even greater misgivings about political association with the Socialists and Communists.

10. The Communist Party (Partido Comunista de Chile—PCCH) was organized in 1922 as a branch of the Third International. The party was severely suppressed during the Ibáñez dictatorship (1926–1931), reached the peak of its political influence in the 1946 coalition with the Radicals, and was again outlawed, 1948–1958. It has since regained strength, and with 20 members in Congress it is probably the most influential Communist party in South America.

11. The contrast between the political success which the party has enjoyed when pursuing popular front tactics and the suppression which it has suffered whenever it turned to subversive agitation and violence has led the PCCH to adopt a policy called the via pacífica—the pursuit of revolutionary ends by peaceful political means. The party's overriding concern appears to be to retain its present legal status. It has refused to send members to Cuba for guerrilla warfare training, as the Socialists have done. It strongly supports the Soviet line in the Sino-Soviet controversy.

12. The Communist party leadership is of middle class origin; the party draws its support chiefly from industrial labor and lower middle class elements. There are estimated to be about 30,000 disciplined party members. The party polled 254,000 votes in the 1963 elections, nearly 13 percent of the total vote. It was the only party except the Christian Democrats to make a perceptible gain in strength.

13. The Socialist Party (Partido Socialista—PS) is an amalgamation of socialist splinter groups formed in 1933 following suppression during the Ibáñez dictatorship. The party is beset by strident factionalism. One leader, Salvador Allende, the presidential candidate, is outspokenly pro-Soviet and pro-Castro; another, Raúl Ampuero, the party secretary, is unenthusiastic about Castro and frequently critical of the USSR. The party membership and political support are drawn from the same elements as the Communists'; there is latent competition between the two parties on this account. Separation of the Socialists from the Communists would isolate the latter and reduce Communist capabilities. The Socialists polled 11 percent of the vote in the 1963 elections.

14. The National Democratic Party (Partido Democrático Nacional—PADENA), organized in 1960, is an agglomeration of radical middle class elements that had supported Ibáñez for the presidency in 1952. PADENA's bitter opposition to the traditional political parties brought it into the Popular Action Front, but its members feel increasingly uncomfortable in company with the Allende Socialists and the Communists, especially considering the party's losses in the 1963 elections, in which it polled only 5 percent of the vote. Since then most of the party's members have defected. Others may follow suit, or the party as a whole may withdraw from FRAP.

C. The Christian Democrats (Partido Demócrata Cristiano—PDC)

15. In 1938 some young Conservatives, having failed to persuade their elders to adopt a more progressive program based on the papal social encyclicals, splintered off to form a Catholic party with some appeal to organized labor. In 1949, other Conservatives, inspired by the contemporary Christian Democratic movement in Europe, also broke away. The appeal of this second group was primarily to middle class Catholics. The Christian Democratic Party was formed by the fusion of these two movements in 1957.

16. The new party occupies the middle ground between the conservatism of the traditional parties on the right and the extremism of FRAP on the left. It is a credibly reformist party, but within a Christian and democratic context. Its phenomenal growth in recent years demonstrates the strong attraction of this position to independent, reform-minded voters who see little hope in the traditional parties and are repelled by the communistic tendency of FRAP. In the 1963 election the PDC polled 453,000 votes (23 percent), to become the largest single party in Chile. This trend is likely to continue as the party exerts a strong attraction, not only on independent voters, but also on the reform-minded elements of the traditional parties and the more moderate elements in FRAP.

17. The PDC's program calls for a revolutionary transformation of Chilean society, to be accomplished through constitutional processes. It advocates a more far-reaching agrarian reform than that proposed by the Alessandri administration, a redistribution of wealth through a steeply progressive income tax, and increased government planning and participation in the economy. It welcomed the Alliance for Progress with enthusiasm, but is cool toward US emphasis on the role of private capital. As do all other Chilean parties, it prefers intergovernmental financial assistance to foreign private investment. The PDC does not advocate nationalization of the US-owned copper mining companies, but calls for their eventual “Chileanization,” beginning with local refining of all Chilean copper and more government participation in the determination of copper sales policies.

II. OTHER ORGANIZATIONS EXERTING POLITICAL INFLUENCE

18. Economic Interests. No matter what political party was in power, vested economic interests have continued to exert powerful political influence through personal relationships and through representative organizations.

a. The National Agricultural Society, founded in 1838, is composed by large land holders. It is by law represented on the boards of directors of such public institutions as the Central Bank, the Production Development Corporation, and the National Labor Relations Board. The Society includes Liberals as well as Conservatives, inasmuch as success in business is customarily demonstrated by the purchase of a landed estate. Its influence is exerted against any change in the pattern of land tenure or any significant increase in land taxes.

b. The Central Chamber of Commerce, organized in 1958, is predominantly Liberal in political coloration. It opposes state intervention in the economy, resists wage increases as inflationary, and advocates increased production as the cure for inflation. It is less influential than the Agricultural Society because there is not a united front among business groups regarding economic policies.

c. The Society for Industrial Development, organized in 1883, advocates state intervention in the economy to protect domestic industries and to encourage foreign private investments not competitive with local interests. It includes Radicals as well as Liberals and was a powerful influence behind the Radical program of rapid industrialization, 1938–1952.

19. Organized Labor. The Chilean movement is not a strong political pressure group. Only about 500,000 workers (20 percent of the labor force) are organized. Furthermore, the law discriminates between white collar and blue collar unions, imposing restrictions on the latter. The white collar unions have gained substantial benefits for their members through their association with the Radical Party. They have not been concerned with the interests of manual laborers. Lack of savings and the prevalence of unemployment have reduced the militancy of the workers in recent years and their willingness to heed a strike call.

20. The political affiliations of most industrial labor unions have been a hindrance to labor unity and effectiveness as a pressure group. Union leadership is more often used to serve party purposes than to advance the economic interests of the members. In consequence, the members are increasingly unresponsive to the leadership. For example, the Communists have captured "control" of the principal Chilean labor confederation, CUTCh,¹⁴ but some members have refused to respond to Communist orders to strike. Nevertheless, the Communists are able to make political propaganda purportedly in the name of Chilean labor.

21. Student Organizations. All of the major political parties have formally organized youth groups; many current political leaders first achieved prominence as heads of university student associations. The oldest and most important of these is the student federation at the University of Chile (FECh),¹⁵ which was long controlled by Radicals or Communists. In 1955 the Christian Democrats wrested control of the FECh from the Communists. Since then they have gradually gained control of the student federations at Chile's seven other universities. While PDC-led student organizations occasionally criticize US policies, the strong anti-US animus which prevailed under Communist leadership is no longer evident. The prevalence of PDC influence among the students has been an important factor in the support which the party has received from new voters in recent years.

22. The Church. Historically, the close identification of the Roman Catholic Church with the Conservative Party has provoked a considerable anticlerical reaction among Liberals and Radicals, not to mention Socialists and Communists. Church and State were finally separated in Chile in 1925. Nevertheless, the Church retains a pervasive influence in Chilean society.

23. In September 1962 a revolutionary change in the attitude of the Church in Chile was marked by the issuance of a pastoral letter in which the hierarchy, led by Cardinal Silva Henríquez, cited the poverty and distress of the lower classes, charged the propertied classes with large responsibility for these conditions, and called for a genuine reform of the social structure. The pastoral letter may not convert many magnates, but it has tended to restore the credit of the Church among the general population and it may have had considerable bearing on the striking success of the Christian Democratic Party in the 1963 municipal elections.

24. Although the PDC is no longer an exclusively Catholic party (as are the Conservatives), it now has the support of an estimated 80 percent of the Catholic clergy. This clerical support may tend to alienate some potential recruits of Liberal, Radical, and Socialist antecedents, but on the whole it will probably prove to be advantageous.

¹⁴ Central Unica de Trabajadores de Chile, ostensibly representing 400,000 organized workers.

¹⁵ Federación de Estudiantes de Chile.

Annex B

THE ARMED FORCES AND INTERNAL SECURITY

1. The Chilean military forces are distinguished in Latin America for a proud military tradition dating from the War of the Pacific (1879–1883) and for continuing high discipline, morale, and military efficiency. Their equipment, however, is in serious need of modernization. The armed forces which they watch with particular sensitivity, as a standard of comparison, are those of Peru and Argentina. To avoid the costs of rearmament, in view of the urgent requirements of economic development, the Chilean government occasionally proposes an arms limitation agreement under OAS auspices, but such proposals have met with no response.

2. The Chilean Army numbers 26,000 men; the Navy, 13,500; and the Air Force, 7,300. Primary responsibility for the maintenance of public order and internal security is assigned to the Carabineros, a national constabulary numbering 23,000 men.

3. The Carabineros are a highly professional force. They thoroughly patrol the country and are generally respected by the people: the development of any insurgency would be unlikely to escape their notice and counteraction. Although fairly well equipped with small arms, they are somewhat hampered by a lack of adequate transportation and communications equipment.

4. Normally, the Carabineros have been able to cope with threats to public order and internal security. If and when situations arise requiring the intervention of the military, the Army assumes command. Although there is some inter-service jealousy between the Army and the Carabineros, their cooperation on such occasions has been reasonably good.

5. The rank and file of the Army is composed of conscripts, but on entrance into service they are carefully screened for reliability. Recent and planned US-sponsored equipment and training programs are designed to improve the Army's counterinsurgency capability. In the Air Force, a fighter-bomber and a helicopter unit have received similar specialized training.

6. The Chilean military forces are proud of their role as the ultimate guardians of constitutional order and their corollary tradition of nonintervention in politics in support of party interests. They would almost certainly uphold the authority of any duly elected government, unless, in their judgment, the government itself had moved to subvert the established constitutional order. It is notable, however, that they did overthrow the constitutional government in 1924, in circumstances involving a radical departure from the previously long-established political norm and a general economic collapse. Military intervention in politics can happen in Chile, though not without strong provocation.

46. Memorandum of conversation, November 14, among Belcher, Thompson, Richardson, Carlisle, and others¹

November 14, 1963

SUBJECT

Chilean Presidential Election 1964, and Implications for US Strategy and Policy

PARTICIPANTS

Taylor G. Belcher, WST
Herbert B. Thompson, WST
Ralph W. Richardson, WST/C
Lois Carlisle, RAR
[text not declassified]

The rough agenda of the meeting was per the attached questions. The following are views of various participants in the meeting and do not particularly reflect any consensus.

1. The importance of issues

In 1958 Alessandri emphasized creating more jobs and lowering prices.

The [less than 1 line not declassified] opinion poll of early 1963 clearly shows that domestic economic issues are the main preoccupations of the public: price controls; cost of living; Government control over key sectors of the economy, etc.

2. What is the problem facing the Department?

We have to determine whether the constellation of forces behind Durán is in our interest. [1½ lines not declassified]

3. Issues versus Personalities

These factors are inter-related. The candidate's personality is interpreted by a voter in terms of whether that candidate can be expected to deliver on an issue (credibility). Also involved are party machinery and party discipline.

¹ Chilean Presidential election of 1964 and implications for U.S. strategy and policy. Secret. 4 pp. DOS, CF, POL 14 CHILE.

4. Increased Voters

A reasonable assumption is that a large proportion are young. Another assumption then is that the Liberals and Conservatives can expect to attract a relatively smaller proportion of the new vote and probably that “more” will go further left than the Radicals. This leads to the assumption that the Radical-Democratic Front platform will have to be farther left, if it is to stand a chance of attracting new independent voters.

5. The Independent Vote

We should be careful in trying to apply election results from the municipal elections. Possibly a better means of measuring potential strengths of the four candidates would be to divide the electoral population into blue collar, white collar, students, etc., and guess which candidate is the stronger in each sector.

6. The Durán Candidacy

Durán obviously is in trouble. The major factor affecting him is Alessandri's unclear position. If Alessandri were to make it absolutely clear he is not available for re-election and if he were to clearly show he endorses Durán (this need not be open, but could be done quietly but still clearly) Durán's chances would increase a great deal.

[text not declassified]

There are serious problems here. For one, Alessandri may have dark designs involving Prat's candidacy. [1½ lines not declassified]

7. Are the Socialists Committed to Allende?

The Socialists are locked and trapped into supporting Allende. The only way this would change would be if the Communists took the initiative and dropped Allende.

We need to take the Allende campaign seriously. [text not declassified]

8. Dumping of Candidates

From history, it appears that no major candidate ever has dropped out of a campaign. If this is correct, dumping Durán would have a tremendous impact on the Front and would weaken its chances of continuing with a new candidate.

It may well be that Liberals and Conservatives are going on supporting Durán, knowing that he cannot win but realizing that if he folds up many Radicals will swing to Allende. We should keep in mind the recent Chilean analysis that it was Bossay's candidacy in 1958 which denied Allende victory, not the Cura of Catapilco. Durán could fill the same function in relation to Frei versus Allende.

9. Does Frei Need an Ally to Win?

Yes, [less than 1 line not declassified] he needs more strength. However, the PDC line is that the party is drawing from party strength on left and right and is the leader in attracting independent voters. That combination gives the PDC its chance to win.

It is interesting that within the week some Radicals are reportedly wondering whether they might make a deal with Frei. We have given up our ideal of a Christian Democrat-Radical combination. [2 lines not declassified]

[text not declassified]

11. Durán Campaign

[1½ lines not declassified] If it does roll, the Conservatives and Liberals are going to stay with him since they have no other place to go. [1½ lines not declassified]

12. Significance of Last Two Elections

The Ibañez and Alessandri elections show the public wants a change from the status quo. [1½ lines not declassified] The party with the best image of "change" is the PDC.

Colombia

47. Memorandum of conversation, February 17, among Rusk, Ambassador Sanz de Santamaría, and U.S. and Colombian officials¹

February 17, 1961

SUBJECT

Various matters of mutual interest to Colombia and the United States

PARTICIPANTS

The Secretary
Dr. Carlos Sanz de Santamaría, Ambassador of Colombia
José Camacho Lorenzana, Minister of Colombia
Mr. Mann, Assistant Secretary, ARA
Mr. Moskowitz, WST/CO

1. Military Assistance.

By appointment, under instructions from his President, Ambassador Sanz de Santamaría, accompanied by Minister Camacho, called on the Secretary to discuss matters of mutual interest. The Ambassador first mentioned the desire of his Government to have the military assistance it was receiving from the United States reoriented to place greater emphasis on internal security training, as the most effective contribution Colombia could make to hemispheric defense would be in the form of maintaining internal peace and stability within Colombia. The Colombian military and police should be trained to cope with internal violence, banditry, and guerrilla warfare. Colombia was interested in a revision of the existing military assistance agreements with the United States. President Lleras felt that the contemplated assistance (the proposed $1,670,000 "special package" plan) would fall short of Colombia's needs.

The Secretary replied that the Department had been studying the matter of internal security assistance to friendly Latin American Governments and mentioned that the United States was at the point of implementing our assistance to Colombia in connection with eradicating the violence problem there. It was pointed out that implementation of the proposed assistance to Colombia would best determine what additional assistance, if any, was needed.

¹ Exchange of views on matters of mutual interest. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 330.

2. Problem of Coffee.

The Ambassador suggested that the United States could make a significant contribution toward easing the coffee problem by using 10 percent of its contemplated $500 million Social Development Fund to set up a coffee buffer stock to help stabilize coffee prices.

The Secretary replied that the suggested use of $50 million for such a purpose would be very difficult. He mentioned the problems the United States Government had with our own agricultural commodity surpluses, and said it would not be possible to justify our subsidization of surplus agricultural commodities of other countries.

3. Problem of Sugar.

The Ambassador said that Colombia was not a major sugar exporter and did not expect to become one in the future; but wanted to diversify its economy somewhat by expanding its sugar production and hoped to be able to supply the United States market with 50 thousand tons annually. The Ambassador mentioned that at his recent luncheon conference with United States Congressmen of the House Agriculture Committee he had stressed the unfavorable impact on Latin American opinion of the United States continuing to import sugar from the dictatorial Dominican Republic while democratic countries friendly to the United States did not have quotas under United States sugar legislation.

The Secretary referred to the difficulties involved in changing sugar legislation and mentioned the fact that President Eisenhower had asked Congress to eliminate the Dominican windfall but had been turned down. He mentioned the need to take into account future purchases from Cuba, when a democratic regime is restored in that country, and the growing demand by United States domestic sugar producers against expanding imports.

4. Prospect of Loans to Colombia for Low Cost Housing.

The Ambassador said that President Lleras felt that one of the most important and urgent social development needs of Colombia was that of low cost housing in the major cities. President Lleras has hoped for credit assistance for housing from the United States, but the DLF line of credit to Colombia is predicated on the formation of new financial institutions in Colombia which would require legislative action by the Colombian Congress, thus further delaying the badly needed housing program. He said Colombia has existing housing institutions which are functioning well and President Lleras feels an immediate start should be made in low cost housing through these institutions.

The Secretary indicated his awareness of the importance of the housing problem in Colombia. Mr. Mann remarked that a joint DLF/Exim Bank mission was in Colombia at the present time looking into the matter.

5. Cuban Problem.

The Ambassador brought up this subject, indicating his Government's awareness of the hemispheric proportions of the Cuban problem. He mentioned the Ecuadoran Foreign Minister's attempted mediation efforts and the Colombian Foreign Minister's reply to the Ecuadoran gesture. He said his Government feels that an attempt should be made to ask the Cuban Government to submit itself to the discipline of the Inter-American system and that, failing in this, multilateral measures might be adopted to deal with this problem. He emphasized the importance of considering the position of the two key major Latin American countries, Mexico and Brazil.

The Secretary stated that we were not so much concerned by the Cuban revolution as an internal phenomenon as we were by its extra-continental implications. While we deplore the dictatorial methods of the Castro regime, what really disturbs us is its alliance with international Communism, its past efforts to overthrow other governments in the Caribbean and the professed aspirations of its leaders to foment subversive revolutions against those governments it considers unfriendly.

48. Memorandum of conversation, February 25, between Lleras Camargo and Adolf A. Berle, Jr.¹

February 25, 1961

In accordance with an arrangement made at dinner the night before, we met in President Lleras Camargo's office this morning at 9:30 a.m. We had covered some of the background in very general conversation previously and I had presented President Kennedy's personal greetings to the President at that time. Therefore, we started right in.

I said that my first hope was to develop our thinking regarding the lines of the program outlined by President Kennedy. We were studying the possibility of its presentation, rather than in the grand manner, as a hemispheric program. I said I thought that the first task was to find a philosophical common denominator, building around that rather than around money and economics, necessary as these were.

¹ General exchange of views including: economic conditions; Caribbean crisis; Government of Haiti; Cuba; Mexico. Secret. 6 pp. DOS, CF, 721.11/2-2561.

The President promptly agreed. I said that we were in a situation in which the attempted mystique of the Communists had to be met by something more definite than occasional expedients. It was clear that the time was ready for such an attempt. President Kennedy had captured the imagination of the great sector of the Latin American public opinion, and especially of the youth, and a philosophical statement would probably be of great importance. That could, of course, be supported by the practical structure, but the emphasis ought not to be on money or material accomplishments as it had been before.

We discussed a little philosophy of the good life and the good in the world and especially the necessity for free, individual development but within the framework of a society which made it possible.

The President pointed out that, in fact, economic conditions in much of Latin America, and notably in Colombia, were improving. Comparison of the standard of living today with that of twenty years ago showed the extent of the improvement. But, as men became liberated a little from their previous bonds, their perspectives grew, they wanted more. This was natural and had always been so in history. This was complicated by the fact that a very large increase in population (Colombia claimed the largest annual increase in the hemisphere—3.8%) meant that the economic necessities were going to be very great. I observed that the same thing was true in the United States.

Then we tackled the Caribbean crisis. I said that we considered that this was not merely a Cuban, but also a Caribbean crisis because it seemed as though three powers were coming to grips. We had information indicating that the Dominican Republic might explode as soon as the Dictator, Trujillo, realized he would not get a share of the Cuban sugar windfall. He had had meetings with Castro, who was in touch with him, and the Cuban propaganda machine had abruptly stopped attacks on the Dominican regime, though it had bitterly attacked both the Colombian and Venezuelan Governments, as well, of course, as ourselves. Trujillo agents in Moscow were apparently endeavoring to make some sort of deal with the Soviet Union; we considered that they might be quite egotistical enough to use them whatever their ultimate intent. No one could guarantee timing on such matters, the crisis could come up in April. In answer to the President's question, I told him that it might be a variety of bloodbath or class war designed to make a left wing dictatorship—of course with Trujillo as the Dictator. As soon as that happened, we considered that there would be great danger from the Castro side who would at once wish to take over as enemies or friends as the case might be.

I then said that the Government of Haiti was increasingly unstable. We ourselves were doubtful how long it would last. The Duvalier regime—whatever might be Duvalier's personal intention—was increasingly a regime of a group with arms or force in their hands moving more or less at will around Port-au-Prince. The regime had quarreled with the Church and quarreled with the students, and had quarreled with whatever labor organization there was, and apparently killing and torturing had been continuing. I personally thought that the time would come when Port-au-Prince would explode—somewhat as it had done in 1915 under the regime of Guillaume Sam. My guess was that if the Dominican Republic exploded, quite likely the Haitian regime would fall very shortly.

And finally, there was the question of Cuba. This was serious. I outlined the information we had as to the extent of Russian armament (350,000 tons), the number of technicians, some of whom at least were officers in disguise, arriving every week. The number might be three or four thousand by now. Even passing through Curacao, I had learned that every week a KLM plane comes in loaded with Russians and Czechs. We knew that the CUBANA planes were bringing great numbers by way of the Azores. I also told him that there were a hundred Cubans in training in Czechoslovakia to run long-range jets and we expected such jets would arrive—possibly MIG 17's—very soon. The President was interested in the range. I told him I thought they had a radius of 1,000 miles, more or less, which would, of course, enable them to reach everything in the Caribbean.

The President inquired about Guantanamo. I said our feeling was that there would be no attack on Guantanamo; this was not a serious military threat to the United States. They would begin by making trouble all the way from the northern border of Mexico to Venezuela.

The President then inquired of the situation in Mexico. I stated to him most of the information we had; we thought that President Lopez Mateo was now hostile to the whole Cuban position but had political difficulties at home. The President smiled and said, "I would like to help you, but not publicly", which of course is the fact. The President had also noted that there was a meeting coming up in Mexico in a couple of weeks sponsored by Cardenas.

I then said that we were now squarely moving toward some sort of crisis though the time was not certain, and we had to consider how this could be handled. The hemispheric machinery was there for that purpose. But, if the hemispheric machinery did not work, nothing could prevent the countries involved from taking care of themselves as best they could.

The President then took up the story. He said that the sympathy for the Castro revolution, which had been very great a year and a half ago, was undoubtedly falling. The principal feeling was that Castro had undertaken to invade other countries, and had become part of an extra-continental machine. He said most people believed this, though a good deal more discussed their opinions publicly without knowing what was taking place. He himself had no doubt about what was happening; the problem was to create a political atmosphere in the hemisphere. He then inquired what President Romulo Betancourt's views were.

I told him that President Betancourt had authorized me to repeat to him the conversations we had had in Caracas. I said that Betancourt would also send his own Ambassador to explain his views, and I did not wish, therefore, to give a definitive statement in spite of President Betancourt's authorization. Betancourt, however, had suggested that the way to handle the situation would be to deal with the Caribbean crisis, preferably the Dominican crisis first. He himself was prepared to send forces to maintain order and defend the Dominican Republic from Castro's intervention as soon as the Trujillo regime broke up, and that he wanted to do this in company with Colombia, although my impression was that he was prepared to do it alone if need be. This, Betancourt believed, would precipitate a situation in which a consultation of Foreign Ministers would be productive and which would authorize measures of defense against all Caribbean aggressors, including Castro. President Lleras observed that you could not always time events so that they fell out entirely at your convenience. I agreed that this was so and for this reason I had personally hoped that there might be very rapid consultation which would authorize the kind of action which might have to be taken on all sides. There was no point in having consultation, I said, after the damage had been done.

President Lleras then suggested that he, together with President Betancourt, might send representatives to the various countries in the hemisphere to explain the need of independent action. Both these countries were principals, both were in line of fire, both had general resources and direct interest in what happened in the Antilles. It would help, of course, if they could produce proof that Cuba was mixed up in the matter.

I then gave to the President the draft list (CONFIDENTIAL) we had made up of the various Cuban actions which showed both her aggressor intent and the extent to which she was now in the hands of an extra-continental power. President Lleras said this was evident from the known facts, as did Castro's recent speech threatening to export his revolution to other countries. He wished to read the document. I said that this was preliminary; we were gathering together the facts. I rather warmly approved his idea of sending someone around the hemisphere to explain the situation; it would come even with more force from Colombia and Venezuela than from the United States. In any event, the United States would be the last to be attacked.

We talked briefly of the proposed Inter-American Conference at Quito. I said that Betancourt felt it should be delayed; our own thinking was running along that line. Lleras said this would be difficult for the Ecuadorans to take, but that he would consider it further. Obviously an Inter-American Conference, once thought of as a great achievement for a country, could be a great curse. He added a bit wryly that Colombia had reason to know that remembering the year 1948. We did not reach a definite agreement on the point.

I reverted to the possible consultation regarding the Caribbean crisis. I said that the Dominican Republic obviously could not go there; that it was illogical to have Castro there. In 1945 we had had a special Inter-American Conference from which the Argentine Government had been excluded. There was precedent, therefore, for having a special consultation to which the two Governments involved were not directly invited. President Lleras agreed that this was logical. (I gathered that a somewhat similar procedure would be agreeable to Betancourt.)

President Lleras then opened the problem of the Brazilian point of view. He said his impression was that the Governments to the south were not neutralists in the usual sense; they merely thought the problem was far away; which would not hit them in another ten years; they were, therefore, not greatly interested. He did think, however, that Argentina would be definitely interested in the situation, as would also Peru. Chile might be very much influenced by the Brazilian point of view. President Quadros was quite a "mystery"; no one knew exactly what he would do.

I said I was going to Brazil and would endeavor to find out.

We then turned to some of the specific difficulties Colombia had with the United States. The Military Mission, Lleras thought, ought to be devoting its time to tactics for meeting guerrilla attacks rather than the statistics of the Normandy landings, etc. He noted that the Colombian Army was totally unable to cope with guerrillas. I noted marginally that Castro's Army had not been able to deal with the guerrillas in the Escambray either.

President Lleras noted that the Inter-American Development Bank seems to be developing exactly the same rigidity which delayed the loan of the Export-Import Bank—credits granted 2½ years ago had not yet been drawn because of bureaucratic procedures. I said I had discussed that with the Embassy staff and had it on my mind. He noted especially that agrarian reform—which should be a part of any major Inter-American program, was partly blocked because the Americans seemed to want it done in accordance with a plan well understood but which would have little relationship to the realities here. I said I had discussed that in the Embassy and would endeavor to find out what could be done about it.

In closing the President reverted again to Cuba. He asked what was happening there. I told him from what information I had, I thought it was rather gradually coming to a climax. We had to contemplate full civil war in Cuba. Then we would have the problem of two Governments in Cuba, and some action would have to be taken. Lleras said that especially if we could have a rapid consulta of minds this situation would somewhat add to the possibilities. I said that in view of the situation we ourselves could not consider that we had no responsibilities towards the region as a whole; if the hemispheric machine did not work, the Caribbean countries in immediate danger would have to act, and we would, of course, support them. President Lleras agreed that this was entirely logical. He added that in placing the situation before the countries it would be well to talk about that because they might easily drop responsibility by leaving it up to the Caribbean countries to carry the whole weight.

I pointed out that we were merely formulating our policies at this point without any commitments until we had ascertained the views of the countries principally involved; but that this gave us the background of our thinking. President Lleras said he was extremely glad to have this exchange of views; it made them more concrete in handling the problems with which he had to deal.

I gathered the impression that if the chips were down, he would immediately be of help.

A.A. Berle, Jr.

49. Memorandum of conversation, March 23, 1961, between Rusk and Ambassador Sanz de Santamaría¹

March 23, 1961

SUBJECT

United States Military and Financial Assistance to Colombia

PARTICIPANTS

The Secretary

Dr. Carlos Sanz de Santamaría, Ambassador of Colombia

Dr. Bernardo Rueda Osorio, Economic Counselor, Colombian Embassy

E.A. Gilmore, Jr., WST

Sam Moskowitz, WST/CO

¹ U.S. military and financial assistance to Colombia. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 330.

1. United States Military Assistance to Colombia.

By appointment, under instructions from President Lleras Camargo, Ambassador Sanz de Santamaría called on the Secretary. The Ambassador presented a memorandum to the Secretary, which he said was extracted from President Lleras' instructions to him, containing the Colombian President's views on the internal security assistance requirements of Colombia. The Ambassador said this assistance was needed urgently because: (1) the Colombian Armed Forces and police were inadequately equipped to meet present and potential internal security threats, and (2) after 12 years of civil war and rural violence, many Colombian peasants have been trained in guerrilla warfare to the point where they can effectively resist the poorly equipped Armed Forces. He said these guerrilla-bandits are armed and are receiving additional armaments through the flourishing contraband arms traffic into Colombia along its considerable stretches of uninhabited and unguarded coasts. (In response to a direct question, he confirmed to the Secretary that some of the arms are coming from outside Colombia). The Ambassador said that with the exception of the Communists and leftist-extremists, all political parties support the Government so that the political climate is now appropriate for the receipt of the requested military assistance from the United States. However, with elections for a new government scheduled early next year, the internal situation might become unfavorable toward United States military assistance, thus making Colombia's democratic government vulnerable to subversive attempts by extremists aided from abroad.

2. United States Financial Assistance to Colombia.

The Ambassador briefly discussed the background of the $70 million line of credit earmarked for Colombia by the DLF and Eximbank. He said that President Lleras felt that the technical requirements set by the lending institutions and terms of credit were inconsistent with the social development objectives of the Colombian Government. President Lleras desired greater flexibility in the conditions of use of DLF credit, particularly as regards feeder roads, colonization, and housing. Also, President Lleras believed that the Eximbank terms of credit were too commercial and altogether inappropriate to the essentially social character of the contemplated projects they were to finance. Colombia, he said, would prefer to use the credit under conditions which would give the Government greater freedom of action and which would also have the added advantage of serving Colombia's balance of payments requirements. The Ambassador said that President Lleras' term of office would end in August, 1962 and that it would be most unfortunate for him not to be able to initiate a broad program of social development before then. He asked that the United States trust the Colombian Government to employ the credit sensibly and not squander it on foolish projects. The Ambassador said that he and his staff were undertaking a series of discussions with the Department and the DLF to make Colombia's views known in the hope that agreement can be reached to accommodate Colombia's requirements.

The Secretary stated that Colombia's position would be carefully studied. He also mentioned that the President had recently suggested to the Congress certain modifications in our foreign aid program which would enable our assistance to be more flexible and effective.

50. Memorandum from Mulliken to Carwell, June 8¹

June 8, 1961

SUBJECT

Meeting with Colombian Ambassador on Coffee Price Stabilization

Mr. Poole and I attended a meeting in Mr. Blumenthal's office on Tuesday afternoon, June 6, at which the Colombian Ambassador discussed his Government's views on what the U.S. should do in the way of price stabilization. He considered it most important that the U.S. be prepared to offer tangible proposals at the Montevideo meeting in July which will indicate progress in connection with Point 5 of President Kennedy's program for cooperation with Latin America. Since coffee is the most important commodity to the majority of the Latin American countries, he hoped that we would begin with a coffee agreement. In his opinion price stabilization is the best way to convince the small farmer in Latin America that the U.S. takes a serious interest in his problems. Money contributed through aid programs is administered by local governments, sometimes to achieve their own political objectives, whereas the proceeds of export sales go directly to the producer.

He expressed the hope that the U.S. would agree to participate in a coffee agreement designed to raise coffee prices by about 5 cents a pound. He also hoped that we would propose measures for placing existing stocks in the hands of an international body. He considers it dangerous to leave them at the disposition of individual governments for bargaining purposes. He commented that these stocks would not be nearly as large as they appear if the governments holding them were obliged to grade them and throw out coffees which are not suitable for export sale. He also recommended that a part of the proposed increase in prices be turned over to a fund which could be used for developing new markets, improving methods of cultivation, and resettling marginal coffee cultivators in areas where they would undertake diversified farming. He thinks this is the only way to attack the over-production problem. He also expressed the hope that the U.S. would impose import quotas or at least require certificates of origin in order to assist the exporting countries in policing their export quotas.

¹ Meeting with Colombian Ambassador on coffee price stabilization. Official Use Only. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 611.21/6-861.

Mr. Blumenthal encouraged the Ambassador to expand on his views and said that the U.S., while anxious to cooperate with the producing countries, believes that the coffee problem is primarily one for the producers to solve themselves. He hoped to hear from the other large producing countries' governments within the near future regarding their attitude toward the coffee agreement developed by the Coffee Study Group. He said the U.S. Government had been studying the proposal carefully and had developed a few ideas of its own which it was anxious to check against those of the producing countries, but that it would take a little time to reach a cleared position even within our own government.

Mr. Blumenthal questioned the desirability of giving the coffee question any real prominence on the Agenda of the IA-ECOSOC meeting, since the problem is world-wide in scope and is being considered in international forums. He thought the appropriate procedure would be to discuss with the Latin American producing countries at the meeting of Directors of the International Coffee Agreement which is to be held in Rio later this month, their views on whether 1) we should strive for a long-term agreement; 2) whether they wanted consumer participation; 3) whether they favored import quotas; and 4) whether they were prepared to turn over to any international body their unsaleable stocks, and at what prices. The next step he foresaw was to call a meeting of the Coffee Study Group in Washington, probably sometime in July, and learn the views of the consuming countries. Then, if there appeared to be substantial agreement, we might undertake to negotiate an agreement. Mr. Blumenthal stated that he hoped to be in touch with the Embassy again before the meeting in Rio to discuss some of the technical problems in greater detail.

Comment:

On the following day Mr. Blumenthal called a meeting of representatives of the geographic areas which have an interest in coffee, i.e., Africa and Southeast Asia, and outlined the steps which E is taking to develop a position on coffee. They correspond closely to the summary contained in my memorandum of May 24. Mr. Blumenthal has already discussed the main features of his proposal with Mr. Leddy in Treasury, the Assistant Secretary for International Affairs of the Department of Commerce and with Assistant Secretary Duncan of Agriculture. No one had any objection to his moving ahead in an effort to develop a U.S. position which would incorporate the following points:

1. U.S. participation as a consumer in an international agreement to stabilize coffee prices at approximately the existing level.

2. Acceptance by the U.S. of an obligation to freeze non-participating countries at their present levels in the U.S. market (as is done under the International Sugar Agreement).

3. A possible contribution by the U.S. to financing of presently accumulated stocks of coffee of exportable grade provided producing countries will relinquish them at a small fraction of current prices.

Mr. Blumenthal has asked Mr. Rourk to provide us with a detailed statement of the position before the end of next week. His proposals, as outlined, appear to be entirely acceptable from the standpoint of ARA. I am not sure that Point 3 will prove acceptable to the Treasury Department. I pointed out that if we were to impose quotas on imports from non-participating countries it would require legislation, and I thought he would be well advised to discuss the proposal with appropriate congressional leaders and with the Industry Committee of the National Coffee Association before we make any public statement regarding our position. I understand that he has asked the Coffee Advisory Committee to come to Washington next week, and has already discussed the plan in broad outline with the President of the National Coffee Association.

Attachment:

Memorandum of May 24, 1961.

cc: ARA-Mr. Coerr

EST-Mr. Wellman

WST-Mr. Lane

OAP-Mrs. Bracken

CMA-Mr. Vallon

51. Telegram 3 to Bogota, July 3¹

July 3, 1961

Verbatim Text. Rptd Info: USUN, New York; By Pouch to all other American Diplomatic Posts in other American Republics; POLAD CINCARIB; Amconsul Ciudad Trujillo.

Please orally transmit to President Lleras following message from Secretary:

QUOTE After consultation with Ambassador Stevenson and upon examination of your memoranda Nos. 2 and 3 on the Cuban problem, I wish to express my personal gratification for your initiative and to inform you of our essential agreement with your objectives and general program for achieving them. We look forward to further consultation with you on the precise means for achieving our common objectives, particularly in the light of discussions which your Foreign Minister is now holding with other governments. We would wish to be helpful in consultations with other American Republics and would appreciate any suggestions you might have in this respect. In the meantime I have taken steps to inform our Ambassadors in other American capitals of your program and of the trip of your Foreign Minister.

With regard to the IA ECOSOC meeting at Montevideo in August, I look forward to a successful beginning of a massive planning effort which is so essential to the effective realization of the objectives of the Alliance for Progress. The preparatory work thus far completed by the expert groups for the meeting has been of high quality and should provide an excellent basis for action. I am most hopeful that working together we will be able to develop practical methods for dealing with the Hemisphere's social and economic problems. UNQUOTE

Rusk

¹ Letter from Rusk to President Lleras expressing gratification for President's initiative on the Cuban problem. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Colombia, 1961.

52. Telegram 145 to Bogota, August 28¹

August 28, 1961

Info: AmEmbassy Buenos Aires; AmEmbassy Rio De Janeiro; All Other ARA Diplomatic Posts (by pouch); USUN, New York (by pouch); POLAD, CINCARIB (by pouch). Your 97 and 123.

In your meeting with President Lleras and Fonmin Turbay you may indicate Department believes it would be most helpful for GOC to translate action program outlined its memoranda into drafts of specific resolutions which would serve as basis consultations looking to their approval by MFM when held. In line with close consultations on this matter since first Lleras memorandum, we would also be grateful for opportunity to review and comment these drafts prior to their being taken up with selected key countries. In your next conversation with President or Fonmin this subject you should also indicate our strong interest their estimate support for such drafts on country-by-country basis, as well as on timing and site of possible MFM.

FYI Department not as optimistic, particularly following Punta del Este conference, about degree of support for Colombian initiative as various reports would indicate (e.g. Panama City 176 rptd Bogotá 5 and Turbay's estimate contained second paragraph your 123). Difficult to determine actual position of several doubtful countries until specific language put before them and commitment support solicited. Events in Brazil may also have significant bearing not only on Brazilian position toward Castro but also upon position of other countries which were influenced by Quadros' policies. Until support for Colombian plan clearly established, it would be inadvisable reach any decision on pressing for MFM. END FYI

Re Guevara's talk with Frondizi you may inform Lleras and Turbay that according to info we have received Guevara repeated line that Cuba had no intention enter into military arrangements with Soviets, wanted to remain in inter-American family, would like to negotiate differences with GUS, and would not try to export revolution. (US position of course remains as stated Depcirtel 936.) Guevara reportedly did not ask GOA help negotiate differences with US and did not bring up subject possible MFM.

Rusk

¹ Instructions for meeting with President Lleras and Foreign Minister Turbay regarding action program on Cuba outlined earlier by Colombia. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 721.00/8-2861.

53. Memorandum of conversation, September 25, between President Kennedy and Ambassador Turbay¹

Sec Del/MC/43

September 25, 1961

SECRETARY'S DELEGATION TO THE UNITED NATIONS
GENERAL ASSEMBLY, NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 19–24, 1961

SUBJECT

Lleras Plan

PARTICIPANTS

US

President Kennedy

Colombia

Ambassador Turbay

Before the Secretary's lunch today for the Latin Americans, there was a short exchange of views between President Kennedy and Ambassador Turbay (Colombia). The President was interested in the progress of the Lleras Plan. Ambassador Turbay said it consisted of three resolutions, designed to test Cuba's willingness to conform to and remain within the Inter-American System. His exposition of this substance was as he gave it to Secretary Rusk on September 22. The texts had not yet come from Bogota.

Ambassador Turbay then said he hoped the President would speak of the Plan to President Frondizi, since Turbay had the impression the Argentine position was not as clear as it had seemed to be. President Kennedy asked whether in Ambassador Turbay's opinion a conference of Foreign Ministers could or should be called. The reply was that unless Argentine, Brazil, and Ecuador were in line (it was useless to hope Mexico would be), the bulk of the OAS members would abstain. It was true that if fourteen members were in agreement on a subject, the rest had to go along, but in this case, without these key members' approval, there would not be fourteen votes. President Kennedy inquired whether Argentina was the key to this problem. Turbay replied in the affirmative, saying good support by Argentina would surely bring Brazil and probably Ecuador along.

President Kennedy expressed the U.S. appreciation for Colombia's and Ambassador Turbay's initiative in the Cuban matter.

¹ Lleras Plan to test Cuba's willingness to remain in the Inter-American system. Confidential. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Colombia, 1961.

54. Memorandum from Woodward to Acting Secretary, September 27¹

September 27, 1961

TO: The Acting Secretary

THROUGH: S/S

FROM

ARA—Mr. Woodward

SUBJECT

Urgent Need for Internal Security Aid to Colombia

Discussion

One of the major problems which the present Government of Colombia inherited when the rightist dictatorship was deposed in 1957 was a pattern of political unrest in rural areas where banditry had become a way of life for small but ruthless groups operating from isolated mountain or jungle hideouts. In addition, pro-Communist and pro-Castro elements have made increasing efforts to prevent the pacification of the rural population and to simultaneously stir up labor groups and slum dwellers in the cities.

Colombia faces crucial elections in 1962, with all Congressional and Senatorial seats to be voted on March 1 and a new President to be elected in May. Extremists of both the right and left are seeking to play an increased role in the election campaigns. They have had some success in encouraging rural violence and stimulating demonstrations and riots in the larger cities.

Acting on personal telephonic instructions from President Lleras, the Colombian Ambassador has been in to ask for urgent assistance with his country's internal security problems during the upcoming campaign months. The Ambassador also raised this matter with Mr. Goodwin in the White House, who, it is understood, expressed an interest in helping with this situation. In addition, the Chairman of Colombia's UNGA Delegation informed the Secretary of President Lleras' strong desire for this aid.

In actual fact, US plans for dealing with Colombia's internal security problems have been made on a continuing basis, interrupted solely by delays in congressional action on this year's aid appropriation bill.

¹ Urgent need for internal security aid to Colombia. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 721.5-MSP/9-2761.

Working under the terms of a presidential determination obtained on January 5, 1961, internal security aid totalling $1,670,000 was provided to Colombia during FY 61. Further internal security aid totalling at least US $3 million has been provided for as a part of the FY 62 appropriation. Because of the urgency of the matter, however, it appears extremely undesirable to wait for final executive action on this appropriation, as this would delay deliveries of urgent internal security equipment items beyond the election campaign months when they are so badly needed. The best way to proceed with this matter appears to be to obtain at once an oral presidential determination of the need for internal security equipment for Colombia, so that the Department of Defense can order the necessary equipment and schedule early delivery. (It is believed that the delivery of major items under this program to Colombia prior to the end of this year would provide an active deterrent to extremist groups.) (This oral request would be followed by a formal written recommendation by the Department based on the requirements of the aid appropriation bill for FY 62.)

Recommendation:

That you telephone the White House to obtain an oral presidential determination that military aid for internal security purposes in an amount not to exceed $3 million is necessary for Colombia.

55. Memorandum of conversation, October 6, between Ambassador Sanz de Santamaría and Coerr¹

October 6, 1961

SUBJECT

Colombian Request for Additional Internal Security Aid

PARTICIPANTS

Mr. Carlos Sanz de Santamaría, Ambassador of Colombia
ARA—Mr. Coerr
ARA/EST—Mr. Lancaster

Ambassador Sanz stated that he had come in under renewed personal instructions from President Lleras to reiterate Colombia's need for additional military aid for internal security purposes. He referred to his conversation on this subject with Mr. Woodward on September 20 and stated that President Lleras continued to attach a high priority to this problem.

¹ Colombian request for additional internal security aid. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 721.5-MSP/10-661.

In his response to a question from Mr. Coerr, the Ambassador stated that he was not prepared to specify individual items of equipment needed, although it was clear that light transport aircraft had to be obtained to cope with outbreaks of banditry in isolated regions such as that now troubling the Colombian Government in the Vichada area. He indicated that the various types of equipment the Colombian Government desired were listed in a memorandum which he had given to the Secretary last spring (this memorandum was enclosed with the Department's A-146 to Bogota of April 24).

(On October 9 Ambassador Sanz telephoned Mr. Lancaster to say that he had received the following list of items on which the Colombian Government placed highest priorities in equipping its forces for internal security operations:

Infantry small arms:

4048 M1 rifles
888 M1 carbines
270 30 caliber machine guns
432 45 caliber sub-machine guns

Transport aircraft:
6 SA-16 Amphibians
4 C-47
3 C-54

The Ambassador stated that the Colombian Army Chief of Staff, General Alberto Ruiz Novoa, would be discussing these and other priority problems facing the Colombian Armed Forces in the Department of Defense on October 10 and 11.)

56. Telegram 234 from Bogota, October 12¹

Bogota, October 12, 1961

Department pass Army, Navy, Air, CINCARIB.

President last night declared state of siege throughout country. Action taken by decree signed by full Cabinet following consultation with and concurrency by Council of State. This result of series of developments over past several weeks involving increased political agitation by elements such as Rojistas and MRL extremists, subversive activities MOEC and Communists, increased guerilla operations such as Vichada incident (EMBTel 229) and climaxed yesterday with subversive action Army Lieutenant and ex-Army officer Alberto Cendales who attempted lead group 135 soldiers into Llanos for subversive action under pretext taking them on maneuvers (see USARMA C-53 October 11). Cendales movement successfully eliminated within few hours but was straw that broke camel's back.

Seige decree declares public order disrupted, noting (1) acts disruptive of public order have been occurring in various sections of country; (2) some of these acts, characterized by use of force and by manifestations of open rebellion against constitution which although controlled for time being can have consequences constituting risk of security of country and can render difficult normal development electoral process; (3) it is Government's duty assure peace and quell acts internal disturbance.

In speech to nation last night President Lleras referred to Cendales affair and noted that this and Vichada incident may be part of "one or various" plans subversion which will persist. Observed that various political movements inciting subversion under pretext legal political action, declaring themselves "revolutionary" and frankly calling for violent action. President noted that these elements seek exploit social conflicts, incite criminal elements, protect or engage in arms contraband traffic, and foment discontent and disorder. Stated that groups with apparently different political objectives seek the same ends of national disturbances "with or without coordination". President then made significant statement that Government had been informed that economic, military and political support had been sought from the extreme right and the extreme left and, outside of the country, from international Communism and from retired or exiled dictators who want to establish a "black international" in the lands from which they were ousted.

¹ State of siege declared throughout Colombia by President Lleras. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 721.00/10-1361.

Lleras added that he believed prime objective all these elements was prevent elections and make constitutional transition power impossible but that Government would use all its resources protect constitutional process.

President said that state of seige would be used only facilitate necessary police measures prevent disorders and subversion. Would not be used issue decree-laws except for public order question and would not restrict legitimate civil and political rights. State seige would be lifted soon as possible and asked public remain calm.

Comment: Government's action clearly result of mounting concern over various incidents political and social agitation such as MRL exploitation labor difficulties, Rojista activity, Communist and MOEC extremist agitation. President's speech clearly reflects concern over Rojas and possibility he would mount strong subversive movement supported locally and abroad by extremists. Also reflects concern that various groups such as MRL, Communists, Rojistas might develop sufficient momentum and coordination create very serious problem. Hence State of Seige preventive effort curb agitation and incidents. Whole situation typifies what is becoming serious tension in Colombian situation, namely, increasing feeling legal electoral process may not provide viable solution political problems with corresponding increase in affinity for extralegal action by those elements who feel cannot achieve objectives via elections.

Dearborn

57. Telegram 315 to Bogota, November 1¹

November 1, 1961

Rptd: US POLAD CINCARIB. Joint State Defense message.

President has signed determination furnish internal security aid Colombia. Program has been designed here furnish on priority basis all items Colombian Ambassador requested in memcon October 6 except SA-16 aircraft and one of three C-54 aircraft.

¹ Announcement that President Kennedy has signed determination to furnish internal security aid to Colombia. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 721.00/11-0161.

Ambassador and Chief MAAG should inform Colombian civil and military officials at high level of determination and program details, making following clear:

1. Items programmed represent only part total FY 62 military aid Colombia with balance dependent on division still under discussion of total appropriation for Latin America.

2. This is first internal security package arranged for any individual LA country during this FY and US has moved urgently this matter order help Colombian Government maintain law and order during upcoming electoral period.

3. US depriving other high priority end-users including possibly own troops order make early deliveries Colombia.

Secretary Defense seeing Colombian Ambassador and General Ruiz noon November 1 order inform them above points and hand over list specific items to be furnished. List Army items identical that given CINCARIB message CC 68609 MA October 21 with exception increases made infantry small arms to totals requested by Colombians in ref memcon. Air items are four C-47 and two C-54 for troop carrier use.

FYI Possibility being investigated of meeting your request deliver key items before elections. Embassy will be advised later of exact delivery dates. Department hopeful at present obtain target delivery date February for gas masks, tear gas, all infantry weapons except 106 mm rifles and possibly C-47 aircraft. Two programmed C-54 aircraft cannot be rehabilitated and delivered before August. All deliveries will be labeled with code name "Bandera" order distinguish this separate package clearly from other shipments reaching Colombia as result direct purchase or previous MAP programs.

Presidential determination set figure $3 million for this internal security package. Scheduled deliveries, including shipment which by air for infantry weapons, total somewhat less than this figure leaving balance available future use as needed.

Regarding SA-16 aircraft, delivery problems preclude their inclusion this package. Three SA-16-B programmed ASW for Colombia in FY 62. As Embassy aware ASW items do not require presidential determination. If MAAG believes Colombia needs this type aircraft primarily for internal security mission, matter must be re-studied. Remaining funds under current determination would not cover cost these aircraft. End FYI.

Colombian Ambassador states he understands his Government does not desire publicity presidential determination or our plans deliver equipment thereunder.

Bowles

58. Memorandum of conversation, December 17, between President Kennedy and President Lleras¹

December 17, 1961

SUBJECT

Developments in the Dominican Republic
Planning for Foreign Ministers' Meeting on Cuban Problem

PARTICIPANTS

U.S.

President Kennedy
Mr. Chester Bowles, President's
Special Assistant
Ambassador Moscoso
Assistant Secretary Woodward
Deputy Assistant Secretary Goodwin
Ambassador Freeman
Mr. Henry Dearborn, Counselor of American Embassy, Bogota

Colombia

President Camargo Lleras
Foreign Minister Castilla Caicedo
Minister of Finance Mejia
Director of National Planning Dept.
Gutierrez

President Kennedy called at President Lleras's office at 5:30 p.m. on December 17. Each President was accompanied by advisers as recorded above. Press photographers were invited in and pictures taken. President Kennedy then suggested that the group sit down for conversations and the Presidents, together with their advisers, held a discussion for over an hour.

Developments in the Dominican Republic

President Kennedy had just been handed a cable from the Consul General in Santo Domingo with information on developments there and the Dominican situation was the first item of conversation. He gave President Lleras information from the cable to the effect that President Balaguer had agreed to announce his withdrawal from the presidency before the end of February, actually intending to leave on January 26. Balaguer had agreed in the meantime to set up a Council of State consisting of Jose Maria CABRAL Bermudez as First Vice President, Dr. Rafael Bonelly as Second Vice President and with the following as members: Monsenor PEREZ Sanchez, Sr. Amiama Tio and Sr. Imbert. Presidents Kennedy and Lleras and others present discussed the characteristics of this group and it was generally agreed that the information in the telegram was encouraging.

¹ Developments in the Dominican Republic; planning for Foreign Ministers meeting on Cuban problem. Confidential. 5 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Colombia, January 1962.

Planning for Foreign Ministers' Meeting on Cuban Problem

The Presidents devoted most of their conversation to the pending Foreign Ministers' Meeting to consider the Cuban problem. The points discussed were: 1) the timing of the Meeting; 2) the place where it should be held; 3) the need for additional support; and, to some extent, 4) the substance of the resolutions to be presented.

President Kennedy raised the question of timing. President Lleras stated that before President Kennedy went to Venezuela and Colombia he favored holding the Meeting on January 10, as proposed earlier. Since the visits, and owing to their extraordinary success, he was even more firmly opposed to postponement. He thought the momentum derived from the visits should not be lost. President Kennedy agreed and said that preparations should be aimed at an early holding of the conference. He said that Ambassador Woodward and Mr. Goodwin would remain in Bogota for another day to join Ambassador Freeman in an effort to reach an agreement with Foreign Minister Caicedo and President Lleras on the texts of the resolutions to be presented.

In considering where the Meeting might be held, President Lleras stated that he was not one of those who was worried about adverse reactions if Washington should be chosen as the site. He remarked that no one could reasonably say that because the Meeting was held there, its action would be dictated by the U.S. Government. Washington was, after all, the seat of the OAS and what could be more logical than for important questions to be considered there. He doubted, for example, that many really believed the UN was under the domination of the United States because its headquarters was in New York. If the Meeting could be held elsewhere, President Lleras suggested that Bariloche in Argentina would be a good place. He added that Montevideo, Santiago, or "even Brasilia" would also be acceptable. He did not think El Salvador would be satisfactory, but he was in favor of Costa Rica if that Government were amenable. It was agreed that a site must be chosen before the end of the week, and it was the consensus that if no other place were available Washington should be the place.

President Lleras expressed the opinion that at least one other country should be brought into the group of those favoring action since Uruguay was doubtful. He believed that of the countries which abstained on the vote of December 4, Chile would be the most easily won over. He said he knew that President Alessandri was 100 per cent in agreement with him and that the reason why Chile had abstained was that Alessandri had lost the last elections and had bowed to political pressure. Argentina, Dr. Lleras thought, might be brought around, especially if it could be made to appear that the Argentine Government was playing a leading role. He asserted that he would be glad to have Argentina think it invented "the whole thing" if only it would adopt a constructive attitude. Dr. Lleras urged that President Kennedy work on President Frondizi, President Alessandri and also on the Bolivian Government. Mr. Woodward noted confidentially that Mexico had let the United States know that it would break relations with Cuba if all the other American States did so. President Kennedy replied that the United States would work especially on Presidents Frondizi and Alessandri and would do what it could to influence Brazil, Bolivia and Ecuador. He also urged President Lleras to concentrate consultative efforts on these Governments.

Regarding the substance of the resolutions, President Lleras emphasized that he thought the word "sanctions" should not be used as this would draw all manner of objections from various countries. He favored simply noting at the chosen time that the Cuban Government had identified its interests with the Sino-Soviet bloc and had reneged on its inter-American commitments, and therefore the nations of the inter-American system were breaking off relations with it. President Kennedy stated that he would prefer not to give Cuban relations with the Sino-Soviet bloc as a reason for the break, but rather that the Cuban Government was engaged in subverting the democratic governments of the western hemisphere in implementation of the policies of Moscow. President Lleras enthusiastically supported this suggestion.

President Lleras explained that Colombian strategy would be to hold firmly at first to an insistence that a special vigilance committee be set up to follow Cuban performance and to report to the COAS. He wished to assure President Kennedy, however, that Colombia would ultimately agree to having the COAS itself to perform this function. He said Colombia was adopting this strategy in order to sidetrack the numerous changes in the resolutions which other countries might propose. He hoped they would devote their efforts to convincing Colombia to give up its vigilance committee, thereby diverting them from seeking changes in more vital parts of the resolutions. Dr. Lleras suggested that the United States might inform other Governments that it was working on Colombia to dissuade it from insisting on a vigilance committee. He urged President Kennedy to meet with President Frondizi on the latter's way home from the Far East, but also urged that Colombia's strategy on the vigilance committee not be divulged. President Kennedy suggested that the U.S. might suggest that Argentina too attempt to convince Colombia to give up this committee idea.

President Kennedy asserted that it was now urgent to reach an agreement on the draft resolutions with Colombia and that he hoped this could be done the following day. Then consultations with the other Governments could begin promptly. He stressed again that a definite time and place for the Meeting should be set before the end of this week. Dr. Lleras was entirely in agreement and an appointment was set up for Mr. Woodward, Ambassador Freeman and Mr. Goodwin to meet with Foreign Minister Caicedo and President Lleras on December 18. Mr. Jamison, who had just arrived in Bogota for these conversations, would be present. President Kennedy stressed that the strategy should be to draft fairly strong resolutions and then modify them if necessary.

59. Memorandum of conversation, June 8, between President Kennedy and Ambassador Freeman¹

June 8, 1962

SUBJECT

Report to the President on Colombia

PARTICIPANTS

The President

Fulton Freeman, U.S. Ambassador to Colombia

Taylor G. Belcher, ARA/WST

Ambassador Freeman told the President that he had hoped to report to him on events in one country where the Alliance for Progress was really moving forward. He said that the press was giving excellent treatment to the Alliance program and that Government officials as well as the U.S. business community were fully behind it.

With regard to the business community, Ambassador Freeman showed the President a newspaper advertisement, carrying the Alianza “torch” seal, highlighting some of the activities of the U.S.-owned oil companies in the field of education. Entitled “Cooperating with the Alliance for Progress”, it gave details and pictures of new buildings and classrooms provided by the companies. The President asked whether this sort of activity on the part of American business firms in Colombia was widespread and what sort of coordination there was in this effort. The Ambassador said the American business community, particularly in the capital, was well coordinated and was very interested in contributing as much as possible to the success of the Alianza. After the Ambassador described the nature of his monthly briefing at the Embassy residence for leaders of the U.S. community, the President requested that he be furnished a report on the efforts of the other

¹ Alliance for Progress results in Colombia. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, Presidential Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.

Embassies to coordinate the activities of the U.S. business community in the context of the Alliance. He also suggested that the clipping which the Ambassador had be shown to the Grace Committee so that it might serve as an example to be used by other firms in other countries.

The President said that this example of "impact" projects by private American companies was what the Alliance as a whole needed. He wished it could have a similar meaning for the average person in Latin America. He referred to the meeting held last week with senior officials of the Department regarding the need for projects which the people could see and touch and in which they could appreciate the direct benefit to them. Airports, roads, power projects, etc., were important but there was little direct impact on the people and this was what was needed for the immediate future.

Mr. Belcher mentioned the Cyprus-American grain relief program as an excellent example of a program which had an impact in every one of the 800 villages on the island. The President inquired regarding the means whereby this program was carried out and was informed that it had been done with PL 480 funds in cooperation with the local government.

The President asked how the OAS Committee on Cultural Affairs and Public Information was progressing. Ambassador Freeman said that Colombia was being used as a pilot project and that the organizational work was well in hand in Bogota with former Foreign Minister Turbay heading the group. The President also inquired regarding the activities of the Grace Committee and asked that he be given a report by Ambassador Morrison or Mr. Moscoso on progress in coordinating the activities of the U.S. business and trade union communities with the Alliance for Progress.

60. Memorandum of conversation, June 26, among U. Alexis Johnson, President-elect Valencia and other U.S. and Colombian officials¹

June 26, 1962

SUBJECT

Meeting between President-elect Valencia and Department Officials

PARTICIPANTS

U.S. Side

Deputy Under Secretary Johnson
Assistant Secretary Martin (ARA)
Deputy Administrator Moscoso (AID/LA)
Mr. John Robinson (AID)
Mr. Maxwell Chaplin (WST/CO)
Mr. Bruce Lancaster (EST/A)
Mr. Saul Moskowitz (WST)

Colombian Side

President-elect Guillermo Leon Valencia
Ambassador Sanz de Santamaría
Finance Minister Mejia Palacios
Education Minister Posada
Mr. Salazar (OAS)
Colonel Durán
et. al.

After being greeted by Mr. Johnson, Dr. Valencia expressed his appreciation for the way he had been received in Washington. Mr. Johnson referred to the close ties between the two countries, and spoke of Colombia's willing and outstanding cooperation during the Korean conflict.

Dr. Valencia said that he considered that Colombia had a permanent alliance with the U.S., and that it would follow this country in defending the cause of justice and freedom anywhere in the world. Mr. Johnson said that the present danger was much closer than it had been in Korea, and that it was a danger that the two countries must face together.

Dr. Valencia said that he fully understood. He said that Castro's policy was to exert pro-Communist pressure, which in Colombia meant assistance to the bandits, including training of Colombians in Cuba. He said that he had learned that the guerrillas planned to step up their attacks when he took office. He said that both President Lleras' Administration and his own would not hesitate in taking any necessary steps to put down the guerrillas. He said that he hoped to obtain U.S. assistance in this endeavor, since it was a hemispheric rather than a regional problem.

Mr. Martin said that the U.S. Government was aware of this problem, and that Ambassador Freeman had discussed ways to reduce the area of violence with Department officials and with President Kennedy, and that the Ambassador was looking forward to discussing the matter with Dr. Valencia.

¹ Review of relations between the two countries. Confidential. 6 pp. DOS, CF, 611.21/6-2662.

Dr. Valencia said that he was pleased to hear this. He praised the work of Ambassadors Freeman and Sanz de Santamaría, saying that it was not a question of strengthening the ties between the two countries but of maintaining the existing excellent relations.

Mr. Johnson said that he had talked with Ambassador Freeman about the guerrilla problem, and that he considered it to have two aspects: the first was the internal factor in which the Castroites exploited discontent over living conditions; and the second was the external factor in which Cuba sent arms to the discontented in Colombia. He said that the U.S. would be pleased to cooperate with Colombia on both aspects.

Dr. Valencia said that unfortunately many Colombians, especially students, were going to Cuba to receive training in guerrilla warfare and political action. He said that, however, the number was decreasing. He cited a student and worker organization (MOEC) as being involved in this matter. He said that Secretary McNamara had asked him whether the guerrillas were bandits or Communists, and that he had replied that they were bandits led by Communists.

Dr. Valencia said that in Latin America public opinion was divided as follows: There were some men, including himself, who sincerely believed that the best policy for their countries was to work closely with the U.S.; there were other men who were strongly opposed to the U.S., many of them being crypto-Communists. The majority of the people, however, varied in either supporting the U.S. or Russia. Dr. Valencia said that he would respectfully suggest that the U.S. develop greater cooperation with its loyal friends. He applauded the Alliance for Progress for addressing itself to changing the living conditions of the people. He said that Alliance funds should be concentrated on projects that would substantially change living conditions, and not on projects that might have more rapid economic results but that at the same time would benefit only the leading classes.

Mr. Johnson said that he was very gratified to hear this idea, since it coincided with American thinking. He asked whether the Colombian students went to Cuba directly or through third countries.

Dr. Valencia replied that some of them travelled through third countries, and that so far it had not been possible to restrict direct travel to Cuba, although he had hopes of doing something about this, such as denying visas for travel to Cuba. He said that it would be difficult to restrict travel to Cuba through third countries.

Dr. Valencia said that if the guerrillas stepped up their violence for his inauguration, and if he received cooperation from the U.S., as has been offered by President Kennedy, he would use violence in turn in an attempt to wage the final battle against the guerrillas.

Mr. Johnson said that Ambassador Freeman was prepared to discuss this matter in detail with Dr. Valencia, and that he hoped the U.S. could be of help. He asked to what degree the guerrillas were politically oriented.

Dr. Valencia replied that the violence was of political origin, although both major parties were opposed to it. He said that at present the violence was more commercially oriented, accentuated by the fact that coffee was ready to be picked, and the guerrillas like to steal coffee. He mentioned the “carteo” method of operations, in which the bandits would write to a farmer and warn him to abandon his property. Should the farmer leave, his property would be neglected and would therefore depreciate in value, and some third person would then be able to buy it at a low price. He said that the bandits could be divided into three categories: (1) the natural killers; (2) unscrupulous businessmen; and (3) those with political orientation. Of the last, most were oriented by international Communism.

Mr. Johnson asked whether arms were being shipped from Cuba. Dr. Valencia replied that he was sure this was the case. The Government had found new weapons in the hands of the Guerrillas, some of them from Iron Curtain countries, specifically Czechoslovakia, although most of them were American made. He said that this led some people to believe that the U.S. was to blame for the arms traffic.

Mr. Johnson said that the exchange of intelligence was of great importance. He suggested the Special Security Committee of the OAS as one means of exchanging information. Dr. Valencia said that he would pay special attention to this problem.

NOTE: This meeting ended at 12:00 noon. Mr. Johnson left and Messrs. Moscoso and Robinson from AID, and Mr. Lancaster from ARA joined the group.

Mr. Moscoso said that, in connection with the economic development of Colombia, everyone was looking forward to the creation of a consortium to provide the external financial assistance required for Colombia's Development Plan.

He said Colombia might be the first country to have a long-term plan approved. He said that there were a number of problems to be discussed. He had touched on one of them with the Education Minister, which was the primary education program. He said that it might perhaps be better to obtain financing for this program through loans than through grants, as in the past. He said that the credit terms would be easy, with a 40-year term for repayment and low rate of interest. He said that he hoped that all of the measures that had been approved in January in connection with the balance of payments problems would be put into force. He said that AID would give favorable consideration to individual Colombian projects until the general development plan was approved.

Mr. Moscoso said that, as far as specific loans were concerned, it might be necessary to make some changes in the project for the survey of mineral resources, to avoid an overlap with a basic resources project already approved.

Mr. Mejia asked about the procedure for the mineral resources survey, and Mr. Moscoso replied that he would provide the Minister a memorandum on this matter.

Mr. Moscoso said that a problem existed on funds approved in August 1961 for a savings and loan association which had not yet been used. Members of the U.S. Congress took a dim view of approving new funds under these circumstances.

Mr. Mejia, in connection with this loan, asked how the loan associations would be controlled. He said that Colombia exercises strict controls over banking, and that the savings and loans institutions would not come under that type of control. He said that the Central Bank authorities complained of competition from these institutions.

Mr. Moscoso replied that controls were possible, and that in Puerto Rico, for example, there were both Federal and local savings and loans institutions, with no major problems. He said that competition might be a good idea.

Mr. Moscoso said, in connection with the national health program and the $21,000,000 loan request for the 40 health centers, that AID was awaiting more information and hoped to have things settled by September. Mr. Moscoso said that the Buenaventura aqueduct project had been received by the Inter-American Bank on the previous day, and there was no information as to its present status. He said, with regard to the sewerage projects for Medellin and Cali, that they were being merged and integrated into a national project; time was needed for review but the project seemed good.

Dr. Valencia said that he was deeply interested in rural health facilities.

Mr. Moscoso said that AID was going to conduct experiments with mobile health units, and asked whether Dr. Valencia would be interested in this type of operation. Dr. Valencia replied in the affirmative.

Mr. Moscoso said that Colombia would be a sort of a pilot country for special private foreign investments. He said that a meeting had been scheduled for July 26 with a group of American investors, and that he would later speak with Ambassador Sanz de Santamaría, if things worked out, to fix a date for a meeting in Colombia.

Dr. Valencia said that he was enthusiastic about the possibility of Colombia being a pilot country for this type of investment.

Mr. Moscoso said that this group of investors was anxious to prove that private investment could be of help to a country without offending it.

Dr. Valencia said that the Alliance for Progress required a prior condition for its success in Colombia, and that was the stabilization of coffee prices. He said that a coffee crisis would have serious political repercussions.

Mr. Moscoso said that the U.S. was well aware of this problem.

Dr. Valencia said that Colombia purchased all of its machinery in the U.S. and paid its coffee labor well. A drop in coffee prices, therefore, created serious problems.

Mr. Moscoso said that coffee problems called for a short-term and a long-term solution. The former could be taken care of by, for example, coffee quotas and the International Coffee Agreement. The latter could be taken care of by diversification.

Dr. Valencia said that he agreed, but that a medium-term solution was also needed to cover the transition to diversification. He inquired whether the U.S. might help the transition by increasing imports of other Colombian products, e.g., cotton. He said that Colombia needed more flexible policies from the U.S. in this field.

Mr. Martin said that he believed Colombia had no argument with the U.S. as far as coffee was concerned, since the U.S. had taken the lead in the Coffee Agreement and in seeking price stability. He asked for Colombian assistance in influencing other coffee-producing countries, especially those from Central America, to get them to cooperate in the Agreement. He said that the Central American countries liked the idea of enjoying the “umbrella” provided by Colombia and Brazil, and that a problem also exists in obtaining the cooperation of the African producers.

Dr. Valencia thanked Mr. Martin and said that he was not complaining about the U.S. position, but wanted to stress that coffee was the only way to save Latin America.

Mr. Moscoso said that the U.S. had offered $12,000,000 to the Central American Seasonal Coffee Marketing fund to get it started.

Dr. Valencia said that he wanted to comment on priorities in the Alliance for Progress. He said that he had been elected by his people, and would therefore do everything in his power to change the conditions in which his people live. He said that he did not want investments if they were of a speculative nature. He said that in the field of education he intended to concentrate on primary schooling, and leave it to future administrations to worry about secondary and university development.

He said that eradication of illiteracy and ignorance would be one of the major objectives of his Administration.

Mr. Moscoso said that Dr. Valencia could be very helpful if he encouraged coordination in the Colombian Government, in view of the inevitable pressures that were exerted for various projects. Dr. Valencia said that this kind of coordination was decisive for the success of the Alliance. Mr. Moscoso said that he would like to concentrate on four or five priorities.

61. Airgram A-145 from Bogota, September 5¹

Bogota, September 5, 1962

SUBJECT: Transmitting Memorandum of Conversation.

There is transmitted herewith a memorandum covering a conversation concerning the violence problem in Colombia which I had with President Guillermo Leon Valencia on September 4, 1962.

Fulton Freeman

Attachment

SUBJECT

The Violence Problem in Colombia

PARTICIPANTS

President Guillermo Leon VALENCIA
Ambassador Fulton FREEMAN

I called today at the President's request to discuss with him the problem of continuing violence in Colombia. On several previous occasions, both prior to the elections and subsequent thereto, President Valencia and I had discussed briefly the violence question in Colombia and he had expressed the desire to hear what recommendations and suggestions I might have. During a small luncheon meeting with President Valencia and Mr. Chester Bowles, just prior to the inauguration,

¹ Transmits September 4 memorandum of conversation between Ambassador Freeman and President Valencia on the violence problem in Colombia. Secret. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 721.00/9-562.

I had mentioned that the Embassy had conducted a fairly thorough study of the violence problem in Colombia and that we had come up with certain conclusions and ideas which might be of interest to the President. On that occasion the President had expressed keen interest in our ideas and he said that he wished to discuss the subject with me as soon after the inauguration as would be convenient.

On August 5th, 1962, the day prior to Valencia's inauguration, I had the opportunity to speak briefly with President Lleras at a social function. Lleras said that he had found our paper on violence to be of considerable interest, that many of the recommendations were completely practicable, and that he intended to pass it along to President Valencia at the first opportunity. He said that he would explain the background of the paper to President Valencia and that he would caution him as to the desirability of keeping its origin secret.

I opened the conversation with Valencia by inquiring whether he had received this document from President Lleras and, if so, what opinion he might have formed. Valencia replied that he had discussed the matter with President Lleras, that he knew of the existence of such a paper and some of its general conclusions, but that he had so far not received a copy from President Lleras.

I took the opportunity to describe the background of the paper and to reassure the President that it was not our intention to interfere in any way in the internal affairs of Colombia. I explained that this had for the most part been an academic study, examined from the point of view of what we ourselves would do if we were to have the responsibility of eliminating violence in Colombia, and that the paper simply represented a summary of the conclusions, ideas and recommendations of the Embassy. Valencia assured me that he was very grateful for our interest in this matter and that he would examine the paper immediately and with the greatest care.

I explained that our paper gave no hint whatsoever as to its origin and was drafted in such a way that it might well have been written, for example, by a professor of sociology at the University of the Valle. I said that we were of course very anxious to avoid disclosure of the role of the Embassy in the preparation of this document, because such disclosure would of course be highly embarrassing both to us and to the Colombian authorities. The President appeared to appreciate and to agree with this point of view.

I explained that our paper contained four basic recommendations: (1) The need for coordination at the highest governmental level in planning and executing actions against violence; (2) the need for improving the intelligence capability of government entities; (3) the need for effective and appropriate law enforcement action by the armed forces and police, with adequate support of civilian authorities; and

(4) the need for adequate, prompt and effective rehabilitation measures by civilian entities, including the utilization in civic fields of military resources. I also took the opportunity to read to the President the paragraph proposing an organization such as a "National Internal Security Committee".

I then pointed out to the President that, in order to avoid any hint of origin, our paper contained no suggestions whatsoever of the areas where the United States Government might assist the Colombian authorities in the implementation of such a plan. As he was well aware, I pointed out that we were in fact willing and anxious to be of assistance in appropriate areas and I specifically mentioned the following: (1) Assistance in the intelligence field by training Colombian personnel in available U.S. training programs and in the provision of U.S. intelligence advisers through MAP; (2) support of military/police action against bandits by the provision through MAP of necessary equipment and advisory assistance; (3) USIS cooperation with troop indoctrination and education programs; (4) more extensive use of U.S. training programs and schools in both the U.S. and in the Canal Zone; (5) the temporary assignment of a small Civic Action Team to work with the Colombian Army in developing suitable projects; (6) assignment of a small Police Mission in order to advise the National Police on internal organization and training; and (7) support through AID and other appropriate agencies of the Colombian Government of efforts to conduct social and economic rehabilitation in the violence areas. In recapitulating this potential assistance, I placed particular emphasis on the Police and Civic Action Teams which I indicated were already prepared to depart for Colombia on fairly short notice should the President indicate to me that they were desired. Assistance in the other mentioned areas, I said, should be the subject of further close consultation between members of the Embassy staff and persons that the President might wish to designate.

The President said that he naturally wished to study the document in detail before commenting to me on it. He said that he did wish at the outset, however, to express his appreciation for our efforts to assist in eliminating the violence problem and that he did have some preliminary comments. As to the Police Mission and the Civic Action Team, he would take up these matters right away with the appropriate officials to see whether the necessary requests would be forthcoming. He gave every indication that this would be the case. With respect to the possibility of the establishment of a central coordinating group such as a "National Internal Security Committee", the President expressed great interest in the idea and said that he wished to study the Constitution once more to see if this might not be feasible.

With respect to military/police action now being taken in Colombia and planned for the future, the President stated that he had recently been given a five-hour briefing on Plan Lazo and that he was quite satisfied with the detailed planning which had been carried out. He did state, however, that certain shortages in equipment were developing (he mentioned specifically radio and communications equipment) and he indicated that he might be submitting a request in the very near future for specific items of equipment. He recalled that when he was in Washington he had discussed the violence question with President Kennedy, and he stated that at that time President Kennedy offered to be of assistance in any appropriate way. Valencia said that he informed President Kennedy that he wished first to return to Bogotá and study the situation intensively, but that he had replied that he would quite probably be submitting a request for specific assistance in countering the violence problem. Valencia indicated that we would be receiving a note through the Ministry of Foreign Affairs on this subject in the very near future.

Before my departure, President Valencia insisted on setting a date for a further meeting with me on the violence problem at which time he would present his opinion and comments on our paper. We decided to meet on Friday September 7 at 11 a.m.

62. Memorandum of conversation, September 18, between Rusk and Ambassador Sanz de Santamaría¹

September 18, 1962

SUBJECT

Colombian Request for $60 Million Balance-of-Payments Loan and Counterpart Release

PARTICIPANTS

The Secretary
Ambassador Sanz de Santamaría of Colombia
José Camacho-Lorenzana, Minister, Colombian Embassy
Mr. Thompson, ARA/WST

Ambassador Sanz made a farewell call on the Secretary this afternoon. He explained that he would be going to New York this weekend, would sign the coffee agreement on September 28 and return to Colombia the following day to assume his new duties as Finance Minister. He said he wished to thank the Secretary for the many courtesies extended to him during his mission in Washington. The Secretary said that the occasion of Ambassador Sanz' call was a sad one in many ways. He said he was sure Ambassador Sanz was aware that he was leaving many friends in Washington, including the Rusks.

¹ Farewell call of Ambassador; Colombian request for $60 million balance-of-payments loan and counterpart release. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 330.

Ambassador Sanz said he hoped the Secretary was aware of the fine job Ambassador Freeman has been doing in Colombia. He said he mentioned this particularly because Ambassador Freeman has now been in Bogota for two years. According to U.S. practice, this might indicate that the time has come for his transfer. The Ambassador hoped that this would not occur. He said that Ambassador Freeman's thorough knowledge of Colombian affairs and his relationship with Colombian leaders would be of great help to him in his (Sanz') new assignment and that he would hope to be able to count on working with him for some time to come. The Secretary said he welcomed these remarks since Ambassador Freeman is an old friend. He said he had great confidence in Ambassador Freeman and had not given any thought to his transfer.

Ambassador Sanz pointed out that he will be assuming a difficult task as Finance Minister. The World Bank and the International Monetary Fund have been insisting upon the need for exchange reform in Colombia. President Lleras believed that it would be unwise to add the impact of such a measure to the political uncertainty attendant upon the national elections and the inauguration of a new government. It now remains for the new government to carry out this step. The Ambassador said he had already invited the Fund to send representatives to Colombia to begin work on a new stand-by agreement. They will arrive with him, spend approximately two weeks, and then return to Washington to obtain IMF approval of the new agreement. Ambassador Sanz stressed that he was fully prepared to carry out the IMF recommendations on exchange reform in the hope that traditional monetary techniques would have good effects. He said that President Valencia was aware of his views on this matter. The Ambassador said he wished to emphasize how important U.S. support would be in this effort. While the DAC meeting in Paris had gone well, he said he had no real confidence in European support. The Europeans simply do not have the United States' interest in Latin America. As a result it will be principally the United States, the IBRD and the IDB who will be moving in support of Colombia's development effort.

The Ambassador said that the timing of U.S. support would be extremely important and that he hoped it would not arrive too late. He noted that Colombia is requesting an additional $60 million in balance-of-payments assistance and that Colombia will need the release of peso counterpart in order to offset the budgetary effects of devaluation. He said that December would be too late for this assistance. Colombia hoped to clean the slate in 1962 with regard to the old obligations which have caused the current balance-of-payments problem and to make a real beginning on the development effort in 1963. The Secretary assured the Ambassador that we would give very careful consideration to the Colombian request.

The Ambassador suggested that the Secretary attend the signing of the coffee agreement in New York on September 28 and concluded his visit with a reiteration of his standing invitation to the Secretary to visit Colombia.

63. Memorandum of conversation, September 27, between President Kennedy and Ambassador Sanz de Santamaría¹

September 27, 1962

SUBJECT

Farewell call on the President by the Ambassador of Colombia

PARTICIPANTS

The President

Ambassador Carlos Sanz de Santamaría of Colombia

Mr. Ralph Dungan, Special Assistant to the President

Mr. Herbert B. Thompson, Acting Director, Office of West Coast Affairs, ARA

Ambassador Sanz paid a farewell call on the President this morning. He began by expressing his thanks for all the kindness and assistance shown him during his assignment by the President, the Department of State and other Government agencies.

The Ambassador said he had been pleased to hear on the radio the President's remarks about the effect on Colombia of the drop in coffee prices. The President said he had made use of Ambassador Sanz' previous remarks to him in speaking to the White House Conference of Business Magazine Editors and Publishers. In this connection, the Ambassador said he wished to leave with the President a memorandum describing the deterioration in the terms of trade for Latin American countries. He said that improvement in the terms of trade would be the most important thing the United States could do for Latin America. This would be more important than any kind of aid.

¹ Farewell call of Ambassador; Coffee Agreement; Alliance for Progress. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Colombia, July–September 1962.

Ambassador Sanz noted that he would be signing the Coffee Agreement in New York on September 28. He remarked that it was unfortunate that U.S. Congressional ratification of the agreement could not be obtained in the current session since it would then be delayed until at least February 1963. The Ambassador was given assurances of our intention to submit the agreement to the Senate immediately in the belief that this would have good psychological effects.

The Ambassador said he was returning to Colombia with the intention of explaining the Alliance for Progress to his countrymen who, he feared, did not understand it very well. He said he intended to point out that it is a Latin American idea which the President is supporting and which fully merits Latin American support. The President said he would always welcome any views Ambassador Sanz might care to express to Ambassador Freeman in Bogota as to what we ought to be doing under the Alliance.

The Ambassador concluded his call with a reference to his Foreign Minister's attendance at the forthcoming Informal Meeting of Foreign Ministers. Ambassador Sanz said he believed it was important to obtain wider support for any positions which might emerge from this meeting than existed at the last Punta del Este Conference, even if this required some concessions. He noted that, in his opinion, even Mexico was now in a better position to lend support than at Punta del Este. The President observed that we might think in terms of a very broad statement which could achieve the widest possible support and then proceed to more specific proposals with the Caribbean countries.

64. DOS Guidelines for Policy and Operations: Colombia, December 1962¹

December 1962

COLOMBIA DEPARTMENT OF STATE GUIDELINES FOR POLICY AND OPERATIONSI. Basic Approach*

There are no acute bilateral problems between Colombia and the U.S. Major U.S. concerns regarding Colombia are almost entirely connected with the general instability of the country's political, economic and social structure. Poverty, ignorance and the resulting social unrest are somewhat less evident than in most of Colombia's neighbors, but they still represent serious problems. Since the dictatorship was overthrown in 1957, Colombia's Government has reestablished democratic processes and has done much to restore Colombia's commercial reputation. Colombia appears to have caught the spirit of the Alliance for Progress and is actively seeking substantial assistance from abroad in order to carry out a comprehensive economic and social development plan.

The country has just given its Government a vote of confidence in congressional and presidential elections, and there is a good possibility that Colombia can provide constructive leadership in Latin America. Careful use of all available U.S. resources cannot only assist in the development of Colombia, but provide incentives for progress at a rate which should be able to meet the rising expectations of the people in this, the fourth most populous country in Latin America.

[Here follows section II., "Background."]

III. Objectives

1. To continue under present circumstances to support National Front governments as the most effective means of providing political stability, for developing a sound economy, and for solving Colombia's social problems within a framework of representative democracy.

2. To bring about recognition by greater numbers among the Colombian elite of the necessity for economic and social reform, and of their class responsibility to lead toward such reform.

¹ Secret. 10 pp. DOS, S/P Files: Lot 69 D 121.

3. To achieve a practical solution to the problem of stabilizing coffee prices on the international market, while actively working toward reduced dependence on coffee through the diversification of exports.

4. To assist with the continued reduction and eventual control, even in isolated areas, of the rural "violence" problem.

5. To encourage continued Colombian example and leadership in impressing the gravity of the danger posed by the Castro-Communist alliance on other hemisphere governments and peoples, as well as Colombia's participation with the U.S. and other OAS states in preventing or countering Castro-Communist aggressive action or subversion.

6. To assist the labor unions in resisting Communist infiltration, and to orient the labor movement toward the U.S.

IV. Lines of Action

Political

1. Impress on the political leadership of the major factions that U.S. contributions to the socio-economic development of Colombia depend on the extent to which they subordinate partisan or personal objectives to the national interest, thereby promoting both political and socio-economic stability and viability.

2. Encourage democratic political groups to move toward the isolation of extremist elements of both right and left.

3. Encourage the government and the governing elite to continue to press forward in a positive program of tax revision, housing development, agricultural and educational reform.

4. Encourage the government to: (a) take a leading role in impressing on other Latin American governments the gravity of the Castro threat to hemispheric peace and security, (b) inform Colombian public opinion of the true Communist, totalitarian and subversive nature of the Castro regime, and (c) influence other Latin American governments to do likewise.

5. Elicit Colombian support of broad U.S. international objectives, including OAS action on Cuba, and encourage Colombian leadership within the framework of the OAS, UN and IA-ECOSOC.

6. Utilize the efforts of the Labor Attaché, the newly appointed USIS Information Officer (Labor) and all other U.S. Government and private means available to help free labor unions to defeat Communist efforts to gain control of the labor movement.

Military

1. Implement, and if necessary amplify, the April 1961 military assistance agreement with Colombia in support of the elimination of the continuing problem of rural violence, but at the same time stress to the Government the complementary need of improved law enforcement, reform of judicial procedures, and other measures to counter the “impunity” now enjoyed by many perpetrators of violence.

Economic

1. Continue to support Colombian planning for economic and social development in accordance with the aims of the Alliance for Progress, making judicious use of grants and loans which can be designed to step up the pace of this development. All branches of the U.S. Government should seek every available opportunity to praise the start which Colombia has made and to encourage the Colombian Government to implement new programs vigorously, so that Colombia can remain in the forefront of the Alliance for Progress.

2. Emphasize the need for responsible financial and import policies as a necessary basis for economic and social development, including consideration of a simplified and more realistic exchange rate structure. U.S. officials should continue to stress the fact that any reversion to the financial excesses of 1961 will not only imperil the favorable commercial reputation which Colombia has worked so hard to maintain, but will also drain off capital needed for essential economic and social projects. Because of the interconnection between Colombia’s overseas trading position and internal economic development, consideration of any U.S. aid project must include a study of its effects on the balance of payments.

3. Pursue negotiations for an international coffee agreement energetically, meanwhile encouraging Colombia to reduce coffee production. The technical assistance and AID loan programs in Colombia should regard the diversification of exports as a primary objective.

Public Affairs

1. Meet intensified Cuban, Chinese and European Communist propaganda by better explanation and interpretation of U.S. policies and objectives and through stepped-up publications output and improved distribution. Additional efforts are also necessary to publicize the expanding economic assistance program of the U.S.

2. Continue the AID labor leader program, as well as certain other technical assistance grantee visits to the U.S. which are consonant with the aims of the Alliance for Progress and which serve to augment the small leader grant and student exchange programs. The leader grant program should give increased emphasis to visits to the U.S. by young and volatile but non-Communist politicians whose knowledge of this country is deficient.

3. Expand community development projects on the Barrio Quiroga model at points of the longest range strategic value.

V. Contingencies

Possible developments which might frustrate U.S. policy and for which contingency planning may be needed:

1. A decision by the Colombian elite to rest on their political and economic accomplishments to date, with an accompanying refusal to implement social and economic reforms.

2. An inclination by the Colombian Government to relax financial and import controls in the belief that the U.S. will fund balance of payments deficits which arise.

3. A collapse of the world coffee market leading to a severe decline in coffee prices.

4. A breakdown of the National Front coalition system followed by a military coup d'état which might lead to either a rightist dictatorship or a Castro-Communist counter-revolution and takeover plus a shift toward neutralism in Colombian foreign policy.

65. Memorandum of conversation, February 1, among DOS officials¹

February 1, 1963

SUBJECT

Discussion of Colombian Political Economic Problems

PARTICIPANTS

Mr. Taylor G. Belcher, Director, WST
Mr. Herbert B. Thompson, Deputy Director, WST
Mr. Maxwell Chaplin, Colombian Desk, WST
Mr. Bruno Luzzatto, Economic Officer, REA
Mr. Arnesen, AA/LA
Mr. Green, LA/WC
Mr. Mitchell, INR

Political Scene

The discussion noted the political problems of maintaining an effective governing coalition, the recent growth in dissatisfaction with President Valencia, and the fact that opposition to him seems to be based more on his unsatisfactory image as a leader and on general belief he is permitting stagnation than on specific shortcomings. Dissatisfaction has not yet reached alarming proportions, and the politicians seem to be able to mobilize wide support in specific cases, but there have been reports of discussion of alternatives to Valencia.

¹ Colombian political and economic problems. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL COL.

A review of the range of possible alternatives to the present structure of the National Front government, such as military golpe, military alliance with the MRL, or some right-wing configuration, did not indicate that such a radical change is probable under present political conditions. A consensus did emerge, however, that the current Colombian dissatisfaction, loss of confidence, and sense of stagnation, are politically and economically destructive and bear watching, whether the feelings are rationally justifiable or not.

Consultative Group Results

It was noted that the recent announcements of large foreign financing for the development plan had served to improve the confidence climate. It was also noted that since disbursements on most of the projects to be financed will be delayed up to a year, there is a serious risk of disillusionment if the consultative group announcements are not followed by some visible evidence of results.

In an effort to determine what part of the prospective U.S. AID program could be promptly implemented to serve as impact evidence of progress following the consultative group meeting, to improve confidence, it was noted that $13 million peso counterpart of the advance disbursement of the December $60 million loan is now available. It was then proposed that $5 million counterpart be utilized immediately as a U.S. contribution to the Private Investment Fund, and the other $8 million counterpart be made available for the labor housing project, which is ready to be executed immediately. It was further noted that the IBRD does not seem to be providing the leadership in establishment of the PIF which is required to execute this project rapidly, and more U.S. initiative is required to assure that the Fund is formally established in the next four weeks. It was agreed to instruct our mission in Bogota to explore the above proposals.

A review of the activities of U.S. AID/Bogota showed that the mission has assumed several entirely new functions in connection with the capital assistance program; the most important being long-range loan programming and design, and the surveillance of loan implementation. These activities require a degree of economic analysis not previously expected of the AID mission. Discussion emphasized that the problems for AID in the Colombian program are primarily ones of execution at this stage, since the program level and general projects to be financed are not in dispute. It was suggested that a bottleneck which will need attention is the actual preparation and processing of loan applications. It was noted that the mission is not yet completely staffed to carry out its new responsibilities, but that the necessary personnel should be on duty soon.

66. Airgram A-731 from Bogota, May 10¹

Bogota, May 10, 1963

SUBJECT

Political Contingencies—Extra-legal Changes.

CONTENTS

- I. Introduction
- II. Conclusions for U.S. Policy
- III. Conditions for Extra-legal Change
- IV. Range of Possibilities
- V. Elite Action
- VI. Civilian-Military Action
- VII. Military Coup
- VIII. Social Revolt

I. Introduction

For the purposes of contingency planning this airgram considers the plausible range of alternatives which might take place under the hypothesis that an alteration of the constitutional order occurs. The range of alternatives considered here—and these are contingencies not predictions—go beyond what might be termed unconstitutional change (e.g. a golpe) to include quasi-legal change, that is, a forced change within the constitutional framework but outside the normal cycle of election—full term—new election (e.g. forced resignation of the president and assumption of the presidency by his constitutional successor).

It is obviously not possible to predict the precise form of an extra-legal development. The possible variations are virtually infinite. All that is attempted here is to consider what conditions might prompt an extra-legal change (a tabulation which could also serve as a listing of “early warning signals”) and the general broad categories of possible action and US response.

¹ Political contingencies—extra-legal changes. Confidential. 5 pp. DOS, CF, POL 23 COL.

II. Conclusions for US Policy

Any survey of this subject matter leads rapidly to one conclusion—any break in the constitutional process, however mild, runs a high risk of starting a chain reaction that cannot be contained. Such an opening of Pandora’s box means that virtually no one would have any control over subsequent events, and the risk of developments unfavorable to the US interest would become significantly great. For that reason extra-legal changes are to be avoided where possible. The inference is obvious for the US—US policy should be aimed at supporting the efficacy of the present administration and the National Front system and their ability to respond to national problems and aspirations. The converse of this inference is also clear—we should do nothing to weaken the administration. Thus, in seeking to prod the political mechanism to appropriate developmental action the relatively fragile political pattern must not be pushed beyond its depth (Embtel 654).

The above, of course, is the recommended general thrust of current US policy. Should it happen that a break in the constitutional process is provoked in any way, the range of choices then open to US policy would obviously be determined by the nature of the extra-legal change and of the surrounding and succeeding circumstances. In any such situation, regardless of its precise configuration, the basic objectives of US policy would be at least:

a) Avoid having the national situation in Colombia become hostile to the US and, if at all possible, maintain a friendly or sympathetic environment;

b) Minimize dislocations, antagonisms and frustrations to avoid the build-up of discontent and instability; instability provoked by dislocated and abnormal political and social patterns is particularly deleterious in terms of sane accommodation to domestic problems and needs, as well as potentially explosive in terms of international balance of power factors;

c) Avoid control of the country or sizeable increase in influence by Communists and Castroists.

To achieve these desiderata US policy would have to be aimed at:

a) pressing for a return to institutional normality (presumably elections) and to norms of sufficient enlightenment and flexibility to handle aspirations and change with a minimal risk of explosion; and b) providing such financial and other assistance as circumstances may indicate are appropriate to avoid chaos and social dislocation and ease the return to normality.

The difficult part, obviously, is the translation of the above in to specific courses of action. In the Colombian context, any of the contingencies listed here, except possibly elite action resting on a very broad-based consensus, would probably mean the end of the National Front. The stronger the break with constitutionality the greater the probability of civil divisions and antagonistic reactions. This risk is great considering Colombian history and the depth of traditional political feeling and divisiveness. In the event such flux and divisions occur, whether along historical political cleavages or even on class lines, the image of the US held by the various elements in the society will be extremely pertinent for future US relations with Colombia. The point for US policy is that identification of the US with one sector or sectors at the expense of antagonizing opposed but otherwise legitimate elements could be dramatically counter-productive.

It would be natural in such a contingency to feel the compulsion to do something rather than nothing. But in circumstances of wide fragmentation, restraint may be the wiser course. One is, in fact, tempted to argue that, given Colombian history and character, with its infinite internal animosities and complexities, the US should attempt not so much to manipulate specific internal elements as to exert its pressure on the broad basis of making clear to the society what the US goal is in terms of social justice, development, etc., and what circumstances will receive our cooperation and support. We must also recognize that the Communists will attempt to clothe themselves in legitimate causes. A correct policy of combatting the Communist threat will therefore require us to avoid both a simplistic understanding of the situation, and an oversimplification of our interest in public order into opposition to legitimate class or economic interests. Obviously a deterioration of the situation into civil war or an impending danger of Communist take over may require our greater commitment in the internal situation. But recognizing this means we must exert considerable wisdom, patience and understanding to avoid unnecessary involvement in domestic complexities.

Still another caveat is worth mentioning. It may be that past US policy in Latin America made the mistake in a few instances of supporting (and identifying itself) with the status quo, when the status quo was neither able to meet the people's aspirations or was itself domestically discredited. Just as the Alliance for Progress seeks to achieve, through what can be called the "normal" political system, an evolution of the social status quo to something more responsive to national aspirations, these same goals should be the guide for US policy in an abnormal political situation. The problem there will be to seek constructively to return that abnormal situation to a more normal and stable one to achieve the same goals.

It will be clear, then, that a situation which develops subsequent to an extra-legal change can become most complex and subtle. The imperatives of the long-run national interest of the US will, therefore, force US policy to consider, on the one hand, the need to influence events and shape circumstances constructively to convert the situation into one favorable to us or at least not unfavorable to us, and, on the other hand, the need to avoid intervening in complex domestic situations in such a way as to ruin the chances of achieving that very objective. The Scylla and Charybdis of this dilemma will be the limits between which US policy must tread in such circumstances.

While US responses to general categories of contingencies are mentioned below, the following generalizations may be made by way of summary:

1. Recognition. The more broadly based the support for an extra-legal change, the less difficult is the problem of recognition. In any event, recognition as a means of leverage has severe limitations, as history has shown. Hence the US should not use recognition as a lever except in a quite limited manner for nudging the situation in a given direction. In case of a change, there will probably be no value in immediate public comment on the situation. The first task will be to gauge the situation and determine how stable or how convulsed it is. For this a prudent time will be required. If it is determined that a reasonably stable government is established, recognition can be extended. Not to do so given an otherwise stabilized situation is probably not practical. Recognition, however, should be based squarely and explicitly on Resolution 35 of the Ninth Inter American Conference, and it should be made clear that recognition implies neither approbation nor commitment per se. This puts the proof of the pudding on performance and avoids the risks and dangers of US identification with the regime in case of subsequent deterioration (in the way that Rojas became progressively unpopular).

2. OAS. Real and meaningful consultation should be undertaken. There will obviously be a value in allowing a number of LA states to recognize first, and it may be that OAS channels will prove valuable levers depending upon circumstances. It should be recognized, however, that the US cannot evade being judged alone, regardless of what other American Republics do, and it will probably be judged with different criteria. (Thus the public opinion of Uruguay's decoration of Pérez Jimenez was not the same as that of the US's performance of the same thing.)

3. Assistance Programs. Barring civil war or a particularly obnoxious regime, the first US reaction should probably again be silence and maintenance of existing programs. No public comment or speculation regarding the aid programs should be made so that future maneuverability is not lost. Whether aid programs continue to be maintained at the same levels, or are increased or decreased would depend upon the development and the nature of governing elements. The aid programs are of course our strongest leverage, and should be used as such firmly but adroitly.

4. Military Assistance. What is said of 3 applies in this case. Military aid, however, is an especially delicate thing to handle. About all that can be said for planning purposes is that we should recognize the following pitfalls: It is quite likely that an extra-legal change would involve the military and military control of government. Such a change is also likely to arouse public reaction and resistance. Hence US military assistance could become mistaken for support of a military supported dictatorship. On the other hand, removal of military aid may cripple the only institution capable of confronting Communist subversion, especially insofar as the Colombian violence problem is concerned. The dilemma is deepened by the fact that legitimate opposition to military rule would most probably manifest itself in renewed rural violence, and a repetition of the 1948–53 political violence is a real possibility. In those circumstances US military assistance may be used to fight legitimate political opposition. These considerations must be carefully kept in mind. At this point it is difficult to imagine circumstances grave enough to warrant US military intervention, and it will be important to keep a tight rein on such compulsions.

III. Conditions for Extra-legal Change

An extra-legal alteration of the constitutional order could occur as one of two basic things: 1) “preventative” action by status quo elements motivated by a belief that their interests can be protected in no other way and/or by a belief that action is needed to forestall category 2; or 2) social revolution, violent or not, from either the right or left, aimed at changing the existing institutional order and status quo.

Circumstances and conditions which could result in category 1 are:

- a) Widespread and intense discontent;
- b) Intensification of problems especially economic and social;
- c) Relative impotence of authority to handle problems, and consequent lack of confidence in the administration or even in the institutional order;
- d) Visible increase in subversive capacity or challenge;
- e) Existence of leaders with sufficient prestige and power to take action.

Since the decision to act in a “preventative” type action is essentially a subjective one, it is impossible to predict at what point such a decision might be made. It could be made without disintegration being far advanced or the substantive situation being really very bad, because it would essentially be anticipatory.

Circumstances and conditions which would result in category 2 are:

- a) Widespread and intense discontent;
- b) Intensification of problems, particularly social problems that affect lower classes, such as unemployment;

[Here follows sections IV through VIII comprising “Range of Possibilities,” “Elite Action,” “Civilian-Military Action,” “Military Coup,” and “Social Revolt.”]

67. Memorandum of conversation, July 24, between President Kennedy and Ambassador Uribe Botero¹

July 24, 1963

SUBJECT

Colombian Ambassador’s Presentation of Credentials to the President

PARTICIPANTS

The President

Edwin M. Martin, Assistant Secretary, ARA

Eduardo Uribe Botero, Colombian Ambassador

After a brief exchange of [illegible in the original] by the President to the great pleasure with which he and his wife recalled their visit to Colombia, the President asked the Ambassador how the violence problem was progressing. The Ambassador reported that the areas of violence had been much reduced and progress was good. The President welcomed this and then asked about the economic situation.

The Ambassador stressed the difficulties they were having with their budgetary deficit. The President inquired whether [illegible in the original]. inflationary problem. The Ambassador added not at the present time. The President commented that, if there were no problem of inflation, they ought to be able to handle the budgetary problem by various means. At the request of the President, Assistant Secretary Martin pointed out that they had just passed through crisis on inflation and balance of payments and were only now getting the situation under control. Under these conditions the budgetary deficit presented difficulties. The President agreed, emphasizing the seriousness of balance of payments problems.

¹ Presentation of Ambassador’s credentials; Colombian budgetary difficulties. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 17 COL–U.S.

The President inquired about his good friend Ambassador Sanz de Santamaria. The Ambassador replied that he was very well but very busy in his role as Finance Minister. He indicated he thought he might be in Washington in a month or two. The President said he would like very much to see him when he comes and would look forward to seeing the Ambassador and the Finance Minister together then.

The President concluded with an expression of pleasure at welcoming the new Ambassador and indicated he was always available to see him if he had any problems.

Costa Rica

68. Despatch 576 from San Jose, April 6¹

San Jose, April 6, 1961

Subject: Status of Relations with Current Costa Rican Government

SUMMARY: The Embassy and all members of the country team are currently concerned over what appear to be steadily worsening relations between United States officials in Costa Rica and the administration of President Echandi. The purpose of this despatch is to bring to the attention of the Department and of Ambassador Telles the country team's assessment of this situation and at the same time to recommend certain steps which we feel should be taken promptly in order to restore the status of United States representation in San José.

All members of the country team are in full agreement that relations between the top echelon of the Echandi government and the Embassy have been deteriorating for at least a year, and have now reached a low point at which the Embassy and most of its associated United States Agencies in Costa Rica are finding it difficult to perform their basic consultative functions with the Costa Rican government, insofar as these involve contacts with President Echandi and with his most intimate circle of cabinet ministers. Manifestations of the "cold front" are evident in one form or another to all members of the country team and have appeared in manifold and often subtle ways, frequently easier to sense than to document precisely.

Difficulties being faced by the Embassy and USOM in the development loan field have considerable bearing on the overall situation described in this despatch, although they must be regarded as contributing elements to the cold front atmosphere rather than results of it. Beginning with a recent rural credit loan project and in all applications since that one, President Echandi and the Minister of Economy Borbon Castro have simply ignored United States representatives in San José, channelling their proposals directly to DLF through Ambassador Escalante in Washington. The fact that these projects have been given prompt and considerate attention in Washington has encouraged Echandi to continue bypassing the Embassy and USOM with the result that recent requests stemming from the Act of Bogota meetings have been prepared hastily and incompletely and entirely without consultation with United States representatives on the local level.

¹ Status of relations with current Costa Rican Government. Secret. 11 pp. DOS, CF, 611.18/4-661.

More specific indications of an intentionally frigid attitude on the part of the Costa Rican government are as follows:

An officer of the Civil Guard noted to the Army Attaché that the attention and entertainment accorded the officers of "HMS Cardigan Bay," a British frigate which visited Puntarenas in February 1961, was considerably greater than that extended to the officers of United States ships which have visited the same port during the past year, and was, according to the Army Attaché's Civil Guard informant, intended by the Costa Rican government to emphasize the current feeling of coolness toward United States Missions in Costa Rica.

The United States Army Mission in Costa Rica is experiencing various difficulties in performing its mission, most specific of which has been the unwillingness of the Costa Rican government to assign officer students to the CONUS and USCARIBE Schools in Panama—and which is part of "an obvious change in a formerly cooperative attitude," which took place following the inability of the Mission Chief to provide an additional space for a Costa Rican participant (Col. Ventura, unofficial commandant of the Civil Guard) on "Operation Solidarity."

Neither President Echandi nor any of his closest circle of cabinet ministers appeared at a large reception given by the officers of the Embassy on March 16, 1961, to introduce the newly arrived Deputy Chief of Mission, (nor did he or any of his staff reply to or apparently take any cognizance of the formal invitations sent them on this occasion).² This was particularly noticeable in view of the fact that the President had apparently made a particular effort to put in an appearance at a reception given by the Spanish Embassy during the same week, and on the evening prior to his wife's departure for a stay in Guatemala.

The President has simply ignored other requests by the Deputy Chief of Mission for appointments—in one occasion in order to solicit his taped comments on the Kennedy speech, and in another instance to present to him a personal gift and note from Mrs. Katharine Bracken, Director of the Office of Central American and Panama Affairs (the embarrassment of the President's personal secretary with regard to these discourtesies has been quite apparent).

² NOTE: The Minister of Education did attend the reception and has in fact continued to be both accessible and cooperative in relations with United States representatives.

The President's attitude toward the Deputy Chief of Mission when the latter has spoken to him at other official receptions has been correct but icy.

Certainly one of the sources of Echandi's current attitude toward the Embassy is his own inner-directed personality, and the same can be said of certain of his cabinet members such as Minister of Economy Borbon Castro. However, the country team is unanimously agreed that most of our current difficulties result directly from a long, and unfortunately continuing succession of United States actions (or lack of actions) which have affronted the sensibilities of the President and his administration. The most important of these are the following:

- (1) Occasions on which Echandi feels that he has been let down by the United States.

Case of Claudio Antonio Volio and the Institute at Turrialba. (Ref. Embtels 342, 5/6/60; 346, 5/9/60 and Emb. Desp 642, 6/8/60)

While Echandi believed that he had secured the agreement of other Central American Presidents to have their representatives on the OAS vote for his personal candidate Claudio Antonio Volio to be Director of the Agricultural Institute at Turrialba a year ago, the latter lost the election as a result of a last minute switch by one Central American vote. Echandi subsequently learned that the Honduran Ambassador in Washington was prevailed upon to vote against Volio (which cost him the election). As a result, Volio resigned from the Institute and Echandi has been furious at the United States ever since, since he felt that we had not only not supported him on this matter but had probably influenced the Honduran representative to change his vote.

Reimbursement for Expenses Incurred In Providing Security at the San José Conference. (Ref. Emb. Desp. 513, 3/2/61)

The President and his military advisors have felt ever since the San José Conference of last August that the United States should reimburse the Costa Rican government for expenses incurred by the Costa Rican Civil Guard in providing security for the conference and the visiting delegations, of which the largest was from the U.S.A. The President has become increasingly disillusioned over the failure of the United States to make any tangible response in this connection.

Costa Rican Requests for Military Equipment.

The President has for some time been hoping for a United States gift of communications and transportation equipment for the Civil Guard, which is now down to the point, according to one source, of having to rent private cars for patrol purposes. A succession of visiting VIP's from the Department of Defense have come and gone, inevitably leaving Costa Rica government officials with the impression that the United States would respond favorably to the Costa Rican desire for equipment. As nothing in the way of concrete help has materialized, the disappointed President has taken more and more the attitude that United States promises to Costa Rica are worthless. (This situation was aggravated recently when the Argentine Government decorated the President with the Grand Cross of the Order of San Martín in expression of Argentine appreciation for the care and cooperation extended to their delegation at the San José Conference.)

In addition, the President reflects concern felt by his military staff at the unsympathetic insistence by USCINCARIB for cash on the line for tear gas grenades which Costa Ricans requested urgently at the time of the banana workers' strike in 1959 (ref. Deptel 226, 1/6/60). The fact that Costa Rican credit with USCINCARIB had been jeopardized by prior difficulties in obtaining payment from the Costa Ricans for equipment purchased from CINCARIB is altogether overlooked by the Costa Rican government, and United States hesitancy in what they considered an hour of need is contrasted unfavorably with the fact that the Panamanian government responded immediately to the Costa Rican request with a loan of United States made grenades.

Loan Applications.

The delays and frustration which have attended each of the Costa Rican applications for United States loans to date tend to be regarded by the President and his administration as further examples of lack of United States support. The fact that many of these delays result from improper and inadequate preparation by the Costa Rican government are naturally overlooked locally. Additional salt has been rubbed in local wounds by the announcement of approved loans to Nicaragua and Honduras, as well as extension of a DLF loan to an Italian colony in Costa Rica, while nothing transpired on the Government's own rural credit loan.

13th Month Bonus Payment to the United Fruit Company Employees.
(Emb. Desps. 330, 6/13/60; 685, 6/24/60)

When in January 1960, President Echandi settled the banana workers' strike by payment on behalf of the United Fruit Company of the full 13th month bonus, he fully expected that the government would eventually be reimbursed by the company for the three weeks' wages which were paid from public funds. Echandi has been informed that recommendations to this effect by the local management were overruled in Boston and he reportedly thinks that pressure should have been exercised by Washington to bring about this result.

The Punta Llorona Affair.

Ever since the abortive Punta Llorona affair in which Costa Rica effectively broke up a Nicaraguan invasion attempt, Echandi has reportedly felt that the United States Government did not give him adequate and necessary support needed to effectively break up the rebel camp and insure that the arms there were taken over by the Costa Rican Government. Echandi has claimed that Deputy Aguiluz, one of the ring leaders in the affair, was able to get away with a plane load of arms because the United States did not immediately provide adequate air support. Echandi is also reportedly of the opinion that the United States has dragged its feet in response to requests for the use of IAGS and Panama based helicopters during various actual or suspected emergencies.

(2) United States Official Identification with José Figueres.

United States interest in Pepe Figueres as an international figure tends to be completely misconstrued in Costa Rica in consequence of Figueres' local identification as spark plug of the most active and effective domestic opposition to Echandi, and as leader of only one of the three or more parties currently engaged in pre-electoral maneuvers for the Presidential elections of February 1962. United States high official regard for Figueres has been frequent and continuous, and each public expression of it increases the resentment of the Echandi government and at the same time of the other candidates for Presidential office (see despatches 556 and 559, March 24, 1961). Specific examples of United States identification with Figueres which have rankled deep in San José are:—

Direct citation of Figueres by President Kennedy in his speech of March 13, 1961. Prior to the speech, President Echandi had expressed interest in the Embassy's invitation to provide taped comments on the substance of the speech. Subsequently he simply ignored the Embassy's invitation and gave his comments to the local A.P. correspondent. For the even more violent reaction of Otilio Ulate, a prominent candidate for the Presidency, see despatch 559, March 24, 1961.

A recent copy of "Combate," the publication of Figueres' International Institute of Political Studies prominently featured an article jointly written by Figueres and Adolph Berle. Mr. Berle is in consequence blamed locally for the close identification of the Kennedy administration with Figueres.

The obvious interest of United States official and semi-official visitors in the International Institute of Political Studies and the frequency of high level public exploitation of telegrams and letters of congratulations, confraternity, and esteem from noted American liberals has irritated many conservative Costa Ricans. The activities of United States Professor Harry Kantor and Sacha Volman, and Embassy contacts with the Institute and its backers are all highly suspect in the eyes of the Costa Rican Government.

During the past year, the new President of the United Fruit Company, Mr. Sunderland, made the tactical blunder of calling on Figueres before calling on Echandi. While this is something for which Echandi can hardly blame the Embassy, he is still most resentful of what he considered a gratuitous slight handed him by the largest United States Company operating in Costa Rica.

(3) Personal Sensitivities.

While Echandi is unquestionably aware of the importance of Ambassador Willauer's services outside of Costa Rica during the period of his assignment here, the President has evidenced displeasure over what he considers the casual attitude of the Department of State towards Costa Rica in so frequently calling the United States Ambassador away to attend to other priorities and leaving American representation in Costa Rica in the hands of a Chargé d'Affaires.

The President and other members of the Costa Rican Government were highly irritated at the conduct of District Engineer Brown of the Bureau of Public Roads. While Brown was ultimately removed from Costa Rica at the Embassy's request, the impact of his appointment here was just one more in this series of apparent United States affronts to Costa Rican pride.

The above succession of what the President clearly regards as either United States lack of support of his government or direct United States official identification with his opponents has now resulted in the Costa Rican freeze-out of the Embassy and its component elements described above.

The country team feels that the arrival of a new Ambassador, particularly one who is reportedly bilingual in Spanish and one who has a clear mandate to devote himself primarily to Costa Rica, should go far toward the re-establishment of good relations with Echandi, but we believe that additional positive actions by the United States Government are required to break the ice. Furthermore, the country team is agreed that any continuing relationship with Echandi will depend on the willingness of United States Government officials in Washington to avoid public identification with ex-President Figueres and to demonstrate impartiality in dealing with all Costa Rican political leaders.

In line with these thoughts, the country team recommends prompt and positive United States action along the following lines to remedy the situation:

1. Award of the Legion of Merit to President Echandi as an initial gesture by the new United States Ambassador immediately following his arrival. Basis for the award has been stated fully in the proposal made by the Army Attaché to the Department of the Army for award of the decoration, a copy of which is attached as Annex A to this despatch. It is recommended, however, that relatively lesser emphasis be devoted in the citation to the conference of Foreign Ministers in San José, since the Argentines have already beaten us to the punch in this connection, and also in view of the complete change of administration in the United States since the meeting took place. Placed within an appropriate context, the country team feels that this gesture would be greatly appreciated by President Echandi and would help Ambassador Telles materially to make a fresh start.

2. A White House invitation to President Echandi for a Kennedy-Echandi meeting, if possible timed to coincide with approval of a significant Costa Rican loan request. It appears that President Echandi has particular personal reasons why he would appreciate an opportunity for a trip to the United States at the present time, but it is questionable whether he could obtain the required Costa Rican congressional authorization to leave the country except in response to an invitation of this magnitude. In addition, it has come to the attention of the Embassy that Figueres' supporters (United States and other) are endeavoring to arrange a Kennedy-Figueres meeting. The country team is unanimous in agreement that a Kennedy-Figueres meeting would utterly queer relationships with the Echandi Government and with all other current aspirants to the Costa Rican presidency, unless a Kennedy-Echandi meeting is arranged first.

3. The country team urges all interested Departments and Agencies in Washington to find the $10,000 worth of radio supplies and ammunition which the Echandi administration feels is its due as a result of the San José Conference. The Embassy appreciates the good intent of the Departments of State and Defense in sending a proposed mission to examine all aspects of Costa Rican defense needs and endeavor to make a more substantial donation to the Costa Rican Government. However, so many Generals and other dignitaries have come through Costa Rica of late, listened sympathetically to Costa Rican pleas and ultimately provided nothing, that the country team currently advises against sending any new mission to this country unless they come armed with tangible evidence of their good will. In addition, the Chief of the U.S. Army Mission to Costa Rica points out—

a) that complete information on Costa Rican military needs is submitted annually to the DOD in connection with Mission programming (latest submission dated 3/21/61, copy attached as Annex B).

b) minimum lead time for delivery of the type of equipment desired by the Costa Ricans is 18 months which would be too late under any condition to help the Echandi government.

4. Prompt support by Washington agencies for those loan requests submitted by the Costa Rican Government which have prior country team support. The country team feels that it might be very helpful if the two loans in which USOM has participated from the start (the San José Waterworks Loan and the INVU Housing Loan) could be given particularly prompt attention, which might make clear to the Costa Rican Government the advantages of joint planning in San José over “end runs” to Escalante.

5. Full support and backstopping by the United States at the Washington level for an anticipated Costa Rican request for an Exim Bank loan to cover relocation and reconstruction of the portion of the Inter-American Highway between El Coco and San Ramon. This section of the road is obsolete by today’s highway specifications and constitutes a real traffic bottleneck. The work has not been included in BPR programming or appropriations for Costa Rica and is not likely to be until completion of remaining unconstructed sections of the highway have been assured. However, the Costa Ricans are so convinced of the current necessity of this work that they propose to request a three million dollar loan to enable them to undertake at least the most urgent portions of the road themselves. President Echandi and his Minister of Public Works discussed this problem at length with Senators Chavez and Young during their visit to San José in November 1960.

6. Prompt ICA/Washington signature of the contract which will authorize the employment in Costa Rica of IDA contract personnel to advise the Costa Rican National Bank on colonization projects and to assist Costa Rican officials in the preparation of loan applications for this purpose. It is the strong view of the USOM Director in San José that had these experts been available prior to the submission of the current Costa Rican colonization loan project a greatly improved proposal would have been forthcoming. Their assistance in preparation of a resubmission of this request is even more urgently needed now.

E.F. Rivinus

Chargé d’Affaires a.i.

Attachments:

Annex A—Proposal by Army Attaché dated March 28/1961

Annex B—Submission to DOD of 3/29/61

(1) Military Assistance Plan FY 63–67 Plan Backup

(2) Military Assistance Plan FY 63–67 Plan Summary

69. Memorandum of conversation, April 17, between President Kennedy and Ambassador Escalante¹

April 17, 1961

SUBJECT

Call on the President by Costa Rican Ambassador

PARTICIPANTS

The President

Ambassador Manuel G. Escalante of Costa Rica

Acting Assistant Secretary Wymberley DeR. Coerr

At the President's request, Costa Rican Ambassador Manuel G. Escalante paid his first official call on the President, who expressed his pleasure at the visit. The Ambassador said that President Echandi was most pleased that his representative had been invited to the White House and considered it a great honor.

President Kennedy inquired regarding the Costa Rican Government's program of land reform, expressing much interest in it. The Ambassador responded enthusiastically that the government was working on a program to settle some 1500 families in an area soon to be opened up in the northern part of Costa Rica. There followed a brief discussion of Costa Rica's main export products—which the Ambassador identified as coffee, bananas, cacao and sugar in that order. The Ambassador said that Costa Rica was most pleased to receive the recent increase in its sugar allotment. With regard to bananas, he briefly mentioned that the Presidents of Costa Rica and Panama would shortly hold a meeting on the border between those two countries in an effort to achieve some progress in stabilizing the banana market. He said that President Echandi was very glad that the United States was sending Ambassador Turkel as an observer.

¹ Costa Rican land reform program. Official Use Only. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Costa Rica, January–August 1961.

70. Despatch 625 from San Jose, April 25¹

San Jose, April 25, 1961

REF: Emb. Despatch 576 dated 4/6/61 and Emb. Despatch 624 dated 4/24/61. SUBJECT: President Echandi's Current Attitude Towards U.S. Aid.

The Embassy has observed an increasing disposition on the part of President Echandi to confuse U.S. support for Costa Rica with U.S. support for Echandi's own latest projects. The most recent and perhaps the most enthusiastic of these projects is the Echandi proposal for the organization of an association of banana producing states for the stabilization of banana prices and the banana market—but specifically for that portion of the draft agreements involving a price increase to be devoted to a capitalization fund for the banana workers, in accordance with the locally well-known "Plan Martén." In two recent conversations which he has had with official Americans, the first a visiting group of members of the Industrial College of the Armed Forces and second the DCM, the President has made sardonic reference to his current thesis that the U.S. "does not come to the aid of any drowning Latin American until the water is up to his chin," and has added that, in his opinion, the forthcoming banana agreement would be a perfect case in point.

Echandi is currently convinced that the invocation of a profit sharing formula in line with the "Plan Martén" is the solution to Communism among the banana workers. He referred bitterly in his conversation with the DCM (the first time since the latter's arrival in Costa Rica that the President has said anything more than the most formal words of greeting) to the frequent citation of the American housewife as the ultimate judge of the practicability of an increase in banana prices. He claimed that the United States spends fortunes of the American housewife's money in efforts to combat Communism when it has gone too far, and declared that, in his opinion, the American housewife should be called upon to pay the relatively lesser cost of an increase in banana prices for the purpose of stopping the inroads of Communism in Costa Rica.

Even though Echandi has been informed in unequivocal terms by representatives of the two major banana producing companies in Costa Rica of their opposition to the scheme, he appears to feel that the U.S. Government can exercise sufficient pressure upon the companies to make them withdraw their opposition. He also was informed that, in the opinion of the companies, in practice the scheme would prove unworkable. However, Echandi is so convinced of his position in this regard and has been so thoroughly sold by Alberto Martén during recent weeks of close collaboration that all arguments presented by close friends of his who oppose the plan have gone unheeded. When the DCM observed that a recent review of U.S. programs in Costa Rica had indicated an annual expenditure of several million by the U.S. for the basic improvement of the social and economic picture in Costa Rica, the President simply shrugged off this argument with a facetious reply, and stated that the bona fides of U.S. support of Costa Rica would be determined by the U.S. attitude toward the banana agreement.

¹ President Echandi's current attitude toward U.S. aid. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 611.18/4-2561.

E.F. Rivinus
Chargé d'Affaires a.i.

71. Telegram 519 from San Jose, May 18¹

San Jose, May 18, 1961

Received impressive and friendly reception upon arrival at airport by large number of CR citizens including Ambassador Escalante and official representatives Foreign Office.

Protracted delay in GOCR scheduling my presentation of credentials has led to generally evident and widely-shared belief intent purposefully insulting, particularly since Lebanese Minister who arrived after me was promptly received by Echandi with accompanying publicity. Consequently I had long and frank talk yesterday with Foreign Minister Vargas Fernandez, during which latter confirmed that delay at President's direction and advised me in no uncertain terms Echandi and close associates including himself still deeply resent combination JFK reference to Figueres in March 13 speech and Kennedy-Figueres interview. In addition Figueres having obviously maneuvered departure time visiting Rector San Marcos University to coincide with my arrival was consequently able exploit our apparently chance encounter at airport through photos his papers plus accompanying caption suggestion future close liaison between Figueres and me on Alianza Para Progreso. Vargas Fernandez claims absence of public denial by Embassy has added to Echandi's irritation. However I will select appropriate time to clarify this apparent deliberate effort by Figueres.

¹ Reasons for delay in presenting credentials by new U.S. Ambassador. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 611.18/5-1861.

I feel that only means overcome President's attitude lies in establishment of effective personal relationship with him, and consequently propose officially overlook present petty insults and slights which I suspect ultimately will backfire on Echandi through his own people. Further I am optimistic of prompt and favorable results from my talk yesterday with Vargas Fernandez in which I expressed myself with equal frankness along guidelines outlined Deptel 449 and stressed President Kennedy's personal admiration for President Echandi and people of CR. I believe that more direct approach to problem at present would be counterproductive. Also, I am confident once I make personal contact with Echandi I can handle situation very effectively.

Telles

72. Despatch 360 from San Jose, January 24¹

San Jose, January 24, 1962

REF: [illegible in the original]. SUBJECT: President of Costa Rica expresses concern over 1962 Sugar Allocation.

SUMMARY:

President Echandi called the Ambassador in on Tuesday, January 16, and talked with him for two hours about the concern currently felt in Costa Rica over the 1962 US sugar allocation. The President felt that the US was discriminating against Costa Rica in comparison with Nicaragua and Panama, that the depressed prices for coffee and bananas make sugar exports at quota prices vital in the Costa Rican foreign exchange picture, that any reduction in quota and allocation from last year's 30250 tons will mean serious losses to numerous mill owners and thousands of small producers in Costa Rica, and he noted that commiefrent PADP leader Enrique OBREGON Valverde has already begun to exploit the current apparent discrimination evident in the 1962 allocations to create anti-US sentiment. The Embassy shares the President's concern, and urges that the US take prompt action to assure Costa Rica of an allocation for 1962 at least equal to last year's 30250 tons, and if possible an increase proportional to that granted Nicaragua.

¹ President Echandi's concern over 1962 U.S. sugar allocation. Official Use Only. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 818.235/1-2462.

The Ambassador visited President Echandi on January 16 at the President's request for a discussion of the 1962 US sugar quote and allocation to Costa Rica, a discussion which lasted two hours during which Echandi made the following significant points:

1.) Discrimination against Costa Rica becomes evident in any comparison between the quotas and purchase allocations made to Costa Rica in 1961 and for the 6 month period ending June 30, 1962, and the quotas and allocations made to Costa Rica's neighbors, Nicaragua and Panama over the same period.

COUNTRY	Total Quota & Purchase Allo. 1961	Quota of Purchase Allo. to 6/30/62	% of 1961 quota purchase allo. granted for 1st 6 mo. of 1962.
Costa Rica	30250 Tons	5000 Tons	16.7 %
Nicaragua	43368 Tons	50000 Tons	112.9 %
Panama	10000 Tons	5000 Tons	50.0 %

The President asked for some explanation of this apparent discriminatory pattern, to which the Ambassador was unable to respond. The Embassy requests that the Dept. furnish us urgently with an account of the rationale on which the current allocations are based. The Embassy notes that the sugar report for Nicaragua submitted by the Agricultural Attaché on Oct. 7 '61 predicts an export availability for 1962 of 60000 tons "of which 50000 tons can be shipped in the first six months." A parallel report on Costa Rican sugar, dated Oct. 10, '61 predicts an export availability for Costa Rica of 45000 tons "during calendar year 1962." The Embassy is hopeful that these reports have furnished the basis for 1962 allocations, and that current planning envisages an additional 40000 ton allocations, to Costa Rica. However, national rivalries in the area being what they are some public announcement of US interests to redress the balance between Nicaragua and Costa Rica should be made promptly, or subsequent allocations may well be regarded as defensive responses to (partly commie) local outcry.

2.) Echandi stressed the obvious importance to Costa Rica of holding the line and if possible increasing sugar exports as a foreign exchange counterbalance to currently depressed coffee and banana income. The GOCCR has indeed been striving to diversify agricultural production away from these two traditional export earners, and any reduction in quota or allocation at this point would both reduce Costa Rica's already weakened foreign earnings position and would deal a heavy blow to Costa Rican efforts at agricultural diversification.

3.) The President particularly emphasized the point (often made in Embassy despatches and reports on the sugar situation in Costa Rica) that a reduction in quota and allocations and consequent reduction in overall income from Costa Rica sugar exports would affect a relatively large number of people in Costa Rica, where 10% of the population depends for at least a part of their livelihood on sugar production. (There are an estimated 27,000 small sugar producers and a total of 33 ingenios (sugar mills) in operation throughout Costa Rica.) He compared this situation with that of Nicaragua where sugar production is controlled by a relatively small number of large producers (notably including the Somoza family) and with Panama, where two large producers, one of them the President, reportedly own virtually all refining and production capacity. The Ambassador and Embassy [illegible in the original] been shown several new or improved and augmented [illegible in the original] representing a substantial new investment in Costa Rica's sugar production capacity-based on expectations of at least a 50000 ton allocation for the future. Many of these new plants are owned and operated by Cuban refugees who have settled in Costa Rica and who in turn play a significant role in alleviating the Cuban refugee problem here by furnishing employment to other refugees. A reduction in sugar purchases at the quota price is likely to bankrupt a number of these struggling enterprises right at the start. In addition, the Embassy wishes to point out that the most immediate sufferers among producers should the sugar price weaken are apt to be the many thousands of small producers who lack the resources to withstand an adverse crop year. Their only resource in hard times is to sell their land—usually at a low figure and usually to larger landholders, a situation which runs directly contrary to the land reform objectives of the Alliance for Progress.

4.) Finally, the President called attention to the recent increase in publicly expressed concern over the sugar situation in Costa Rica. During the past two weeks articles and paid advertisements have appeared in the San Jose press (see attachments) deploring the low allocation to Costa Rica for the last 6 months of 1962, and giving a pessimistic prognosis for the future of the economy if the US does not respond to Costa Rica's needs. Not unexpectedly Enrique Obregon Valverde, US-hater and commie-party-lining candidate for the presidency on the PADP ticket is among the most articulate spokesmen of this concern, using the comparative allocations to Nicaragua and Panama in support of his party's thesis that Costa Rica's economy is overly dependent on the US which is committing Costa Rica along with the rest of Latin America to bankruptcy. (see attached advertisement of PADP). Echandi noted that the current situation provides for the moment virtually irrefutable documentation for all opposition elements to indulge in demagoguery at the expense of the US, and that if US assurance of an increased allocation is not forthcoming soon they will be able to claim that future increases are the result of their agitation.

COMMENT:

The Embassy concurs in the President's estimate of the importance to Costa Rica's economy and to the 10% of the population dependent on the sugar market of insuring that the US purchase in 1962 at least 30000 tons of sugar from Costa Rica at the quota price. Further, in view of the increased investment in sugar production in the country and the desirability in terms of US objectives of agricultural diversification away from past dependence on coffee and bananas to urge that if possible total quota and allocation purchased from Costa Rica total the 45000 tons recommended by the agricultural attaché in his survey of Oct. 10, 1961. On several occasions and prior to the announcement of the 1962 (6-months) [illegible in the original] and expansion of the sugar industry and its importance to the economy of the country have been reported to Washington by the Embassy. This was done in an effort to bring this matter to the constant attention of those concerned in Washington, and so consideration would be given to this information in the establishment of sugar quotas. Also, the Ambassador during his recent visit to Washington, discussed this matter and expressed his concern to the Department and to representatives of the Department of Agriculture.

The Embassy considers this a serious matter affecting not only the B program of Alianza para Progreso, but our friendly relations with a good friend of the United States. Costa Rica is a country that stands out as a champion of democracy in the midst of the Latin-American countries, and is a loyal ally and consistent supporter of U.S. policy both in the U.N. and in the OAS. The Embassy cannot place sufficient emphasis on the seriousness of this problem, and it is believed that unless there is a satisfactory answer to this apparent disturbing situation, undoubtedly the sugar industry and the economy of Costa Rica will face a further serious crisis. Finally, the Embassy hopes that the Departments of State and Agriculture will coordinate with the Embassy on the public relations aspect in connection with future allocations, so as not only to counter current dissatisfaction over the comparatively small quota to date for Costa Rica, but to stimulate the maximum possible popular satisfaction from subsequent increases. Further and most important so that the U.S. Government will receive full credit for this assistance instead of a third party or private intermediary.

Raymond Telles

*Ambassador of the United States
of America*

Enclosures:

1. Telegram from President of Costa Rica
 2. Newspaper clippings: La Nacion Dec. 14, '61, Jan. 13, 14, 16, '62
 3. Le Prensa Libre, Jan 5, '62
 4. La Republics, (Not Dated)
 5. Letter—"Liga de Proteccion a la Agricultura de la Ceña"
 6. Petition of Ingenio de Birris
-

73. Despatch 440 from San Jose, March 2¹

San Jose, March 2, 1962

REF: Joint Emb/USAID Message. SUBJECT: FINANCE: Costa Rica's Fiscal Difficulties and Request for U.S. Assistance.

We have received written indication from President-Elect Orlich of his intention to request $20 million of budget support assistance from the United States (Emb. Desp. 429). Minister of Economy and Finance Borbón has discussed with the Embassy and will undoubtedly request $5 million or more to clean the slate through April 30 (Emb. Desp. 397). He informed an Embassy officer this week that he has nothing more to add to the Central Bank's letter answering basic questions that Orlich had raised regarding the fiscal situation of the Government of Costa Rica (Enclosures 1 and 2), and said the information contained in the letter should be taken as constituting the report on the situation that he had said he would supply to the Embassy (Emb. Desp. 397).

From above indications plus published Central Bank reports there is strong evidence that the government is in a very difficult financial position. Orlich and his representatives indicate that they are determined to take the necessary drastic measures to correct the basic causes of the problem, including such unpopular measures as enforcing tax collections and strengthening the entire tax system. One of the prime causes of the unbalanced budgets in recent years and calendar 1962 has been the not infrequent irresponsible conduct of the Congress in fiscal matters. We hope that the new Congress, with a majority of one from Orlich's party, will cooperate and approve the well-intentioned plans of the president-elect. It will be months before the new administration can prove its capacity and effectiveness to improve the situation through self-help measures. However, it should be realized that Costa Rica, like other countries in the region, has drifted into this situation through continuing to increase its level of government expenditures at the same time that the prices of its principal export crops were declining. Costa Rican officials stress the urgency of the situation and claim that the alternatives are printing money or external aid before corrective measures can be effective. Certainly the situation is acute and worse than usual but a similar situation has existed in previous years on a somewhat lesser scale without disaster.

¹ Costa Rica's fiscal difficulties and request for U.S. assistance, with a copy of a letter from the Central Bank to President-elect Orlich. Confidential. 5 pp. DOS, CF, 818.10/3-262.

It is our opinion that the advisable method to assess the situation is to have an expert or a team of experts come here as quickly as possible to study and analyze the fiscal situation, and further, to study and advise the government on the adequacy of the present tax laws and enforcement of the same, and assist in reviewing the budget in order to determine the realism of the budget. All of this would be done in an attempt to prevent the recurrence of the same apparent present fiscal situation next year. We are contacting the government to try to get their concurrence in this and to agree to such a study. If it materializes as a request to AID then we will hope for speedy assistance. If they prefer IMF, IBRD or other agency analysis we should be prepared to support and hurry the selected agency.

It is recognized that this suggested study will be limited in scope. It cannot resolve any long term problem which will require time and the establishment of an effective planning body but it should provide us a technical basis for immediate decisions as to the real size of the problem and as to whether or not external assistance is required.

Raymond Telles

*Ambassador of the United States
of America*

Enclosures:

1. Letter from Central Bank to Orlich, with attached tables, in Spanish (7 copies)
2. Translation of above letter (without tables)

Enclosure

San José, February 22, 1962

TRANSLATION

Mr. Francisco J. Orlich,
President-Elect of Costa Rica, San José.

My dear sir:

The Bank is pleased to reply to the questionnaire contained in your interpellation published by the press February 16, relating to certain aspects of the difficult fiscal situation. The answers given in this letter to your interesting questions have had to be prepared very rapidly as we wished to be able to deliver them to you before your departure from the country, announced for tomorrow; therefore, they are very brief and just include the data expressly provided by the offices responsible for the conduct of the respective matters.

We are in a position to supply you this information with the desired timeliness because of the rapidity with which these government departments have attended to our request. To provide you a more complete report on the points answered below, we have considered it necessary to include the tables received from the different responsible public offices.

Question No. 1: What is the exact amount of the floating debt derived from government obligations pending as of December 31, 1961?

Answer: According to Table No. 1 supplied by the Treasury, the Treasury deficit as of December 31 last year reached the amount of 46.2 million colones.

Question No. 2: What Treasury deficit will there be as of the last day of April 1962?

Answer: The National Treasurer estimates that the possible Treasury deficit as of next April 30 will amount to 71.7 million colones, in accordance with the analysis which appears in Table No. 2.

Question No. 3: What are the due dates of the obligations incurred by the Government through loans for fiscal purposes supplied by the Central Bank, commercial banks and other institutions?

Answer: Complete details on these due dates are given in Table No. 4. The origin of the obligations included in this table, in chronological order, is as follows:

A. Commercial Banks (El Coco Highway): In April 1961 the Board of Directors of the Central Bank authorized the Commercial Banks a specific ceiling up to the amount of $1.5 million, with an expiration date of December 31, 1962, in order that the Banks might buy public debt bonds from the Government, to permit the Treasury to pay for the right-of-way involved in the construction of the San José-El Coco Highway.

B. Treasury Drafts: As of November 20, 1961 the Central Bank had in its possession Treasury drafts for an amount of $12.5 million. These certificates were thereafter cancelled November 23 with the proceeds of the bond operation indicated below. On December 18 the Board of Directors of the Central Bank authorized the purchase of new Treasury Drafts up to the amount of $10 million. On that occasion it was directed that if at the end of the year there remained a balance pending to be redeemed, this could be cancelled through the issuance of new Drafts. On January 2, 1961, new certificates for the same amount of 10 million were acquired, cancelling the previous ones. The new issue of drafts has an expiration date of February 28, 1962.

C. Purchase of Bonds by the Commercial Banks: In November 1961 the Board of Directors of the Central Bank granted the Banco Nacional and the Banco de Costa Rica a specific temporary ceiling of $20 million to enable them to acquire Government bonds and hold them as a temporary investment. The expiration date of this ceiling was set for April 30, 1962. The proceeds thus obtained by the Treasury ought to be used primarily in cancelling the Treasury drafts in the possession of the Central Bank, and the rest for attending to urgent disbursing needs, especially the payment of the thirteenth month salary of government employees.

D. Banco de Costa Rica: On February 1, 1962 the Board of Directors of the Central Bank agreed to authorize the Banco De Costa Rica a specific temporary ceiling, thus to permit it to buy public debt bonds up to the amount of $2 million. The expiration date for the ceiling was set as March 6, 1962. The operation was carried out for a net of $1.3 million.

Question No. 4: In what amount is it calculated that the revenues for the rest of 1962 were over-estimated?

Answer: In a letter to the Central Bank the National Treasurer calculates that in five of the principal revenue categories of the budget there will be a $44.3 million shortfall in revenues.

Question No. 5: Are there expenditures anticipated for 1962 that were not included in the national Budget? If so, how much do they amount to?

Answer: The Budget Office estimates at $21.9 million the obligations to be met in 1962 that are not included in the budget calculations.

Question No. 6: To sum up: What does the total National Treasury and budget deficit amount to, taking into consideration the data relating to the questions in the preceding paragraphs?

Answer: As indicated in Question No. 1, the Treasury deficit according to the Report of the Situation on December 31, 1961 (Table No. 1) reached $46.2 million. With regard to the budget for the current year, the Bank considers that the estimate of the deficit, even taking into account the deficiencies noted under the preceding questions, is a very uncertain matter, since such a result is based essentially on the policy that the Executive Power may follow in regard to public expenditures. Therefore, any calculation in this regard must take into consideration as a fundamental element the government policy decisions in the matter, which are unknown at this time.

In the form set forth above the Bank believes that it has satisfactorily attended to the objectives and anxieties of your public interpellation, especially if there is taken into consideration the limited time available and the objective of delivering this letter before your departure. Nevertheless, we are pleased to offer to amplify the above information or clarify any point which in your judgment might be necessary for a better evaluation of the fiscal situation in the current budget exercise.

Leaving to your better judgment the use which you may be kind enough to make of the information contained in this letter, we take the opportunity to repeat, Mr. President-Elect, that we are your very attentive and trusty servants,

Central Bank of Costa Rica,

Alvaro Castro J.,
Manager

74. Despatch 442 from San Jose, March 5¹

San Jose, March 5, 1962

REF: CERP D-18. SUBJECT: United States Efforts to Encourage Economic Planning in Costa Rica.

In line with the emphasis being placed on economic planning under the Alliance for Progress, the Ambassador has been active in his efforts to increase the interest of the Government of Costa Rica in the preparation of a comprehensive long-range economic plan. In the years that it has been working in Costa Rica, the United States Aid Mission, as a major part of the projects that it has undertaken, has cooperated with the Government of Costa Rica in working toward planned development in the various fields in which it has been active. In the fields of agriculture, public health, education, housing, public administration, industry, and labor, much has been done that can serve as ground-work for the preparation of an over-all plan for balanced, effective use of the country's human and natural resources. On several occasions the Ambassador has discussed the matter of planning with President Echandi, who has said he is very much in favor of a planning commission.

¹ U.S. efforts to encourage economic planning in Costa Rica. Official Use Only. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 818.00/3-562.

As a step toward making comprehensive economic planning a reality in Costa Rica, the Legislative Assembly, in December of last year, commissioned the University of Costa Rica to undertake comprehensive economic development planning in accordance with the Alliance for Progress (Emb Desp 315, December 21, 1961). The head of this planning group, Lic. Raúl HESS Estrada, has recently been designated to serve in the incoming (May 8) Orlich administration as Minister of Economy and Finance, a post he previously held in the latter part of the Figueres Administration (1954–58). It is therefore anticipated that the change of administration will not cause a break in continuity in the activities of the planning commission. On the contrary, with the head of the commission in the government's chief economic post, it can be expected that the commission's activities will be strongly reinforced.

When the Ambassador visited Washington on consultation in December 1961, he had several discussions with AID officials on the best way to encourage the Government of Costa Rica to proceed. When he expressed to Alliance for Progress Director Teodoro Moscoso his desire to encourage and assist the Government of Costa Rica to initiate and work on their economic development plan, Mr. Moscoso suggested that he get in touch with Mr. Harvey S. Perloff of Resources for the Future, Inc., to seek his advice and assistance. The Ambassador was unable to contact Mr. Perloff while in Washington but since returning to San Jose has corresponded with Mr. Perloff in the hope of obtaining his advice and assistance. (Enclosures 1, 2, 3 and 4.)

In the course of conversations with the Inter-American Development Bank in Washington last December the Ambassador was informed that the IDB expected to play a positive role in planning. It was his impression that the Bank was in the process of formulating the contributions it would be able to make in this field.

Also during his visit to Washington in December, the Ambassador discussed with Mr. J. Burke Knapp, Vice President of IBRD, the possibility of that institution providing technical assistance to the Government of Costa Rica (Enclosure 5). This conversation was followed by the visit to Costa Rica in February of Feliks Bochenski, IBRD Loan Officer. Embassy discussions with Mr. Bochenski are detailed in the attached memorandums of conversation (Enclosures 6 and 7). He directed his efforts toward representatives of the new administration that will take office on May 8, and met with a favorable response to the idea of the IBRD assisting Costa Rica in its planning effort. There was, however, some difference of opinion as to timing and he encountered a feeling of uncertainty as to technique.

When Mr. Bochenski outlined his proposals either for 1) a survey team to make a planning study, 2) a resident IBRD representative to advise on planning, or 3) a combination of the two approaches, President-Elect Orlich said he would like to think it over in order to decide on the best approach. Economy and Finance Minister-Designate Raúl Hess said he wishes to get under way with planning, but wants a month to consider technique. Central Bank officials, as well as Jaime Solera (former Central Bank President and currently financial counselor to Mr. Orlich), would like the IBRD to begin planning work in Costa Rica immediately.

Apparently Raúl Hess, who is expected to be the key figure in Costa Rica's planning effort after May 8, is the only person who has significant reservations about the IBRD assuming a major advisory role in Costa Rican planning. As an economist who is just now completing a work at the University on planning, and as a partisan of ECLA, with which IBRD's relations have sometimes been strained, Hess's lukewarm attitude may stem from a reluctance to agree to something that may make it more difficult for him to act in accordance with his own ideas.

The Embassy is convinced that the new administration will accept the idea that an economic plan is needed and will cooperate in the preparation of such a plan. The matter will be pursued with President-Elect Orlich in order to enlist his full support. The Ambassador has recently reiterated to Mr. Moscoso (Enclosure 8) his desire to obtain suggestions and advice that will help toward the initiation of a planning program by the GOCR as soon as possible.

FOR THE AMBASSADOR:

James R. Johnston
Second Secretary of Embassy

Enclosures:

1. Letter to Mr. Perloff from Ambassador 12/21/61 (5 copies)
2. Letter to the Ambassador from Mr. Perloff 1/8/62 (5 copies)
3. Letter to Mr. Perloff from the Ambassador 1/24/62 (5 copies)
4. Letter to the Ambassador from Mr. Perloff 2/2/62 (5 copies)
5. Letter to the Ambassador from Mr. Knapp 12/29/61 (5 copies)
6. Memo of Conversation with Mr. Bochenski 2/8/62 (5 copies)
7. Memo of Conversation with Mr. Bochenski 2/16/62 (5 copies)
8. Letter to Mr. Moscoso from the Ambassador 2/6/62 (5 copies)

75. Memorandum from Woodward to Moscoso, March 7¹

March 7, 1962

SUBJECT

Costa Rican Financial Difficulties

On February 15 Ambassador Telles received a memorandum from President-elect Orlich of Costa Rica reviewing the fiscal situation of the GOCR, which, in the latter's words, adds up to "a picture of absolute insolvency", with the Government requiring a total of 134 million colones, or approximately $20 million, to balance its books in calendar 1962. The memorandum requested assistance from the U.S. to cover the deficit in the form of a long-term, low interest loan to be extended prior to June 30, 1962.

Orlich's memorandum was delivered to the Ambassador by Raúl Hess, who has been designated as the future Costa Rican Minister of Economy in the new administration which takes office on May 8, and by Jaime Solera, who is slated to be a director of the Central Bank. The latter, acting as spokesman for Orlich, made it clear that he had no authority to speak for the outgoing Echandi Government but expressed the hope that a loan could be obtained from the U.S. to cover the budgetary deficit. The Embassy does not consider the Orlich memorandum as a formal request for a loan, which could only be made by the present Echandi Government.

The Solera-Hess visit followed a previous approach to the Embassy on February 8 by Finance Minister Borbon Castro, in which he estimated the GOCR needs from external sources to meet the budgetary gap at $5 million and promised to give the Embassy a detailed analysis of the situation, which would presumably serve to justify a loan request. This analysis has not yet been received by the Embassy nor does it have a firm indication that the Echandi Government plans to request a U.S. loan during the remaining two months of its term of office.

Nature of the Deficit

The Orlich memorandum, which is said to be based on Central Bank figures, breaks down the deficit into four categories, as follows:

¹ Costa Rican financial difficulties. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 818.10/3-762.

	Million Colones
1. Payments on internal bank loans due before April 30	30
2. Payments on 1961 obligations falling due in 1962 (Floating Debt)	43
3. Decrease expected in 1962 revenues	40
4. Expenditures not included in 1962 budget	21
TOTAL	134

Item 1 represents payments falling due on loans contracted by the GOCR with the commercial banks and the Central Bank. Obligations to the Central Bank consist of short term public bond issues and Treasury notes. The floating debt (Item 2) represents payments due to individuals in 1962 on obligations contracted in 1961. Item 3 represents an anticipated shortfall in 1962 revenues to meet expenditures programmed in the 1962 budget while item 4 consists of expenditures (unexplained) which were not included in the budget. Only items 1 and 2, totaling 73 million colones, appear to represent obligations for which the GOCR has already contracted.

The memorandum points out that the budgetary situation has led to the suspension of service on a number of Costa Rica's external obligations. The country is in arrears to the extent of $600,000 on interest payments due on an Eximbank loan for the Inter-American Highway and has also failed to pay interest of £70,000 due on sterling bonds and on bonds held in France. The Foreign Bondholders Protective Council has expressed concern over the possibility of a default on service of dollar bonds due April 15. It is anticipated that all U.S. and international lending institutions will suspend action on current loan applications of the GOCR because of the serious question that these defaults have raised respecting its credit-worthiness.

From the material already submitted by the Embassy, particularly the Central Bank memorandum on Costa Rica's fiscal situation, it appears that the present budgetary crisis is the culmination of several years' mismanagement of GOCR finances and that rectification of the situation will require a thorough overhaul of GOCR budget and fiscal practices as well as a reform of the tax structure to create new sources of public revenue. In this connection, an official of the IBRD has indicated that it would be prepared to respond to a GOCR request for the assignment of a fiscal expert to provide advice on reform measures.

The loss of confidence in the national finances is already having adverse effects on the national economy, creating uncertainty for private enterprise and threatening a halt in economic and social development programs undertaken by the GOCR. USAID reports that the Government has failed to make contributions to certain projects included in the aid program because of its shortage of funds.

Proposed Fact-Finding Mission by AID Fiscal Expert

In response to a request from the Director of AID/Costa Rica for the temporary detail of an economist versed in fiscal matters to assist the mission in assessing the Costa Rican financial situation, AID/W is considering the sending of Mr. Frederic R. Fisher to San José.

ARA believes that the timing of sending an AID official to Costa Rica for the above purpose has political implications which merit serious study. In any event he should not proceed until the new administration takes over on May 8. 1) The Echandi Administration has about two months to go before transferring power. Echandi has not requested a loan. It is not clear whether his government intends to do so or intends to leave the deficit for the incoming Orlich Administration to handle. In either case the sudden appearance of the deficit will most certainly be fraught with politics. When the PLN assumes power they will naturally exploit the deficit problem bequeathed by the Echandi Administration, both for political purposes and in order to justify the necessary corrective measures. If a United States expert carries on extensive consultations with the Minister of Finance and the Central Bank the United States will find itself in the middle of a political fight. This might prejudice our desire to help the Costa Ricans work out a solution to the problem. 2) Even though Echandi applies for a loan no meaningful assessment of corrective measures could be considered with the present lame-duck administration. 3) It is not clear whether AID is prepared, in principle, to consider favorably a GOCR request of $5 to $20 million for a budgetary support loan.

Because of the political implications involved in Costa Rica's financial crisis and the undesirability of any action that could be intergrated by the Costa Ricans as a United States commitment to extend financial assistance at this time, ARA recommends that prior to Mr. Fisher's going to San José the Embassy and AID/Costa Rica be requested to transmit additional information on the problem available through their channels. From this data we should be able to make an adequate preliminary assessment of the situation and recommendations for United States action.

Robert F. Woodward
Assistant Secretary

76. Memorandum of conversation, April 24, between Foreign Minister-designate Oduber and Edwin M. Martin¹

April 24, 1962

SUBJECT

Economic Policies of Incoming Orlich Administration

PARTICIPANTS

Daniel Oduber Quirós, Foreign Minister-Designate of Costa Rica
Mr. Edwin M. Martin, Assistant Secretary of State
Mr. Arturo Morales-Carrión, Deputy Assistant Secretary
Mr. V.P. Randolph III, Officer in Charge, Costa Rican Affairs
Mr. Sacha Volman, U.S. member of Directorate of Institute of Political Education, San José, Costa Rica

SUMMARY

In an informal, get-acquainted meeting with Department officials, Oduber discussed (1) the budgetary crisis (2) his government's intention to institute reforms and (3) its policies toward education and Central American integration.

Mr. Oduber stated that Costa Rica's primary problem was its current budgetary crisis. Using a figure of 420 million colones for the 1961 budget, Oduber said that of this sum 180 million colones due in taxes had not been collected, and blamed the vested coffee and sugar-producing interests behind the outgoing Echandi Government for contributing to the budgetary shortfall by failing to pay their higher taxes imposed by the 1961 tax reform law. He noted also that import (and duties) had fallen as a result of the 1961 tariff increase enacted with the advice of the IMF.

Oduber declared that first priority in the new Orlich government is going to be tax reform; that the new government has already a reform program worked out (he did not elaborate on this program); and that it will be submitted at an early date to the Legislative Assembly in which the Orlich government has an "overwhelming" majority. Oduber declared that his government felt the United States should not loan or give any Latin American government a penny until needed internal reforms were carried out and mentioned that Costa Rica had already made a start in self-help measures. Oduber repeatedly pledged that his government would implement such reforms before it sought assistance from the United States. He mentioned that President-elect Orlich wished to visit the United States after his reform program was underway.

¹ Economic policies of incoming Orlich administration. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 818.13/4-2462.

Mr. Martin observed that it was difficult, if not impossible, for the Department of State to ask Congress for funds for budgetary support if the country in question had not collected the taxes due it, and emphasized internal fiscal reform as a requisite for financial assistance. Mr. Martin also stressed the U.S. reluctance to supply local currency costs in development projects, adding that local currency needs in special cases might be furnished during the transition period of local reform.

Oduber gave as his opinion that this transition period in Costa Rica might last as long as 10 years, but that the Orlich government would push immediately for internal reform, especially revision of the tax structure, despite the considerable internal opposition which is bound to develop.

Turning to economic matters of wider scope, Oduber said his government was fully committed to all forms of Central American integration, especially in the economic and educational fields. He noted that El Salvador was cooperating fully in Central American integration and Honduras to a lesser extent. Oduber said his "group" favors having price increases accruing from a World Coffee Agreement turned back to the government for it to help establish producers' cooperatives to break the big growers' control over the coffee industry. Oduber also referred to Costa Rica's shortage of properly-utilized land and stated that the Orlich Government's policy of "land reform" will be to encourage farmers to stay on the land by providing adequate rural education.

Oduber concluded by promising the full cooperation of the Orlich Government in working for the goals of the Alliance for Progress.

COMMENT

Not once during his 50 minutes with Mr. Martin did Oduber mention the name of José Figueres, leader of Oduber's (and Orlich's) Popular Liberation Party.

77. Memorandum of conversation, April 24, between Foreign Minister-designate Oduber and Edwin M. Martin¹

April 24, 1962

SUBJECT

Incoming Orlich Government's Attitude Toward Other Central American States

PARTICIPANTS

Daniel Oduber Quirós, Foreign Minister-Designate of Costa Rica
Mr. Edwin M. Martin, Assistant Secretary of State
Mr. Arturo Morales-Carrión—Deputy Assistant Secretary
Mr. V.P. Randolph III—Officer in Charge, Costa Rican Affairs
Mr. Sacha Volman—U.S. Member of Directorate of Institute of Political Education, San José, Costa Rica

SUMMARY

Oduber discussed the attitude of the incoming Orlich administration toward the Governments of Nicaragua and Guatemala and, in less detail Honduras and Panama. He also affirmed his government-to-be's opposition to Fidel Castro.

Following discussion of another topic, Mr. Oduber reviewed the attitude of the National Liberation Party toward the governments of the other Central American countries. He states that the new ORLICH Government is watching events very closely in Nicaragua, whose "Somoza tyranny is hated" by the National Liberation Party. Oduber admitted that the Orlich government considered President Luis more reasonable than General Anastasia SOMOZA but felt the scheduled 1963 elections would be a fraud since no honest electoral machinery, e.g. registrations, is not being established. Discussing Nicaraguan internal politics, Oduber saw the Somoza's main preoccupation as safeguarding their fortune. He stated that he thought conservative leader Fernando AGUERO would win it if an honest election were held today; that Foreign Minister René Schick, the Somoza candidate, would eventually withdraw, and that his (Oduber's) group favored the Independent Liberal Party leader Alejandro ICAZA over the other possible candidates. Oduber also voices his fear that violence and assassination would mar the Nicaraguan presidential campaign.

¹ Orlich government's attitude toward other Central American States. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 810.18/4-2762.

Oduber declared that the Orlich Government would like to see an OAS team in Nicaragua well before the elections to set up the conditions for honest balloting as well as to supervise the vote.

Oduber characterized the situation in Guatemala as “new, fresh, and more dangerous”. He indicated the Orlich government favored both ex-President Juan José AREVALO and opposition leader Mario MENDEZ Montenegro, but especially the latter whom Oduber described as strongest in the cities while Arevalo’s chief support comes from the countryside. Oduber added that he did not like the idea of British Honduras being “conquered” by Guatemala, and inquired if Jamaica was about to become fully independent with a seat in the UN and on the OAS. Oduber also expressed concern at governmental corruption in Honduras and “some sectors” in Panama.

Oduber mentioned that his government would take advantage of the May 8 inauguration ceremonies to consult with representatives of the other Central American states in an effort to guide the Nicaraguan situation toward a democratic solution. Oduber also emphasized his government’s determination to take the lead in rallying Central America against Castro.

78. Memorandum of conversation, April 30, between Figueres and Moscoso and other U.S. officials¹

April 30, 1962

SUBJECT

Costa Rican Fiscal Situation

PARTICIPANTS

Jose Figueres, ex-President of Costa Rica
Jaime Solera, Director-designate of the Central Bank of Costa Rica
Teodoro Moscoso, AID Administrator for Latin America
Edward Marasciulo, AID/LA/CAP
Eric Fisher, AID/LA/CAP

¹ Costa Rican financial situation and possibility of U.S. assistance to rectify it. Official Use Only. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 818.00/4-3062.

Joseph Carwell, Deputy Director ARA/REA
William Barnes, Deputy Director, ARA/OAP
Virgil Randolph, Officer in Charge, Costa Rican Affairs, ARA/OAP

The meeting was held at the request of Mr. Figueres to discuss the Costa Rican fiscal situation and the possibilities of U.S. assistance to rectify it. Mr. Moscoso mentioned at the outset that while the U.S. was concerned over the difficult financial situation faced by the incoming Orlich Government and desired to be as helpful as possible, under the existing AID legislation it was very largely limited to the financing of developmental projects. If the GOCR's fiscal difficulties could be remedied by assistance of this character, he said, the U.S. would be glad to consider it, assuming that the projects proposed for financing met the established criteria.

It was mentioned that an IMF Mission was due to arrive in San Jose in the middle of May after the new government had taken office, and that it would presumably be able to clarify the size and character of the budgetary deficit varying estimates of which had been received in Washington. Mr. Figueres said he placed the deficit at 200 million colones ($30 million dollars) while Mr. Solera put it at 177 million colones ($25 million dollars). In addition to the GOCR's fiscal problem, Mr. Figueres said there was need for an infusion of new funds into the Costa Rican banking system for relending to the private sector.

Mr. Moscoso inquired concerning the possibilities of the GOCR finding new sources of revenue through additional taxes and the improvement of tax collection methods. Mr. Solera said that tax increases and better collection methods would definitely be a part of the new administration's fiscal program. Mr. Figueres said that the existing economic depression in Costa Rica in which some 50,000 persons were unemployed and many firms were facing bankruptcy made him question the feasibility of raising taxes. While an effort would be made to do so, he was pessimistic about the results and thought that it would be a long time before a significant increase in revenue could be obtained. In answer to a question, Mr. Solera said that there were many possibilities for the reduction of GOCR expenditures during 1962 in order to lessen the fiscal deficit. Mr. Moscoso said that action in this respect, together with an increase in taxes, would be prerequisites for any help from AID.

Mr. Figueres attributed Costa Rica's difficulties to the decline in world prices of its principal exports of coffee, bananas, and cacao. He estimated that in relation to the export income obtained by Costa Rica in 1954 the country had lost some $30 million a year ever since because of price declines.² The only long-term solution, he said, was an increase in the prices of Costa Rica's chief export products and a diversification of export items. Mr. Moscoso referred to the report recently prepared by the OAS on the stabilization of export receipts and its proposals for an international agreement toward this end and asked that Mr. Figueres be given a copy.

Mr. Figueres maintained that Costa Rica had no significant problem of capital flight and that private funds on deposit abroad were small. He affirmed the intention of the new government to enter the Central American common market, thus reversing the non-participation policy of the Echandi Government.

Mr. Fisher asked how the reported shortfall in customs duties in 1961 was to be explained since imports in that year were only slightly under those in 1960. Mr. Solera said this was probably due to a change in the composition of 1961 imports but also mentioned that the pattern of imports had been disrupted by the September 1961 devaluation. This action had been debated in the Congress for three months, which gave importers an opportunity to make heavy purchases abroad in anticipation of duty increases. He conceded that duties might not yet have been paid on some of these extraordinary imports and that the shortfall in customs revenues estimated at the end of 1961 might thus not reflect the true situation.

Mr. Figueres estimated the current arrears in taxes at $5 million. Mr. Solera repeated that the new administration planned to undertake comprehensive tax reform measures and Mr. Moscoso recommended that the GOCR seek technical assistance from the OAS for this purpose.

Mr. Figueres referred to the problem of coordinating technical assistance in the economic and financial field since the IBRD, the IMF, and the OAS were all in the picture. Mr. Moscoso said that such coordination was the responsibility of the GOCR. Mr. Figueres said that the new government was thinking of contracting with a private firm to obtain advice on development planning, and Mr. Moscoso said that ² According to data of the Central Bank of Costa Rica furnished to the IBRD, Costa Rica suffered no appreciable absolute loss in export income in the period since 1954. The value of exports was $84.7 million in 1954, 80.9 in 1955, 67.5 in 1956, 83.4 in 1957, 91.9 in 1958, 76.7 in 1959, and 88.5 in 1960. However, the volume of coffee exports doubled between 1954, when they amounted to 510,000 quintals (46 kilos each), and the years 1958–60, inclusive, when they were at the annual level of 1 million quintals. At the same time, because of the decline in world coffee prices, the value of such exports increased only from $35.8 million in 1954 to $43.4 million in 1960. Had 1954 prices prevailed in the period 1958–60 Costa Rica would have earned some $70 million in each of these years from such exports whereas their actual value averaged only $45 million annually. In the case of bananas, the decline in prices was accompanied by a substantial reduction in export volume, both of which contributed to the drop in export value from $35.8 million in 1954 to $25 million in 1960.

AID funds were available for this purpose. Mr. Marasciulo said that AID would welcome the receipt from the GOCR of an overall proposal for U.S. assistance, which should be submitted through the USAID/San Jose. He pointed out that Costa Rica was almost the only country in Central America without a development planning office. Mr. Figueres said that some work had been done in this field by the University of Costa Rica and by planners associated with the PLN. He thought that a short-term plan could be prepared for consideration by AID within two or three months.

A discussion then ensued on Costa Rica's external debt service problem. According to Mr. Solera, the total external debt, including that of both the GOCR proper and the autonomous institutions totaled $57 million, and the service charges on it in 1962 would amount to 16.5 per cent of total export income. Because the GOCR was short of colones to buy foreign exchange, service on the external debt had been halted, although the country's reserves, (now at the level of 20.8 million dollars,) were sufficient to maintain service payments. Mr. Solera anticipated, however, that the GOCR must reach an agreement with the Export-Import Bank for the refinancing of the unpaid balances of its loans from that institution totaling some $18 million. Present repayment schedules called for $2.5 million in service and amortization on these loans in 1962, which was considered too burdensome. The same problem did not exist with respect to the IBRD loans which had been made to the Central Bank. The IBRD had also made a loan of $8.8 million to the Instituto Costarricense de Electricidad for power development, payments on which would not start until 1964. The ICE had requested another loan of $15 million but because of the current situation of default the IBRD was holding this application in abeyance. Both Mr. Figueres and Mr. Solera recognized the psychological value of the GOCR resuming service payments on its external debt as soon as possible.

In response to a question from Mr. Barnes, Mr. Figueres elaborated on his proposal that U.S. funds be made available to the Costa Rican banking system for relending to the private sector. He said that the four nationalized banks, which together had some 200 branches throughout the country provided a perfect mechanism for channeling funds to productive enterprise and stimulating economic development. Costa Rica, he said, had many able entrepreneurs but there was a dearth of capital for medium and long-term lending, and this situation had placed a brake on economic development in view of the drastic decline in export income. He estimated that an injection of $20 million into the economy through a line of credit to the banking system to be utilized over a period of 3 to 5 years would give such an impulse to productive economic activity that unemployment would be eliminated completely. Mr. Figueres said that ground rules could be developed for the extension of such a line of credit to assure that it would be used only for agreed purposes contributing to economic development. He suggested that tax collections could be improved by making loans to private entrepreneurs contingent upon prior payment of tax arrears. Interest rates would be moderate, not exceeding the current level of 8 per cent.

Mr. Moscoso pointed out that AID development lending was being directed primarily to support individual projects and expressed doubt that Congress would go along with the idea of a general loan to a national banking system for relending to private enterprise.

At the close of the meeting it was agreed that the incoming government should work through the Embassy and USAID mission in Costa Rica in preparing economic and fiscal proposals which it desired to have considered by the U.S. Government.

79. Letter from Telles to Edwin M. Martin, May 31¹

San Jose, May 31, 1962

Dear Ed:

The end of my first year in San José has happened to coincide with the end of the Echandi Administration and in consequence stimulated my Country Team and me to make a review and general assessment of our standing and achievements here, which has been rather sobering.

In essence it has shown that the greatest obstacle with which we have had to deal in the pursuit of our objectives has been the failure of the Department of State to act positively on our recommendations, in consequence of what has impressed us as an almost automatically negative attitude by the Department towards our suggestions, though possibly the Embassy's failure to adequately and forcefully present our recommendations has also played a role. In support of our analysis, we have compiled a balance sheet, noting the principal recommendations made by the Embassy and Country Team over the course of the past year, and the response of the Department in each case. (To twenty-five proposals made by the Embassy, the Department's response was negative thirteen times, the Embassy received no reply or replies so late as to destroy the effect of the proposal eight times, and affirmative exactly four times.) Since this is all water over the dam, and since this all happened prior to your taking office, I will not burden you with a copy of this information now. However, if you so desire it, I will be more than glad to send it to you.

¹ End of year assessment: DOS failure to act on Embassy recommendations and lack of confidence Department has shown in Embassy; Orlich visit to Washington; Costa Rican fiscal and budgetary problem; U.S. policy in dealing with Figueres. Confidential. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 611.18/5-3162.

As a result, the outgoing Echandi Administration made an effort to by-pass the Embassy with many of its requests. In turn this made it difficult, in some instances, to obtain their cooperation to our urging for actions and policy which we wanted but which they found inconvenient or untimely. Fortunately, I was able to get close to both former President Echandi and his Foreign Minister on a personal and friendly basis and we were able to obtain necessary results in this manner. On several occasions, as I found it necessary, I made certain action-decisions and assumed all responsibility. This was particularly true during the recent presidential campaign in Costa Rica. In the final analysis what counts is results. We had a free, peaceful, honest and most democratic election, and today we have in Costa Rica probably the most stable government and ideal democratic country in Latin America. Presumptuously, we here in the Embassy would like to feel that we contributed a little through our activities to the outcome and favorable results.

I know that my experience has not been particularly novel (Echandi was already thoroughly soured on what support he could expect from the Embassy before I arrived in Costa Rica), and my purpose in writing you now on this subject is not simply "to kick a dead horse" or to demand any retribution. However, I am asking in all sincerity for a change in attitude in the Department to coincide with the change of administration which has just taken place here in Costa Rica. President Orlich has assured me on various occasions both before his inauguration and since he has been in power that he will seek out my counsel and the assistance of my people on projects on which he desires U.S. Government aid, and that he will not by-pass the Embassy on these matters. He has already gone out of his way on at least one occasion to confirm this declared policy in deed. Many of the avowed objectives of the Orlich Government will represent changes in GOCR policies that bring Costa Rica directly into line with aims which the U.S. has been seeking here for a year and sometimes more, and I have the highest hopes that by cementing our relations with Orlich and his ministers at the start I will be able to make myself and my staff here of infinitely greater value to the U.S. and to the Department than was ever possible under the previous Costa Rican Government in consequence of Echandi's regrettable experience. To be successful, however, I must have confidence that the people in the Department who are directly interested will listen to our views and our recommendations, and that in the case of the latter, that they will try to see how these recommendations can be carried out rather than responding automatically with reasons why they can not.

Specifically, there are three immediate issues which face us on which our stock could very well rise or fall for the remainder of this administration:

1) An Orlich visit to Washington and to President Kennedy during calendar year 1962—In response to Orlich's known desire and even intent to come to the U.S. "for talks with President Kennedy and other high officials" we have proposed such a visit, received the usual negative response, modified our initial request to permit a less formal type of visit, and are still awaiting a reply. Meanwhile, Orlich as a President-Elect got red carpet treatment from the Chief of State or at least Foreign Minister of every country he visited in Europe and the Near East from Queen Elizabeth to Prime Minister Ben Gurion, which made a profound vivid impression on him, and against which he will certainly weigh our ultimate response. Orlich takes for granted that we will make the necessary arrangements and has indicated in a personal letter to President Kennedy that he plans a trip to the U.S. in the near future.

How the Department can arrange this visit, what category of presidential visitor Mr. Orlich should be are implementing details which the Department can arrange more wisely and appropriately than we. However, I cannot urge too strongly that the Department find a way to respond favorably to this first major request of Mr. Orlich.

2) From all indications, the Costa Rican Government is faced with a difficult and serious fiscal and budgetary problem. The IMF representatives have been here and conducted their limited study of the situation. We were not provided with a copy of the IMF report. The Embassy is now studying the data made available through the local Government, and holding conferences with the Costa Rican officials in order to realistically determine as closely as possible the problem and possible solution for recommendation to Washington. We have consistently for several months recommended to the Department three things. First of all, the determination of the exact fiscal problem by capable technicians. Second, the study of the tax structure and laws by qualified technicians and last, qualified technical help on the budgetary matter. This is all well in line with the Alliance for Progress, and in order that an adequate economic plan may be developed. According to the information provided by IMF to the Government here, the IMF people have made similar recommendations. We have very carefully analyzed the report provided to the Costa Rican Government by IMF on the fiscal situation. I might add that while the study made may well serve the IMF purpose,

I am not satisfied with the limited information provided towards determining the exact fiscal condition.

We will soon submit our thinking and recommendations to the Department on the fiscal problem as well as our request for immediate technical assistance on the tax and budget matters. We will need and will greatly appreciate your assistance and support as this is a problem of great concern to President Orlich and his Government, and I strongly feel that it is a matter which we should also consider important towards maintaining a stable situation here through the improvement of both their poor fiscal condition and economic progress.

3) U.S. policy in dealing with Figueres—It seems paradoxical that the spectre of U.S. high level attitudes towards Figueres should constitute a problem now that his party is in power, but we strongly suspect that such will be the case. As you certainly are aware, probably the most important single factor in queering the Embassy's relations with former President Echandi (at least during the past year) was the adulation and special treatment publicly accorded his arch enemy Figueres on every possible occasion by prominent members of the Kennedy Administration, including the President himself. I and my staff did everything possible to make clear to the Department the regrettable effects of this policy on our relations with the GOCR, but to no avail.

In assuming the presidency Mr. Orlich has been emphatic in his rejection of local gossip to the effect that he is a puppet of Figueres who will in fact run Costa Rica. Both I and the members of my staff believe that the next few months may well see the development of a significant split within the Liberación Party between the comparatively middle-of-the-road progressive thinking of Orlich and the demagogic, social-welfare-regardless-of-cost "liberalism" of Figueres. There is currently little question in our minds that strong U.S. backing of Orlich in such an event will represent the soundest policy for the U.S. Hence I urgently recommend as a matter of basic U.S. policy that the personal regard in which prominent members of the current Administration in Washington hold Figueres as a "hemisphere leader" not be permitted to upset our relations with the new President and Government of Costa Rica as it did with the last. I can offer no specific operational guidance for the present except to request that urgent recommendations from the Embassy on this subject in the future be given sympathetic consideration at the top level.

In conclusion I should like to say in a spirit of respect but of heartfelt sincerity that I believe it imperative that the Department should have more confidence in the experience and judgment of the Ambassadors and experienced career officers in the field if we are going to move ahead and meet the many challenges we face in these countries. Frankly, my first year's experience in San José has led me to question the need for an Ambassador or senior officers if all we are to do is to carry out judgments and decisions made in Washington without regard for our carefully considered opinions. I believe that despite its small size and lack of certain elements of power, Costa Rica, and the freely given support of successive governments of Costa Rica in international questions, are more important to the U.S. than some of our leaders appear to recognize, and I fear greatly that our Government's current attitude for taking Costa Rica for granted in the absence of dramatic problems of the sort we face elsewhere in the hemisphere may ultimately lead to the generation of these very problems in our relations here, when through a little inexpensive positivism on our part towards Costa Rica we could so easily avoid them altogether.

I believe firmly that the time and the situation are ripe for Costa Rica to become a shining example of the reward to be achieved from close cooperation with the U.S. under the Alianza para Progreso, in dramatic contrast to the restrictions and actual want which are being even more clearly demonstrated in Cuba as the result of dependence on the communist system and the Soviet Bloc.

With best personal regards,
Sincerely,

Raymond Telles
*Ambassador of the United States
of America*

80. Airgram A-191 from San Jose, June 4¹

San Jose, June 4, 1962

REF: Embassy's Despatches 582, May 18, 1962 and 585, May 23, 1962.

President ORLICH again called me to meet privately with him and Minister of Economy HESS May 29 for the purpose of impressing upon me his sincere concern over the seriousness of Costa Rica's current financial crisis, and to emphasize in strongest terms his hope for US assistance.

¹ Meeting between President Orlich and Minister of Economy Hess and Ambassador Telles on seriousness of Costa Rica's current financial crisis and President's hope for U.S. assistance. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 818.00/6-362.

Finance Minister Hess made available to me at my request a copy of the preliminary report of the IMF team, together with his own analysis of the budgetary deficit and an outline and initial justification of planned Costa Rican measures to overcome it. The Embassy's first reaction to both of these documents is one of disappointment; towards the IMF report because of its failure to explain the basis on which the team calculated that outside assistance should not exceed $5 million, and because it did not include a basis for assessing Costa Rica's actual needs; and towards the proposals of Minister Hess since a cursory study of these proposals and request for $15 million of US assistance makes apparent the Minister's heavy reliance on US aid, while it appears to us that possibly additional revenue producing measures could be considered, even though unpopular, to reduce their outside requirement.

My staff and I are giving urgent study to these reports on their immediate requirement, and will endeavor to obtain more and more basic information from Hess. I have made no commitment of any sort to Orlich or Hess. I also consider that finding a speedy but long-term solution to Costa Rica's budgetary difficulties is of such vital importance to successful Costa Rican participation in the Alliance for Progress that we plan to obtain under AID contract US experts in the tax and budget fields to help the GOCR to bring their expenditures and resources into realistic balance. Orlich and Hess have both requested this type of assistance.

As soon as my staff and I have obtained sufficient information to come to a satisfying conclusion on the extent of the Costa Rican need for US assistance I shall forward to the Department our considered recommendations which from current indications, including the IMF findings, may well involve budget support for the GOCR, in which case I will add our conclusions as to a proper amount and a preferred means of making such assistance available.

Telles

81. Airgram A-46 from San Jose, July 23¹

San Jose, July 23, 1962

SUBJECT: Country Team Recommendation for Fiscal Assistance to GOCR. JOINT EMBASSY/USAID.

SUMMARY

The Ambassador and the Country Team have carefully studied the GOCR's request for U.S. financial assistance to help the new Government meet the fiscal deficit which it inherited on coming to power. We are convinced on the basis of such incontrovertible indications as shortfalls already evident in current income statements, delays on development projects, and the 40% discount prevailing on Government bonds in the local market, as well as from the IMF report and the GOCR's statements and analyses, that Costa Rica faces an exceedingly difficult fiscal situation, but that the new government has already shown a sincere determination to invoke politically undesirable but necessary measures to meet its problem and that with some emergency help from outside the GOCR will be able both to face up to the 1962 deficit and to operate on a sound fiscal basis in 1963. The Ambassador and the Country Team agree that if no financial help from the U.S. is forthcoming the political effects will be both serious and widespread in terms of U.S. objectives and interests not only in Costa Rica but possibly in other Latin American countries. Most important the Alliance for Progress will be slowed down in Costa Rica owing to the inability of the GOCR to provide its required share of development projects. Therefore, the Ambassador and the Country Team are fully agreed that there are cogent political and political-economic reasons to justify prompt U.S. assistance to Costa Rica on an emergency basis. We recommend that grant or loans, or a combination of both, be furnished to Costa Rica in the amount of $10 million to be applied to a specific series of development projects to be selected from the 1962 and 1963 budgets, and that in addition the Department use its good offices to the utmost in supporting a Costa Rican request to re-negotiate its outstanding loans with the Export-Import Bank. END SUMMARY

I. The Budget Problem and the Government's Need for Assistance

The new Government of Costa Rica currently faces a fiscal deficit of such proportions that it has felt impelled to ask U.S. assistance to supplement its own efforts to alleviate the problem. The present situation is a culmination of developments that go back a period of several years, during which time government revenues have not kept pace with expenditures.

¹ Country Team recommendation for fiscal assistance to GOCR. Official Use Only. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 818.10/7-2362.

Since 1956 government expenditures have increased at a rate of nearly 7 percent per year, while actual revenues during the same period have increased at an average annual rate of only 4.5 percent. Between 1960 and 1961 they actually declined by almost 9 percent, largely because of decreased revenues from import duties, which normally account for about two-thirds of government revenue. Largely through resort to the public credit (unpaid bills, treasury letters, and bond issues), the government has managed in the past to cover its deficits, but at the price of a cumulative stretching of such credit. A point has now been reached where it is apparent that the existing revenue structure will not support a politically suitable level of expenditures unless the government can obtain additional funds from other sources.

There has been much partisan argument among the Costa Ricans regarding who is to blame for the present state of affairs, but the basic figures making up the record of the situation, from a quantitative standpoint, have not been the subject of dispute. The issue has been a matter of interpretation, with disagreement centering on the question of how serious a problem the figures show.

The GOCR now estimates its fiscal problem at $163 million. To cover this deficit it proposes to increase domestic receipts and reduce expenditures resulting in a saving of $73.7 million, to renegotiate the Government's debt to the Social Security Institute in the amount of $23, and to seek external assistance to cover the remaining $66.3 million. (Enclosure No. 1) At the time of his inauguration (May 8, 1962) President ORLICH believed that $20 million in external assistance would be necessary. Following several discussions with the Ambassador, the amount requested was scaled down to $10 million, the GOCR in the meantime having moved toward further domestic measures to reduce the size of the budget deficit.

In reviewing the GCR's fiscal situation a number of facts stand out quite clearly. These facts cannot be obscured by arguments premised upon the obvious difficulty of determining the size of the anticipated 1962 budgetary deficit or by arguments over such terms as "treasury deficits".

1. The straightened circumstances of the GCR's finances are evidenced when income received as of June 30, 1962 is compared to income estimated for the entire year. The total regular budget income was estimated at $422 million of which approximately $183 million had been received by June 30, 1962. The major short fall is in customs revenues where of an expected total of $249 million only $79.4 million had been paid. The Ministry of Finance does not expect the year end total to pass $180 to $190 millions. Income tax payments have reached $37.5 million of a total estimated $41 million. The emergency character of this problem is evidenced by the GOCCR's determination to produce and live up to a balanced fiscal situation in 1963 (see Enclosure No. 2).

2. It is a fact that the GCR is having a difficult time in meeting its payrolls. Little or no funds are available for the provision of supplies for hospitals, prisons, extension service, etc. The $5 million loan from the Continental Illinois Bank is to be utilized in large part to service external and internal debt and a small part also to pay for the government's running expenses. The next four months make up a period of low income flow and will present a period of definite budgetary crisis;

3. Lack of local funds are paralyzing work on development projects which fall within the Alliance for Progress category. These include the highway development, the school construction, the low cost housing and water supply improvement projects. This is particularly serious as there is genuine interest on the GCR's part to implement a dynamic Alliance program;

4. The budget deficit problem has been growing in severity over the past six years. The Central Bank gives the following figures as being the adjusted deficit or surplus:

1957	(-C 20.5)
1958	(-C 18.3)
1959	(-C 32.9)
1960	(-C 29.2)
1961	(-C 91.2)
1962 estimated	(-C108)

The new government has inherited an admittedly bad fiscal situation and appears to be taking determined steps to eliminate the same.

5. The GCR's credit has sunk to a new low. Bonds are selling at a 40% discount making new issues virtually unmarketable which makes for extremely expensive financing.

6. A large proportion of the GCR's budgetary expenditures go toward meeting payrolls, but if it should resort to wholesale dismissals it would be legally liable for such a large amount of severance payments that the budget situation would be aggravated rather than improved.

7. Given these conditions, the new government will not let its development program go by the board in its totality. The interest in the Alliance for Progress has not diminished. If external development assistance for local currency use is not forthcoming, it is most likely that the GCR will resort to the issuance of colon notes to cover its operations.

The situation in brief seems to indicate that the GCR has little more than funds with which to meet payrolls. Government offices and official institutions are short of all types of supplies and operating necessities.

[Here follow seven pages of Part II, "Self Help Efforts Being taken by the GOCCR to Meet its Fiscal Problem."]

82. Memorandum of conversation, August 13, among Ambassador Facio, former Ambassador Esquivel and Edwin
M. Martin¹

August 13, 1962

SUBJECT

Costa Rican Budget Problem

PARTICIPANTS

His Excellency Gonzalo Facio, Ambassador of Costa Rica

His Excellency Mario Esquivel, former Costa Rican Ambassador to the United States and a former Foreign Minister

ARA—Assistant Secretary Edwin M. Martin

CAP—Mr. John W. Fisher, Deputy Director

Budget Problem

Mr. Esquivel, former Costa Rican Ambassador to the United States and a former Foreign Minister, said that he is now a private citizen of his country, and as such he would like to give Mr. Martin his views on the budgetary situation there. While he left the Administration political party (PIN) several years ago, he is in contact with leaders, and Costa Rican President Orlich knew about and approved his coming to Mr. Martin about the fiscal situation.

Mr. Esquivel said the present Administration inherited a serious budget deficit from the outgoing Government in May of this year. He said the deficit was not the result of dishonesty, which the Costa Ricans do not tolerate in Government, but of some irresponsible fiscal management, together with a variety of economic reasons. In the event Costa Rica is unable to obtain the emergency help needed from the United States, it will have to resort to dangerous inflationary internal credit operations to stave off bankruptcy.

Mr. Esquivel said he understood that the American Embassy had forwarded to Washington a memorandum on the Government's budgetary difficulties, and he hoped that the Department would be able to act promptly on the Costa Rican request.

¹ Serious budget deficit in Costa Rica; coffee conference in New York. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 718.00/8-662.

Mr. Martin said the Department had received the Embassy's report on the budgetary problem. It seemed to reflect a few suggestions which he had offered during his recent visit to Costa Rica. He said the Department was giving intense study to the Costa Rican budget matter. Mr. Fisher added that several experts are working out the best means of reaching early decisions on the issues raised. He said the Department and AID may seek certain additional information from our Embassy.

Mr. Esquivel dwelt on the success of Costa Rica in maintaining itself as a democratic stable Republic, and said failure to meet this fiscal emergency would be a step backward. He wondered whether he should feel optimistic about the prospects of help. Mr. Martin said he should probably be somewhat optimistic, and said he hoped that the Department would be in a position to give definite answers in the near future.

Coffee

Mr. Esquivel and Ambassador Facio said that the news from the Coffee Conference in New York was not encouraging except for the fact of the strong position which the United States was taking. They thought that much of the difficulty came from lack of agreement among the producers themselves, and from the practice of giving undue representation to the coffee industry on the national delegations. The businessman was certainly entitled to have his interests considered, but the decisions must be taken and negotiations carried out by Government representatives if the larger interests at stake are to be protected.

Mr. Esquivel said a difficult problem for the high quality coffee producers is their inability to segregate their product from the low quality coffee of Brazil, whose big crop depresses the market. He thought the U.S. Food and Drug Administration should have jurisdiction over coffee imports and would surely exclude large quantities of inferior Brazilian coffee if it did. Central American and other high quality producers should find ways to keep their fine grades from disappearing in soluble coffee products where quality differentiation is hard to detect.

83. Memorandum of conversation, August 13, between Ambassador Facio and John W. Fischer¹

August 13, 1962

SUBJECT

Costa Rican Budgetary Problem

PARTICIPANTS

His Excellency Gonzalo J. Facio, Ambassador of Costa Rica
Mr. John W. Fisher, Deputy Director, Office of Central American and Panamanian Affairs

I explained to Ambassador Facio that I wanted to continue the conversation on the Costa Rican budgetary situation which we had started on August 10 at a reception but had been unable to continue because of interruptions.

The Ambassador said he much regretted that a misunderstanding had arisen which had resulted in Ambassador Telles' calling Mr. Martin from San José on August 10. On August 9 during a luncheon meeting which Ambassador Facio had with officials of the IMF and Mr. Oliver Sause of AID, the latter had remarked that he had seen no official request from the Costa Rican Government for emergency fiscal help, but only a communication from our Embassy at San José on the subject. Ambassador Facio mentioned this in a telephone call to his Minister in San José, where it unfortunately got somewhat out of context before it reached Ambassador Telles.

I said the Embassy's communication was sufficient evidence of Costa Rica's request for help and that the lack of a formal piece of paper from the Costa Rican Government has not stopped us from giving the problem serious and urgent consideration. I said we are studying ways in which Costa Rica's problem can best be approached. We have now asked our Embassy for information expanding and elaborating on that in the report of which the Ambassador spoke. Among other things, we need more details about the development projects in the current Costa Rican budget which have been suggested as possibilities for AID loans. At the same time, we are taking great interest in the measures which Costa Rica is taking to correct its fiscal situation once the current emergency is overcome.

Ambassador Facio said that the Finance Committee in the Costa Rican Congress has already approved several of the measures introduced to improve tax revenues, and passage by the Congress is virtually assured. These measures include a requirement to deposit disputed taxes, pending litigation; establishment of a full-time tax tribunal in lieu of two part-time bodies; and the placing of tax collections on a current pay-as-you-go basis. He expects a bill will be passed to establish a revenue office to tighten up on tax collections, an exceedingly important part of the problem. He said he personally is anxious to see taxes collected from large numbers of people who now pay none, although well able to do so. He said Costa Rica is taking steps to withhold taxes from salary earners, starting with Government employees. I said it would be helpful to have up-to-date, realistic estimates of the effects of these and similar measures as they approach actuality.

¹ Costa Rican budgetary problem. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 818.00/8-1362.

Ambassador Facio said some of the earlier estimates on the budget situation assumed adoption of various tax reforms around May; it is now August and they are still not in effect, obviously reducing the amounts which can be realized from the reforms this year.

Ambassador Facio said he has inquired at the Eximbank about postponement of Costa Rica's loan repayment schedules, but he got no encouragement. He said the annual amount involved is around $2.5 million. If all payments could be postponed until 1964 and if the emergency help needed now is forthcoming, the Government would be able to get back on its feet after next year, with a budget deficit it could manage on its own.

Ambassador Facio said it is not correct to say that the Administration does not have central control of the budget. As a former Minister of Economy, he can testify that the Minister has the duty of making the other Ministers conform to the budget plan. He said Minister Hess is a strong personality, quite capable of exercising the discipline needed.

Ambassador Facio wondered whether Minister Hess should come to Washington in the near future to furnish information on the situation. I said that we have already asked our Embassy for the information needed at this juncture and I would recommend that the Minister not come now.

Referring to the IMF report on Costa Rica, Ambassador Facio said he disagreed with its recommendation to augment Government revenues by increasing tariff duties on non-essential imports. He said Costa Rica has already cut down imports considerably, with the result that its balance of payments situation is good, but its Government revenue picture is bad because import duties are the principal source of revenue. Increases in import duties now would further reduce imports and total Government revenues.

Ambassador Facio said he felt reassured to hear again that we are working on the Costa Rican fiscal problem. He said he would try to bring back as much information as possible when he returns on August 18. He is departing for Costa Rica on August 13.

84. Memorandum of conversation, September 13, among Edwin M. Martin, Ambassador Facio, and other Costa Rican and U.S. officials¹

September 13, 1962

SUBJECT

U.S. Assistance in Costa Rican Budget Crisis

PARTICIPANTS

Edwin M. Martin—Assistant Secretary ARA

Gonzalo Facio—Costa Rican Ambassador to the United States

Jaime Solera—Former Board Chairman, Central Bank of Costa Rica, and Financial Adviser to President Orlich

John W. Fisher—Deputy Director—CAP

Oliver L. Sause—Director LA/CAP

V.P. Randolph III—OIC Costa Rican Affairs

Mr. Solera remarked that President Orlich had asked him to come to Washington to bring the answers to a questionnaire on the Costa Rican fiscal situation submitted to Ambassador Facio by the Department and to be of whatever help he could in the discussions on the GOCR request for U.S. financial assistance. Mr. Solera said he realized that any sort of U.S. aid, if extended, would come too late to be of much assistance to the GOCR in the remainder of 1962 but that he felt the GOCR could probably get through the rest of the year without external help, provided the GOCR could receive assurance of U.S. financial help in 1963. He said the situation was serious; he noted the September 12 suspension Central Bank cashing of GOCR employees' checks for lack of ready cash; and he emphasized that the GOCR needed an answer one way or another very shortly in order to know where it stood and make plans accordingly. He said he could remain in Washington until September 20, when he had to return to San José.

Mr. Martin replied that he was fully aware of the problem; that he appreciated the need for a rapid decision by the Department; and that he was encouraged by the report he had received of progress made at Mr. Solera's meeting September 12 with Messrs. Fisher and Sause. He said the Department would try to make a decision before Mr. Solera left Washington.

Mr. Solera expressed his gratification at this. He stated that the day before it had been suggested that U.S. assistance to the private sector of the economy would improve Costa Rica's reserve position and thereby be of indirect assistance in the current budget crisis. Mr. Solera said he felt this would not be attacking the immediate problem of budget deficit but would be nonetheless helpful. Mr. Sause observed that one way for the U.S. to help would be expansion of the present agricultural credit loan. Mr. Solera mentioned that it had been suggested that the United States might consider assuming the costs of certain development projects identified in the 1963 budget. Mr. Solera said all these measures would be helpful to the GOCR.

¹ U.S. assistance in Costa Rican budget crisis. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 811.10/9-1362.

Mr. Martin said that he could make no commitment at this time but that he thought all these suggestions could be usefully pursued. He inquired as to the progress of the GOCR's own self-help measures, especially in the field of taxation. Mr. Solera and Ambassador Facio assured Mr. Martin that the GOCR legislative reform program was going well, with all its measures either already or about to be passed. Mr. Solera stated that many additional economic and fiscal reform measures, some quite unpopular, would be undertaken by the National Liberation Party. He added that if Costa Rica did not receive any external assistance in its budget crisis the GOCR would be forced to adopt drastic "unorthodox" financial measures, including discouraging imports through prohibitive duties, which would make Costa Rican participation in Central American integration quite difficult indeed. Mr. Martin inquired concerning general business conditions in Costa Rica. Mr. Solera replied that they were better now than in 1961 and that although the business community had confidence in the Orlich Government, failure to resolve the budget crisis was having a disquieting effect on the country's economy. Before taking leave of Mr. Martin, Mr. Solera said that the GOCR urgently needed a period of grace in repaying its Export-Import Bank loans and asked Mr. Martin if he could help arrange this. Mr. Martin said he was not informed on the legal aspects of such an operation, but he would see what he could do about it. He agreed that delay in the Exim bank repayments would be a desirable part of a package arrangement for U.S. help in the GOCR budget crisis.

85. Circular Airgram CA-6669, December 19¹

December 19, 1962

TO: The AmEmbassy, San Jose. INFO: POLAD CINCARIB.

SUBJECT: COSTA RICA—Plan of Action for Period from Present to October 1963.

The Latin American Policy Committee recently approved the enclosed Plan of Action for Costa Rica for the guidance of all agencies concerned with United States policy toward Costa Rica.

Rusk

EnclosureCOSTA RICA—Plan of Action for Period from Present to October 1963I. *OBJECTIVES*A. Political

1. Continuance of an independent, stable, anti-Communist and western oriented Costa Rican Government which will continue both to implement a broad program of social and economic reform under the Alliance for Progress and support United States objectives in international and particularly in Latin American organizations.

B. Economic

1. Evolution of an economy less heavily dependent upon the export of coffee and bananas, through industrial development and crop diversification, but at the [illegible in the original] the creation of high-cost industries and the growing of [illegible in the original] is in crops under the protection of tariffs and subsidies inspired by economic nationalism.

2. Development of an economy directed to the maximum extent possible toward insuring political stability and satisfying the basic social needs of the rapidly expanding population, without, however, committing the Costa Rican economy to indebtedness or obligations beyond its capacity to support.

3. Conservative participation by Government and private enterprise in the Central American Common Market.

¹ Approved Plan of Action toward Costa Rica from December 1962 to October 1963. Secret. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 611.18/12-1962.

C. Military

1. Development and maintenance of an internal security organization looking to the United States for [illegible in the original] training and material support as they are unable to provide themselves and which is capable of defending Costa Rican territory against limited attacks, maintaining security against action by subversive elements and possessed of a self-sufficient intelligence and counter-intelligence and ability.

II. PLANS OF ACTION

A. Political

1. Take advantage of every appropriate opportunity to identify the United States with moderate liberal aspirations for social and economic progress in Costa Rica, with the caveat that United States representatives should be alert to the dangers of becoming identified with specific political groups or movements. In this connection the Department has recommended to the White House that President Orlich be invited to visit the United States early in 1963 as a Presidential Guest.

2. Encourage the GOCR to refrain from interfering in the internal affairs of its neighbors by asserting effective control over those elements supporting dictatorships of either the right or left who in the past have abused the haven granted by Costa Rica to promote revolutions and guerrilla incursions into neighboring countries, especially Nicaragua.

3. Encourage and assist, as appropriate, the free trade union movement in Costa Rica in raising the level of its leadership, expanding skill training programs and eliminating Communist control of labor unions, especially among the banana workers.

4. Encourage Costa Rica to play a constructive role in the development of regional institutions in Central America, bearing in mind the Costa Rican desire to [illegible in the original] independently its influence in Latin America.

B. Economic and Social

1. Assist the GOCR in consolidating its fiscal and budgetary position so that a sound basis may be provided for long-range development planning. However, in view of the fact that the GOCR for the time being has virtually reached its capacity to absorb additional loans, new loan proposals for expansion or development of the public sector of the Costa Rican economy should be carefully weighed to prevent the GOCR from incurring indebtedness beyond its capacity to repay.

2. Assist the GOCR in improving public administration, especially in the fields of tax administration, budget procedures and economic planning, in order that Costa Rica can expedite its reform and development programs.

3. Give greater emphasis to diversification of the Costa Rican economy, attraction of private capital in diversified industries and assistance to the GOCR in establishing a central planning office in accordance with its commitment at Punta del Este to develop and implement a comprehensive national economic development program. This program should include agricultural diversification, with emphasis on livestock quality improvement.

4. Improve land use and land tenure in Costa Rica by (1) demonstrating methods of diversifying agricultural production (2) providing scientific agricultural training and (3) making funds available to assist farmers in obtaining medium and long-term credits for the purchase of land and agricultural equipment.

5. Concentrate the USAID educational program on training skilled and professional workers.

6. Cooperate with the GOCR and other governments in efforts to stabilize their principal exports of commodities such as coffee and bananas.

7. Encourage the development of an investment climate which will stimulate local and foreign responsible private investment in the economic development of Costa Rica.

8. Provide advice and assistance to the GOCR and to private organizations to plan jointly with the governments and private organizations of other Central American countries the adjustments of the Costa Rican economy to the demands of the Central American Common Market, so as to add to its effectiveness and to promote economic development of a regional nature.

C. Psychological

1. Convince Costa Rican political, intellectual and financial leaders that it is in their national and individual interest to participate in and promote the Alliance for Progress.

2. Promote the programs of the Alliance for Progress in Costa Rica, especially those involving civic action.

3. Convince the Costa Rican students, educators and labor leaders of the subversive influence of Castro-communism in their community of interest.

4. Encourage the active participation of the Costa Rican Government in regional organizations which will advance the economic and social development of the nation; i.e., Organization of Central American States, Central American Common Market and the Superior Council of Universities of Central America.

D. Internal Defense

1. To assist the GOCR to maintain public order and internal security in all parts of the country:

a. make available to the public forces, on a grant basis if required, minimum military and police equipment, and necessary training.

b. provide advice and training to the public forces on civic action and counterinsurgency techniques.

2. Urge the GOOCR to increase the capabilities of the public forces to carry out its internal security functions, with emphasis on mobility, intelligence and counterinsurgency.

3. Encourage the GOOCR to employ the Civil Guard, as practicable, on projects contributing to economic and social development.

4. Encourage the GOOCR to continue its representation on the Inter-American Defense Board.

86. Memorandum of conversation among President Kennedy, President Orlich, and other U.S. and Costa Rican officials¹

San Jose, March 20, 1963, 8:45 a.m.

SUBJECT

Requests for U.S. Aid: Project Financing, National Industrial Corporation, Education, Health and Fiscal Problems

PARTICIPANTS

United States
The President
The Secretary
Assistant Secretary Martin
Ambassador Telles
Mr. Moscoso

Costa Rica
The President
Second Vice President Carlos
Saenz Herrera
Dr. Rodrigo Loria Cortez
Dr. Roberto Ortiz Brenes
Mrs. Marta Martinez de Montis
President's Four Year Old Son

President Orlich was accompanied by the Second Vice President of Costa Rica, Dr. Carlos Saenz Herrera, Dr. Rodrigo Laria Cortez, Dr. Roberto Ortiz Brenes, Mrs. Marta Martinez de Montis and his four-year old son.

President Orlich delivered a letter in book form to President Kennedy outlining in detail the problems which Costa Rica and the Government are facing. He very briefly mentioned the four problems included in the letter and stated that all information desired in detail was included in said letter.

¹ Requests for U.S. aid: Project financing, National Industrial Corporation; education, health and fiscal problems. Official Use Only. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, President's Trip—San Jose, March 1963, Memcons.

President Orlich spoke of the fiscal problem, stating that when he took office there was a deficit of 180 million colones which had accumulated over several past administrations, and that his Government had been able to reduce the existing deficit from 180 million colones to 90 million colones. However, the daily fiscal problem was still serious. He requested President Kennedy's assistance in obtaining necessary budgetary help through loan applications in connection with development projects involving schools, hydro-electric plants, industrialization of electricity and highways. President Kennedy assured President Orlich that he would look into this matter and requested Mr. Moscoso to submit to him certain information related to the pending development project loans involving fiscal assistance to the Government of Costa Rica.

The second item in the letter involves a request for help in the establishment of a national industrial corporation. President Orlich stated that this was essential and necessary for the industrial and economic development of the country.

The third item was the national educational program. President Orlich stated that due to the explosive population growth it was necessary to make every effort not only to meet the present additional need for schools and teachers, but also to attempt to meet the future problem of schooling which would become very serious due to the high population growth. Mr. Moscoso is to look into this matter though he pointed out that with the high rate of literacy in Costa Rica we thought economic development had a higher priority.

The fourth item was the national health program. President Orlich is interested in securing help necessary to continue the fight against malaria, tuberculosis and malnutrition in certain sectors of the population. President Orlich again stated that the details of these four matters were included in his letter. With the assistance of the doctors present he mentioned that the 450-bed Children's Hospital has just been completed, that it is a general hospital for children and that its equipment is now being installed. He mentioned that they had the necessary doctors and nurses which had been previously trained in the United States. However, their problem involved the funds required for daily operation once the hospital is inaugurated, probably in the next two months. He delivered a letter to Mr. Moscoso outlining the necessary funds required for the next three or four years. He stated that initially the hospital would need at least 50% help in its operating budget with a reduction of such help in future years from 50% the first year to 40% the following year, 30% the third year, and so on. He felt that then the Government of Costa Rica would be in a position to assume a greater share of the operating responsibility and funds. President Kennedy asked Mr. Moscoso to look into this matter to determine what Washington policy is on such requests and notify President Orlich. The doctors, in the presence of President Orlich, presented President Kennedy with an antique coin and two gold Indian Huacas for Mrs. Kennedy as an expression of the gratitude and appreciation of the Costa Rican people to the American people for the help in building the Children's Hospital. (The United States Government provided a loan of two million dollars to assist in the construction of the Hospital in addition to the Alliance for Progress assistance contributed in the training of personnel and in the purchase of necessary equipment.)

87. Airgram A-7 from San Jose, July 6¹

San Jose, July 6, 1963

SUBJECT: President Orlich Criticizes US as Dilatory in Assisting GOCR Fiscal Problem.

At the inauguration of a dispensary at Palmares June 16, President ORLICH for the first time publicly criticized the US for its slow processing of GOCR loan applications (Weeka #25, Embtels 677, 686). He stated that had credit been granted quickly last year, when originally requested, the nation would already have shown proof of economic-fiscal recovery. He added that his experience leads him to agree with ex-Presidents KUBICHEK of Brazil and Lleras CAMARGA of Colombia that aid does not arrive expeditiously to assist the ailing Latin American economies.

President Orlich also expressed pride in the operations of the Social Security, Housing and Electric Power authorities, and commented that Costa Ricans should comply with tax laws. Stating that for the first time he was criticizing the Echandi Administration publicly, he charged them with the responsibility for the large public debt which his Liberation Party government inherited. But he, unlike Echandi, did not wish to govern in an easy going way, but wished to lead the country back from the bankruptcy in which Echandi left it. The economic situation daily growing worse, he was disposed to make various organizational changes in the interest of economy. Costa Ricans must work he said and economize and reduce the importation of such luxuries as television and automobiles which is seriously affecting the national economy.

¹ Report of President Orlich first public criticism of U.S. for slow processing of GOCR loan applications. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 15-1 COSTA RICA.

The President also took the opportunity to speak in high praise of the work of the Peace Corps in Costa Rica, and greeted 2 PCV's effusively.

COMMENT: The President was undoubtedly encouraged in his criticism of the US by the statements of Kubichek and Lleras Camarga. He was also pressured into the action by local politicians, both of his own party and the opposition. It is reported that Raul HESS, then retiring Minister of Economy, who has been under the relentless attack of the opposition press for his failure to restore the fiscal stability he promised upon taking office one year ago, was among those pressing Orlich for a public statement on the problem.

The President's statement resulted not only from the pressures of political friends and enemies, but undoubtedly represents his own long pentup feelings on the issue. Some of the criticism to which he is reacting is based not only on failure to secure US budget-loans, but also that based on the belief that President Orlich is not taking a firm stand with both party and government functionaries and agencies, and that he is reluctant to face the fact that in politics and government unpopular actions must sometimes be taken for the public welfare.

FOR THE AMBASSADOR:

H. Franklin Irwin
First Secretary of Embassy

Embassy sent copies to: CA Missions and Panama

88. Memorandum of conversation between Foreign Minister Oduber and the Acting Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Cottrell)

July 31, 1963

[Source: Department of State, Central Files, POL COSTA RICA-CUBA. Secret. 1 page of text not declassified.]

Ecuador

89. Despatch 419 from Quito, February 2¹

Quito, February 2, 1961

REF: Embassy D-411, February 2, 1961. SUBJECT: U.S. Economic Assistance Policy Towards Ecuador.

As reported [1 line not declassified] told Ambassador Bernbaum that henceforth the U.S. should use its economic assistance as a bargaining counter to induce President VELASCO to cooperate with the U.S. on the Cuban and Communist issues. [less than 1 line not declassified] Velasco is subject to manipulation by the U.S. in this way because he needs U.S. aid to carry out his promises to the Ecuadorean people of economic development and social reform.

Although the [less than 1 line not declassified] remarks provide a useful reminder that we should continuously evaluate our economic assistance to Ecuador in the light of our overall policy objectives, they should not lead us to contemplate any abrupt change in our economic assistance policy, for the following principal reasons:

1. An attempt to use our economic assistance to pressure Velasco politically would almost certainly backfire.

2. Our economic assistance program in Ecuador is designed to serve a number of objectives, most of them of a long-term character; such a program cannot be readily turned on and off like water at a tap.

These two points are expanded in the following discussion:

1. While [less than 1 line not declassified] Velasco needs U.S. economic assistance and can be influenced by it is partially true, this does not necessarily mean that we can or should make blatant use of particular bits of aid to secure his cooperation on particular issues. It is doubtful that so sensitive and willful a man as Velasco would submit to such treatment, however desirous he may be of obtaining U.S. economic aid. Moreover, there is room for doubt that he considers the U.S. the sole and indispensable source of outside assistance. Faced with a U.S. policy of parceling out aid bit by bit in return for corresponding political cooperation, we might well decide to turn—or threaten to turn—to the Communist Bloc for aid. We would then have either to accept aid [illegible in the original] of Bloc penetration of Ecuador or abjectly reverse our own aid policy to keep the Bloc out of this country.

¹ U.S. economic assistance policy toward Ecuador. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 822.10/2-661.

While rejecting a policy of extending economic assistance to Ecuador with conspicuous political strings attached, we should realize that our aid is intended to (among other things) influence the Ecuadorean Government's policies, both domestic and foreign. This could continue to be one of our purposes, but we should employ the lever provided us by our aid program as subtly and as indirectly as possible, using economic assistance as one means of gradually shaping Ecuador's public opinion and national policies to suit U.S. interests. The thinly-disguised blackmail [less than 1 line not declassified] is not likely to have the intended effect on Velasco, as noted in the preceding paragraph, and it might well alienate other elements in Ecuador on which our aid might be expected to have favorable long-term effects.

2. A program of economic assistance seriously designed to be of long-term helpfulness to the recipient country cannot be turned on and off like water at a tap, nor can it be changed in direction or composition on short notice. Such a program derives its justification from the belief that long-run U.S. interests will be served by it. It may be argued that there will be no long run for us in Ecuador if we fail to surmount our short-run problems with Velasco. This argument contains an element of truth, but can be countered with the argument that heavy-handed use of our aid program to induce political cooperation offers little promise of resolving these short-run problems. Success is far more likely if the image we present to Velasco—and Ecuadoreans generally—is one of willingness to extend reasonable and justifiable economic assistance as a gesture of our genuine interest in Ecuador's well being.

This posture is the most promising for the long-run and in relation to the variety of objectives towards which our aid program is directed. In a sense it may be said that we have bigger fish than Velasco to fry in Ecuador. We must accommodate ourselves to Velasco at the moment, to be sure, but our broad policies towards Ecuador—including our economic assistance policy—must be conceived with a view to furthering long-term political and economic trends favorable to U.S. interests.

In the Embassy's view, this can best be done by continuing our existing economic aid policy, keeping in mind that we expect our aid to further economic and social development in Ecuador, create a favorable image of the U.S. in the minds of the Ecuadorean people, etc., as well as to influence Ecuadorean foreign policy at a given moment. While continuing our present aid policy, we should evaluate with meticulous care all aspects of our aid program. Each element of the program should meet two principal criteria: (a) It should fill an important Ecuadorean need to the satisfaction of which the Ecuadoreans themselves are willing to make a significant contribution in effort and resources; (b) It should show promise of contributing to the achievement of overall U.S. objectives in Ecuador.

These criteria should be applied in a process of continuous reexamination of existing assistance projects and of new projects proposed. Ideally, thus, the program should undergo continuous, gradual reshaping to meet our shifting policy needs, but abrupt changes of direction and composition should be recognized as counterproductive in the absence of truly basic changes in Ecuador's political situation.

As implied in the foregoing discussion, the Embassy does not believe there have been such basic changes, despite the [less than 1 line not declassified] pessimistic remarks of February 1. It seems to the Embassy that Velasco is less inclined toward Castro or the Communists, than he is desirous of not making any unnecessary enemies for Ecuador. It would be naive to suppose that he is a confirmed friend of the U.S., but it would be equally foolish to conclude prematurely that he is on the verge of allying himself with Castro. The Embassy could be mistaken in this analysis, of course, and will continue to follow developments closely.

SUMMARY COMMENT

The [less than 1 line not declassified] remarks of February 1 should be taken as a timely reminder to continue to evaluate carefully the usefulness of our economic assistance program in Ecuador. For the time being at least we should not contemplate modification of our economic assistance policy. Especially, we should avoid any appearance of foot-dragging on pending Ecuadorean requests for loans, technical assistance, etc. Our posture should continue to be one of standing ready to give aid which is sincerely desired and genuinely needed. This does not imply that we should seem to importune Ecuador to accept economic assistance from us. On the contrary, we should be quick to withdraw our aid—or offers of aid—in any area where the Ecuadoreans indicate it is not desired.

For the Ambassador:

Robert W. Moore
First Secretary

cc: Amcongen GUAYAQUIL; Ecuador Desk; USOM/E.

Clearances:

Mr. Rogers
Mr. Little

90. Telegram 447 to Quito and 553 to Lima, February 25¹

February 25, 1961

REF: LIMA's 537, QUITO's 432.

FYI Dept shares Embassies' concern over indications possible arms race between Ecuador and Peru. Ecuador reportedly investigating procurement fighter aircraft, medium tanks, heavy bombs, anti-tank missiles, and torpedo boats from England; automatic small arms from Belgium, Holland, Israel and Czechoslovakia; fighter planes from France; Mortars, anti-tank weapons, land mines from Italy; in addition substantial number recoilless rifles, jeeps and helicopters from US. On other hand, Peruvians threatening outdo any purchases Ecuador makes. End FYI.

If no objection perceived, Embassy Quito requested approach appropriate GOE officials and without mentioning our sources information express our concern over numerous recent reports Ecuadorean negotiations purchase arms in Europe.

Embassy Lima requested in its discretion approach appropriate GOP officials to state that we have no confirmation report in refTel and we urge GOP not use such report, even if true, as rationale for increasing own arms purchase, especially since Peru's present Armed Forces far outweigh present [illegible in the original] Ecuadorean forces.

In [illegible in the original] emphasize [illegible in the original] ability arms race from point of view has [illegible in the original] and expenditure resources to [illegible in the original] and economic programs, and point out arms race usually harmful [illegible in the original] if one side pulls ahead, other follows, [illegible in the original] leaving relative positions unchanged. Also explained [illegible in the original] that aggression and remind both Governments of statement by [illegible in the original] spokesman on December 13 making clear that US would honor its [illegible in the original] which calls for individual or collective action in event of situation of aggression as defined in Treaty.

Rusk

¹ U.S. concerns over possible arms race between Ecuador and Peru. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 722.58/2-2161.

91. Memorandum of conversation, April 18, between President Kennedy and Foreign Minister Chiriboga¹

April 18, 1961

SUBJECT

Ecuadorian Foreign Minister's Call on the President

PARTICIPANTS

The President
Foreign Minister Chiriboga of Ecuador
Ambassador Ponce of Ecuador
Acting Assistant Secretary Coerr

The Foreign Minister said he brought to President Kennedy the warm greetings of the President and people of Ecuador, and the assurance that President Velasco was looking forward with great pleasure to accepting President Kennedy's invitation to visit the United States next October. The Foreign Minister said that his President had accepted "in principle" in frank recognition of the possibility that social and economic conditions might make it unwise for him to leave Ecuador at that time. President Kennedy expressed his pleasure at meeting the Foreign Minister and his hope that conditions in Ecuador next October would be such as to permit President Velasco to come to the United States then. He also thanked the Foreign Minister for his comments on the program of Alliance for Progress.

The Foreign Minister declared that Latin America is in a period of active social revolution which the communists are effectively exploiting through propaganda, political parties and mass organizations, and that the next few years could see many Latin American countries "sink into communism" or "be saved for democracy." He said the issue hinges on whether the rich people of Latin America will achieve (sic) adequate social reforms and—especially—whether the United States can extend enough aid. The Foreign Minister noted that U.S. aid programs sometimes suffer from too much bureaucracy and red tape. He said specifically that the Government of Ecuador had been having considerable difficulty in satisfying requirements of the Development Loan Fund with respect to applications totaling some $25 million.

The President said he fully recognized that red tape has its drawbacks but that at its best it may be regarded as a form of insurance against imprudent decisions, and he assured the Foreign Minister that agencies of the U.S. Government would do their best to expedite action as soon as they had in hand the information that might be required by law.

¹ Review of relations and security in Latin America. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 720.5-MSP/4-186.

Referring to President Kennedy's statement in his Pan American Day speech favoring the holding of a high-level meeting on economic and social development during the coming summer, the Foreign Minister expressed the fear that such a meeting might detract from the prestige of the 11th Inter-American Conference scheduled for next May 24. He emphasized that his government felt strongly that the Conference should be held as scheduled.

The President asked the Foreign Minister whether there would be any security problem should the Conference be held as scheduled this May. The Foreign Minister asserted emphatically that there might be some few troublemakers, but that the Ecuadorean people were generally very friendly to the United States and that the government could exert sufficient force to maintain order. The President said that he of course hoped the 11th Inter-American Conference would be held on time but that, like President Velasco's visit to the United States, it might be affected adversely by economic and social conditions. He said that the United States neither had nor would take any initiative in the matter but of course would be influenced strongly by the consensus of opinion among the other nations of the Hemisphere.

92. Memorandum of conversation, May 2, between Foreign Minister Chiriboga and A.A. Berle¹

May 2, 1961

SUBJECT

Ecuador

PARTICIPANTS

Dr. Jose Ricardo Chiriboga Villagomez, Foreign Minister of Ecuador
A. A. Berle

Dr. Chiriboga, Minister of Foreign Affairs Ecuador, was at my house last night.

¹ Chiriboga's concern over pro-Communist forces in Ecuador. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 722.00/5-261.

He took occasion to explain that he was very unhappy about the situation in Ecuador. His President is vibrating between the pro-Communist forces represented by Araujo and the pro-American forces which he represents. He considered that the great majority of the country was with him and so were the armed forces of Ecuador. Araujo and his group (he described them as “rats in the palace”) were always endeavoring to induce Velasco to do things contrary to the common interest which he considered Ecuador and the United States must maintain. He said that at some time the issue might be squarely forced in which case he would have to resign.

I inquired as to what he thought we ought to do.

Chiriboga said there was no point in discussing the question squarely. He thought it best

(a) to see to it that the boundary question between Ecuador and Peru was left strictly alone;

(b) to go forward with the loan on housing but

(c) to slow up diplomatically on other aid to Ecuador. Sooner or later, he thought, this would tend to bring home to President Velasco that he could not hunt with the hounds and run with the hare. Araujo is constantly telling him that he can get everything he wants out of us and then get more help from the Soviet Union later.

On the more cheery side, Chiriboga said there were demonstrations in Guayaquil, that they had been extremely weak and there was no great worry of the Communists upsetting the situation themselves. They would have to proceed through the palace in some fashion. Chiriboga intimated that if Velasco went too far the armed forces would upset the Velasco government.

A.A. Berle

93. Despatch 673 from Quito, May 9¹

Quito, May 9, 1961

REF: DepTel 624, May 3, 1961. SUBJECT: U.S. Military Relationship with Ecuador.

¹ U.S. military relationship with Ecuador. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 722.5-MSP/5-961.

A number of recent developments have led to my giving considerable thought to the question of the United States relationship with Ecuador on military matters, particularly involving sales or grants of military equipment to this country.

There have been numerous well-based reports that the Ecuadoreans particularly following the enlivening of the boundary issue, intend to buy arms from the U.S., from friendly Western European sources, or possibly from the bloc. The Department's recent statement of position on purchases of arms by Ecuador is contained in its Telegram 602 of April 25. It is the Embassy's belief that, in view of the various considerations which make it probable that the Ecuadoreans will make arms purchases in any event, following the position set out in DepTel 602 will tend to leave a vacuum which makes it likely that Ecuador will make purchases from Czechoslovakia or another bloc source. Furthermore, this puts the United States in the position of appearing opposed to Ecuadorean determination to provide for self-defense, a course the GOE is most likely to follow in any event. Difficult as that situation is, it is aggravated by the related question of the extent to which the United States sells military equipment to Peru. The Quito press on May 1 carried a story that the Peruvian Air Force had announced the purchase of ten C-46 aircraft which were said to be used for supplying jungle units. The story continued that in June the first ten of 25 T-33 jet trainers which had been purchased in the United States would arrive in Peru. Such accounts are, of course, followed closely by the Ecuadorean military establishment and indicate to them that we favor Peru over Ecuador. The Embassy would appreciate verification of the details of this story about Peruvian acquisition of aircraft in the United States.

Because of the difficulties of our position the Embassy welcomed the receipt of the Department's telegram 624 of May 3 relating to an examination with the Ecuadoreans of "realistic requirements", keeping in mind the objective of minimizing arms purchases. It seems to the Embassy that we should work with the Ecuadoreans to do what we can to influence them along the lines of our own thinking and assist in acquiring those "realistic requirements", rather than being frozen out and providing a favorable situation for bloc suppliers. This is particularly important since bloc technicians accompany bloc arms.

This suggested approach is intended to maximize U.S. military influence in Ecuador which is now at the low point of recent years and which would doubtless fall considerably lower should we attempt a different approach. A related matter is the future of the military assistance program in Ecuador. The Chief of MAAG recently submitted to me his FY 63-67 plan for MAP in Ecuador. He informed me that shortly after it was submitted he learned informally that a decision had been made in Washington that funds for force improvement would not be available commencing FY 1962, which would limit the MAP program solely to follow-on support, replacements and spares. This will cause termination of force improvement projects only recently programmed for introduction with deliveries extending over several years. If this decision is maintained, it seems to me that the timing could not have come at a worse time in the light of the present situation in Ecuador.

In summary, the Embassy welcomed DepTel 624 and will work closely with the Chief of MAAG in discussing with the Ecuadorean military the matter of “realistic requirements”. I have already discussed the matter with Foreign Minister Chiriboga (see EmbTel 599, May 8) who will initiate discussions with the Ministry of Defense as a basis for later joint discussions with Chief of MAAG.

Maurice M. Bernbaum

cc: AmGenGen—GUAYAQUIL
Ecuador Desk Officer, ARA.
CINCARIB

94. Telegram 211 to Quito, undated¹

undated

RPT: POLAD CINCARIB (NIACT). Amembassy, LIMA for Bernbaum (NIACT). Ref. EMTEL 176 and USARMA CX16.

1. We actively exploring possibility provide documentation to justify GOE break relations with Cuba.

2. Our records indicate that US-GOE internal security program carried out in 1959 and 1960 in preparation for (then scheduled) Quito conference amounted to about $1.5 million. That program, divided between military and police in approximate ratio 65–35, provided training and substantial supplies tear gas, gas masks, transportation and communications equipment, etc., such as requested in REFTTEL CX16. Further we understand USOM director has on hand 1200 38 calibre pistols and other police equipment intended for border patrol which could be diverted to police in present situation. We estimate stocks on hand adequate for any immediate emergency which military and police are determined to meet.

¹ DOS response to request from Ecuadorean military officers for equipment to assist in maintaining internal security. Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Ecuador.

3. We strongly appreciate, however, advisability demonstrate to Velasco U.S. ability give him prompt support in this first instance in which he has turned to us for such emergency help. We therefore are prepared send immediately token air shipment tear gas, gas masks and smoke grenades. (We do not repeat not believe in U.S. interest supply vomiting gas. Weapons carriers not feasible short notice.)

4. Plane can depart a.m. October 8. We suggest you make plans within country team for expeditious and discreet handling.

5. We note both REFTELS cite only military officers as direct source GOE requests for assistance. We believe it would be highly advisable Embassy obtain and transmit confirmation by President or Foreign Minister (preferably President) before we make shipment.

6. We have White House advance assurance Presidential determination up to $500 thousand subject future documentation.

7. We holding plane departure pending receipt your NIACT reply indicating a) whether above proposed action meets your current needs, b) confirmation desired paragraph 5, or your opinion thereof.

Rusk

95. Memorandum from McGhee to Woodward, November 9¹

November 9, 1961

SUBJECT

Ecuador: Anatomy of a Revolution

For at least two reasons, I think we would be well served by devoting considerable time and effort to an examination of just what happened in Ecuador and why:

1. If we except the Quadros succession problem, Ecuador represents the first old-style Latin American revolution since the Alliance for

¹ Anatomy of the revolution in Ecuador. Secret. 2 pp. WNRC, RG 59, S/P Files: Lot 67 D 548, Ecuador.

Progress and Punta del Este. It may be a precursor to others which we will encounter and must know how to deal with preventively or after the fact, as implementation of the Alliance progresses. For example, could we have influenced Velasco Ibarra against imposing the retrogressive consumer taxes which apparently sparked the revolution? Since these types of tax counter the spirit of Punta del Este, would efforts to dissuade Velasco have been legitimate preventive diplomacy of the type required if the Alliance is to succeed? What would have been the consequences of our involving ourselves in this matter?

2. The entire episode is obviously closely related to our new emphasis on the internal defense (security) of Latin American states and the corollary requirement that we understand thoroughly the social forces and tensions which can imperil constitutional order and evolutionary progress.

I doubt that the Washington Assessment Team now preparing to survey the internal security situation in South America is equipped to make this study. I think ARA should take the lead, therefore, and draw on INR and other resources as required. What I would like to see would be an end product which would examine in depth the forces called into play in this revolution and explain, among other things, why the Army supported Callegos and the Air Force favored Arosemena. I cannot help but believe that an anatomy of this revolution—which would, as far as I can recollect, represent the first exercise of this type—reveal things that would stand us in good stead in preventing or handling similar type of social dissidence in the future.

cc: S/O—Mr. Achilles

INR—Mr. Hilsman/Mr. Evans

White House—Mr. Goodwin

96. Memorandum from Woodward to McGhee, November 17¹

November 17, 1961

SUBJECT

Ecuador: Anatomy of a Revolution (Your Memorandum of November 9, 1961)

In preliminary response to your questions concerning the relationship between the “old-style Latin American revolution” in Ecuador and the Alliance for Progress, the following comments occur to me:

1. If former President Velasco Ibarra had heeded the principles of the Alliance for Progress as outlined in the Charter of Punta del Este, he might not have been subjected to this revolution. Therefore, we can expect that the increased observance of the Charter of Punta del Este will reduce the possibility of other revolutions for the reasons that this one was carried out.

2. There is, of course, likely to be a danger that—if a revolution is carried out for a purpose such as this (a protest against increases in taxes on consumers)—that the revolution could be led by leaders of the masses who could be Castroists. Therefore, it is obviously desirable for governments to avoid precipitating this kind of revolutions, and that is why it is beneficial for us to be exerting steady pressure through the Alliance for Progress for an evolution in taxes that will place the burden more fairly on those who are able to pay.

3. With respect to the question: Why did the Army support Gallegos and the Air Force support Arosemena? I think this is explainable by the fact that the Army tends to be more traditional-minded as an older branch of the Service, and the Air Force tends to be composed of younger officers who are more inclined to be sympathetic with the plight of the consumer and somewhat less inclined to be rigid in their traditional loyalties.

¹ Response to McGhee’s November 9 memorandum on the anatomy of the Ecuadorian revolution. Secret. 1 p. WNRC, RG 59, S/P Files: Lot 67 D 548, Ecuador.

97. Memorandum of conversation, November 24, between Rusk and Ambassador Plaza¹

November 24, 1961

SUBJECT

Attitudes and Needs of the New Government of Ecuador

PARTICIPANTS

The Secretary

Ambassador Galo Plaza, Special Representative of the President of Ecuador

Eduardo Arosemena, Ecuadorean Chargé d’Affaires ad interim

Taylor Belcher, WST

John T. Dreyfuss, WST/E

Ambassador Plaza said that he had been asked by President Carlos Julio Arosemena of Ecuador to visit the United States on a special mission to explain to our officials and to the press of this country the attitudes and aims of the new government. Pointing out that his own pro-U.S., anti-Communist position was well known to us, Ambassador Plaza assured the Secretary that he would never have accepted the special mission President Arosemena had asked him to undertake unless he had been assured in his own mind that the new government was not extremist and on the contrary had every intention of living up to the commitments of the Alliance for Progress by engaging in self-help measures. In expanding on this theme, Ambassador Plaza remarked on the moderate cabinet chosen by President Arosemena, and on recent developments in establishment of a progressive inheritance tax and pending progressive income tax legislation. He said also that President Arosemena had taken immediate steps to reduce government expenditures and improve the administrative processes in Ecuador in order to help alleviate the present budgetary difficulties caused by the fiscal mistakes of the Velasco Government. In this respect, Ambassador Plaza said that Ecuador is urgently in need of assistance both in the fields of budgetary support and for social and economic development. He pointed out, however, that President Arosemena knows that he cannot expect the United States to solve all of Ecuador’s problems with loans and that he is determined to carry the main burden through self-help measures, with desired help from the United States adding to and accelerating the effects of the self-help measures.

¹ Attitude and needs of the new Government of Ecuador. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, Secretary’s Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 330.

Ambassador Plaza said that he had been particularly disturbed by the attitude of the U.S. press towards the succession of Arosemena and that he felt that U.S. news media had seriously misinterpreted events and statements by Arosemena. Ambassador Plaza pointed out that in order to maintain a peaceful atmosphere while he organizes and consolidates his administration, President Arosemena must pacify the diverse political elements that supported his assumption of the Presidency, and that his statements on Cuba and the Soviet Union, which in reality are nothing more than a continuation of the previous government's foreign policy, must at this time be looked at in relation to internal political conditions. Commenting specifically on reaction to President Arosemena's statement on continuation of relations with Cuba, Ambassador Plaza said that the Velasco Government had not broken relations with Cuba, nor had it officially declared the Cuban Chargé persona non grata. However, Ambassador Plaza revealed, after Arosemena assumed the Presidency, the Cuban Chargé was called in by the Foreign Minister on the express instructions of the President and warned that Ecuador's position on nonintervention was reciprocal and meant that there would be strong reaction to any Cuban intervention in Ecuadorean internal affairs, with such intervention resulting in expulsion.

The Secretary thanked Ambassador Plaza for his clear exposition of the attitude and aims of the new Ecuadorean government and said that we had indeed been concerned at first over the events in Ecuador and over President Arosemena's statements and possible orientation. However, we, like Ambassador Plaza, had been encouraged by the Ecuadorean cabinet selections, by President Arosemena's stated intention to work within the framework of the Alliance for Progress; and, particularly, by Ambassador Plaza's decision to accept his current special mission. The Secretary indicated to Ambassador Plaza that we are ready to attempt to complement Ecuador's self-help measures under the Alliance for Progress. The Secretary went on to say, however, that he wished to point out the difficulties that could be caused for us by public statements that could be interpreted as favoring castroism or the extreme left, even if these statements are not matched by unfavorable action. Such statements have a profound effect upon public opinion and on our Congress, upon which we are dependent for the resources that make our economic and technical cooperation possible.

In closing the conversation the Secretary said that he would like to meet with Ambassador Plaza again to hear the Ambassador's opinions and comments after he had seen other U.S. officials and the representatives of international financing institutions he intended to visit while in Washington.

98. Memorandum of conversation, November 28, between President Kennedy and Ambassador Plaza¹

November 28, 1961

SUBJECT

Ecuadorean Special Ambassador's Call on The President

PARTICIPANTS

The President

Sr. Galo Plaza, Special Ambassador of the Government of Ecuador

Sr. Eduardo Arosemena, Ecuadorean Chargé d'Affaires

Mr. Robert F. Woodward, Assistant Secretary for Inter-American Affairs

Mr. Taylor G. Belcher, ARA/WST

During his call on President Kennedy at 4:45 p.m. November 28, Special Ambassador Galo Plaza delivered to the President a letter from Ecuadorean President Arosemena and expressed his sincere and deep appreciation of the reception which he had received in the United States, both from Government officials and from the press. He said he felt he had been successful in dispelling the doubts which had at first been expressed in the United States news media about the political orientation of the new Ecuadorean Government. Ex-President Plaza went on to assure President Kennedy that he would never have accepted the Special Mission which President Arosemena had asked him to undertake unless he had been assured in his own mind that the new Government was not extremist and on the contrary had every intention of living up to the commitments of the Alliance for Progress by engaging in self-help measures. He related recent developments establishing a progressive inheritance tax and described pending progressive income tax legislation. He said that President Arosemena had taken immediate steps to reduce government expenditures to a minimum in order to alleviate the present budgetary difficulties caused by the fiscal mistakes of the Velasco Government. President Kennedy said that news of such measures being taken in Ecuador would help in our forthcoming presentation to Congress requesting Alliance for Progress funds for next year's program.

In discussing the aid which Ecuador had already received from the United States, Ambassador Plaza said the budget support loan just approved was the type loan he hoped would never have to be repeated. He also remarked on the excellent work done in Ecuador by the various

¹ New Government in Ecuador; U.S. aid. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, Presidential Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.

Servicios. Their work had been effective and at a level at which there had been maximum impact on the community as a whole. He said that he had been distressed to find that the concept of the new AID organization seemed to be downgrading the role of the Servicios and he hoped that something could be done so that the valuable programs which they were carrying out would not be terminated.

President Kennedy asked Ambassador Plaza for his opinion as to the political future of Ecuador in view of the strong leftist influence which had been apparent in the recent disturbances. Plaza replied that it was true that left-wing elements had participated to an important degree in the change-over but that it was notable that the only group which had been excluded from the new government was that representing the extreme left and the Communists. He went on to point out that the universities were a focus of communist penetration, and that unfortunately the United States had failed to make an impression in the intellectual-cultural field in Ecuador. There had been some useful work done through the Fulbright program but it was extremely difficult to achieve further significant progress as long as we had a Cultural Attaché in Quito who could not speak Spanish. President Kennedy took note of this fact and observed that we would look into the possibility of enlarging on the limited teacher and professor exchange program which was already in operation to see whether it would be possible to expand this by taking advantage of summer school operations as well as the possibility of utilizing the "sister university" concept.

As the meeting broke up President Kennedy referred to the invitation which had previously been extended to President Velasco to visit the United States and said he hoped to have the opportunity of meeting the new President here in the United States as soon as affairs would permit him to come. He told the Chargé, who is President Arosemena's brother, that he would get in touch with the President through Ambassador Bernbaum in order to fix a mutually satisfactory date.

99. Memorandum from McClintock to Rostow, December 15, transmitting a memorandum from Woodward to McGhee and Ramsey, which attaches a memorandum from Woodward to McGhee¹

December 15, 1961

SUBJECT

Ecuador

You will be interested I believe in the first page of Mr. Woodward's memo on conclusions to be drawn from our experience of the recent revolt in Ecuador. You will note that his third paragraph substantiates the observation made in our paper on Preventive Diplomacy as to the importance of indoctrinating the military in various countries with American ideas of respect for constitutional order.

Attachment

SUBJECT

Ecuador

There is attached a preliminary analysis of the recent Ecuadorean revolution as it may relate to the Alliance for Progress.

I believe the main points in this situation are:

1. that there would have been less likelihood that President Velasco would have been thrown out if he had paid more attention to the principles of the Alliance for Progress and followed them—instead of applying additional taxes on consumer goods;

2. that it is possible that the wide advertising of the Alliance for Progress may tend to raise the expectations of the mass of the people so that their elected leaders will find it more necessary to take constructive action on behalf of the people rather than to make demagogic promises which they do not keep;

3. As an entirely separate matter, I believe this revolution also is a vivid reminder of the importance of the relations which have been developed over the past 25 years with officers of the armed services of Latin American countries. So many of these officers have been in the United States service schools and have been trained, at least briefly, as United States military installations, that there has been a very widespread contagion of the U.S. idea that officers of the armed services are "professional" guardians of the common weal. The way in which the Ecuadorean armed services sensed the true wishes of the Ecuadorean people during this revolution and did not arbitrarily attempt to maintain their own pre-conceived idea of what the government should be, was to me very impressive. This tends to reinforce my own conviction that there is no more important type of travel grant that we should encourage than a steady expansion of the existing system for training Latin American army, naval and air force officers in the United States and at Fort Gulick—not to mention the training that is given to non-commissioned officers at Fort Gulick.

¹ Preliminary analysis of recent Ecuadorian revolution. Secret. 6 pp. WNRC, RG 59, S/P Files: Lot 67 D 548, Ecuador.

Attachment

SUBJECT

Ecuador: Some Comments on the Revolution

I refer to your memorandum of November 9, 1961, in which you raise several interesting questions concerning the recent violent change of Government in Ecuador. While we have as yet not had the time necessary to devote to a well-coordinated study in depth of the complete "anatomy" of this revolution, I should like at this time to address myself to two major points you raised: the question of the retrogressive consumer taxes and the role of the military.

It is generally accepted that the imposition of the consumer taxes, which gave labor and student groups a convenient "cause" with which to foment disturbances, was the spark which ignited the fuse to the powder keg. Given the rigid, proud Velasco personality, his well-known shortsightedness, and the difficult fiscal crisis in which he found himself, I believe there was little we could have done to prevent the creation of the powder keg beyond what we did—giving technical assistance in the preparation of fiscal and tax reforms and strongly suggesting that those reforms be adopted. As you know, several expert missions, notably a [illegible in the original] group, had prepared detailed plans for tax reform and presented them to the Velasco Government. Although United States officials in both Washington and Quito urged officials of the Ecuadorean Government (of all levels) to adopt these plans rapidly, the GOE continued merely to "study" them. At the point at which Velasco found it necessary to impose the retrogressive taxes, the only way we could have damped this final spark which set off this explosion would have been our willingness to give immediate, massive budget support assistance (a step we, particularly our financial institutions, are hesitant to take) that would supply the immediate revenue to the GOE that the taxes were designed to produce. Tax reform, by itself at this stage, would not have produced revenues rapidly enough to alleviate the immediate situation with which the GOE was faced.

I believe, then, that in studying the causes of the Ecuadorean Revolution and possible preventive measures, and in applying the lesson learned from it to problems we will face in the future, we must look much deeper than the final spark and attempt to attack the basic ills that produced the powder keg. In the case of Ecuador, Velasco, during his electoral campaign planted the seeds of his own destruction by his own demagoguery—promising more and raising more hopes than he could logically expect to fulfill. These seeds were nurtured by his own administrative inefficiency and his choice of Cabinet Ministers who were little more efficient than he was, and who were open to attack on charges of graft and corruption. Velasco had in the past controlled situations through the use of words and his magnetic personality. In his year of office this time he overestimated the power of his oratory and found he could not, with words and promises, satisfy people who were now expecting houses and employment and schools and a better standard of living. Velasco's own administrative failings, combined with an unfortunate decline in Ecuador's export earnings, led to the financial crisis that struck the final spark.

How do we attack the basic problems and guide the foreign government into logical channels to solve them? In Ecuador we gave a good deal of attention to assisting Velasco in planning for improved public administration, as a first step in solving his problems. Our missions studied, planned, and made suggestions. There was resistance to many of the suggestions, thus blocking our efforts to begin the cure of the patient. Our answer to this situation lies in the concepts of the Alliance for Progress, in which we make it clear to the governments that we will not be able to give them economic assistance unless they take the self-help steps necessary to lay the groundwork for the effective utilization of our aid. This is a good concept. Unfortunately, however, the Alliance for Progress is a long range matter. Many of the governments with which we must deal under the Alliance are shortsighted. What do we do when faced with governments that are unwilling to take the necessary steps and, in the absence of our assistance, cast about to solve their difficulties and shortsightedly impose measures, like the Ecuadorean consumer taxes, that we feel will lead to their destruction? We can only 1) continue to attempt to influence them to meet the requirements of the Alliance, and failing in this; 2) give short term assistance, without insisting on the basic self-help measures, in hopes that we can later influence the government to take the necessary steps; or 3) allow the government to fall, with the attendant danger that the left might profit from the chaos caused by this. Our chance to influence the governments may be increased considerably by "selling" the concept of the Alliance to the people of a country, but if the government remains obstinate in this case, the results will be the same. There would appear to be no ready answer to this basic problem.

The military: Once the spark had been ignited in Ecuador, the nation's military forces played a determining role in the immediate outcome. We do not yet have readily available the detailed data that would indicate why a given unit or a given arm of the service backed one or the other candidates. However, we can speculate with a fair degree of accuracy on the general attitudes of the military in the crisis.

We have had evidence that the Ecuadorean military establishment in general is "constitutional-minded" and subject in some degree to popular sentiment. At the beginning of the Ecuadorean crisis the military performed its duty of maintaining internal security well and faithfully, and in so doing caused the death of several students. As the public agitation against Velasco and against the bloodshed gained strength, the Armed Forces found it difficult to maintain their role against public opinion. Opposition claims including a declaration by the Congress, that Velasco had acted unconstitutionally and was attempting to establish himself as a dictator outside of the provisions of the Constitution, gave the military leaders a constitutional "cut" and sealed Velasco's doom. Why the Chimborazo Battalion broke with Velasco before the remainder of the forces we do not at this point know. In the action of individual units personal loyalties and the personalities and politics of commanders, who may have hoped to influence their comrades, definitely come into play.

Once the military felt themselves freed from their duty to support Velasco, the armed forces leaders engaged in constitutional contortions by declaring that Arosemena had himself acted in an unconstitutional way and had thus disqualified himself from the Presidency. The solution was a caretaker government, with a military-appointed President, to rule for 90 days until a constituent assembly could be called. The question for the individual military commanders then resolved itself into 1) support for the interim president; or 2) support for the constitutional succession of Arosemena.

Governing factors in this situation were: 1. The action of the Congress in declaring Arosemena constitutional President; 2. Rapidly growing public support for the succession of Arosemena. Countering these factors was a general dislike in the military of Arosemena and his political attitudes.

The support of the "respectable" parties such as the Conservatives and Liberals for Arosemena undoubtedly had a deep effect on military thinking. These moderate forces feared that imposition of a military president would lead only to continued agitation, and would result in gains for the left by the time the constituent assembly was called. They felt, and argued to military leaders, that only by supporting Arosemena and “constitutionality” could the military place themselves in a situation to influence the new president and maintain control of the situation. Arguments such as these, coupled with the military’s realization that it could not control the pro-Arosemena crowds without further bloodshed, and its support of “constitutionality” appear to have been the principal factors in switching sentiment from the military choice for President to Arosemena.

The role of the armed forces units stationed in Guayaquil, particularly air units, were the key and the spearhead in the physical military shift in allegiance, as air force units from Guayaquil flying to Quito to support Arosemena finally turned the tide in the wavering military thinking. The reason for the defection of the Guayaquil Air Force garrison (and other Guayaquil forces) is not immediately clearly apparent, but the fact that Arosemena is closely identified with Guayaquil, that violence against the populace by Velasco forces was greatest (in the initial phases of the disturbances) in Guayaquil, and that the military units in that city were exposed to strong pro-Arosemena public sentiment, very likely played a major role.

I believe that it will be interesting, after our officers in the field have had an opportunity to gather further information through discussions with military and political leaders over the next few weeks, to study further and in depth the personalities and forces that came into play in the actions of the military forces.

In examining the Ecuadorean events, the question might be asked “What did we do concretely to attempt to head off the explosion we saw coming?”. In addition to attempting to convince the GOE to take administrative and fiscal reform steps to attack the basic problem, as mentioned above, we concluded a loan agreement of 25 million for establishment of a housing bank in an attempt to meet one of the country’s basic needs, and in addition made available $250,000 for immediate use in a self-help housing project. In regard to attempting to quench the final spark, we worked with the GOE on a budgetary support loan, which was delayed because the Ecuadoreans could not decide what they needed (if anything at all), and did, shortly before the fall of the Velasco Government, inform the GOE that we had approved a budgetary loan, based on continued compliance with the IMF standby criteria, of $8 million that could serve to reduce a good deal of the popular pressure building up as a result of the measures the GOE felt itself constrained to take because of its bankruptcy. In the non-economic field, our Ambassador held discussions with members of the responsible opposition to attempt to induce them to forget past differences and work together with the Government in planning corrective measures and in the interest of the maintenance of political stability and constitutional continuity.

100. Memorandum of conversation, January 10, between President Kennedy and Ambassador Ponce¹

January 10, 1962

SUBJECT

Presentation of Credentials by Ecuadorean Ambassador—Discussion of Forthcoming MFM

PARTICIPANTS

The President
Ecuadorean Ambassador Neftali PONCE Miranda
Mr. Angier Biddle Duke, Chief of Protocol
Mr. William J. Tonesk, Deputy Chief of Protocol
Mr. Taylor G. Belcher, ARA/WST

Ambassador Ponce called at the White House to present his credentials. During the call the President asked the Ambassador for an assessment of the strength of leftist influence in Ecuador and of the degree of political stability which President Arosemena felt he now enjoyed. Ambassador Ponce said that the new President and his Cabinet had settled in well and that the Government was in firm control of the situation. He added that support for the President was widespread as exhibited during the tense period of the change of Presidents. At that time, although Communist influenced groups were apparent in the streets of the major cities, the people as a whole did not support them and they were not allowed to get out of hand.

The Ambassador said that President Arosemena and his Government were fully behind the Alliance for Progress and they felt that the success of the Alliance concept was the only answer to the Communist threat to Latin America. He emphasized the need for quick action on both sides and referred to the imminent tax and agrarian reforms in

¹ Presentation of credentials; discussion of upcoming Meeting of Foreign Ministers at Punta del Este. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Ecuador, January 1961–March 1962.

Ecuador as evidence of his Government's devotion to the concepts of liberty, progress and social justice.

President Kennedy referred to the forthcoming Meeting of Foreign Ministers at Punta del Este, stating that the United States hoped for the strongest possible resolutions and at the same time hoped for the greatest possible degree of unanimity. The Ambassador commented at some length on the internal political situation in Ecuador which made it difficult for his Government to espouse openly the position which it would like to support. He added that the Government feared disturbances fomented by pro-Castro elements and was reluctant to place itself in a position requiring the possible use of force against the people. He doubted that the situation would permit Ecuador to vote favorably for sanctions but that the United States Government should not take this to mean that Ecuador supported Cuba.² He further said that Ecuador would in all probability follow the Argentine-Brazilian position. He agreed that some strong action was required to contain the Castro threat, asserting that Castro was a much greater security threat to Latin American nations than to the United States.

At this point the President accepted the Ambassador's credentials and exchanged transcripts of their formal remarks.

² The Ambassador later said to Mr. Belcher that he and his Foreign Minister would welcome very strongly worded resolutions which would call for a mandatory break of relations and obligatory sanctions, calling this "the best solution for Ecuador." He explained that Ecuador would abstain in a vote on any such resolutions but at the same time she would comply with her obligations under the Rio Treaty and carry out the terms of the resolution. It was politically impossible, he explained, to vote in favor of taking this action, but it was possible to explain the need to comply with the terms of the Treaty. COMMENT: I have no doubt that this accurately reflects the true feelings of the Foreign Minister and the Ambassador but whether this view is shared by President Arosemena is open to some doubt.

101. Memorandum for the record, February 6

Washington, February 6, 1962

[Source: Central Intelligence Agency, DCI (McCone) Files, Job 80 B 01285A, Meetings With the President, Box 6, 12/1/61–6/30/62. Secret. 1 page of source text not declassified.]

102. Memorandum of conversation, July 23, between President Kennedy and President Arosemena and other U.S. and Ecuadorean officials¹

July 23, 1962

SUBJECT

Meeting between President Kennedy and President Arosemena

PARTICIPANTS

U.S. SIDE

President John F. Kennedy
Acting Secretary George Ball
U.S. Coordinator, Alliance for Progress, Teodoro Moscoso
Ambassador Maurice M. Bernbaum
Director of WST, Taylor G. Belcher
Interpreter, F. von Reigersberg

ECUADOREAN SIDE

President Carlos Julio Arosemena
Foreign Minister Benjamin Peralta Paez
Ambassador Neftali Ponce-Miranda
Treasury Minister Manuel Naranjo Toro
Former Minister of Economy Federico Intriago
Guillermo Arosemena Coronel, Manager of Guayaquil Branch, Central Bank of Ecuador

The President started the meeting by welcoming President Arosemena. He pointed out that this visit was an additional proof of American interest and concern for Hemispheric problems. The President also pointed out, however, that the U.S. has many problems these days and that it is important to realize that its resources are not unlimited.

President Arosemena thanked the President and stated that he wished to bring up several economic problems affecting his Country. He prefaced his remarks by noting the expressions of great concern on the part of the U.S. Government and of President Kennedy himself with regard to all of Latin America. Ecuador realizes that American assistance is not unlimited, and that it is subject to a number of internal political factors. President Arosemena said that there is one difficulty which all the assistance programs have in common; namely, paternalism. It is impossible to try to regulate or legislate on a number of subjects when you are miles away from the countries that will be affected by such actions. As an example, President Arosemena referred to an Inter-American Development Bank loan for the cultivation of African palms, in which the Ecuadoreans have been compelled to utilize the funds in an area believed to be unsuitable to such crops.

¹ U.S. assistance to Ecuador; situation in Ecuador; situation in Peru. Confidential. 4 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Country Series, Ecuador, April–August, 1962.

The President continued by stating that certain necessary reforms have already been initiated in Ecuador. A new inheritance tax law has just been approved and a number of bills have been drafted and submitted for Congressional approval, covering income taxes, tariffs and fiscal and monetary reforms. During the first two or three years following these reforms, fiscal revenues will undoubtedly decrease and if no immediate external assistance is forthcoming these measures would be self-defeating, and agricultural and industrial productivity could not be given the needed impulse. The worst thing that can happen in Latin America is the disillusionment of the masses who hope the Alliance for Progress will help them increase their standards of living. Ecuador has submitted a request for assistance to finance its 1962 capital budget. During the last ten months Government revenue has been decreasing considerably and most public works projects have come to a complete standstill. The number of unemployed has increased by leaps and bounds and these masses constitute a dangerous and explosive time bomb. Therefore, President Arosemena specifically requested a $14 million loan from President Kennedy for his country's capital budget. He stated that Ecuador committed herself to undertake additional legal reforms and President Kennedy would be given a memorandum on these reforms tomorrow, July 24. A second memorandum would deal with another very important problem; namely, that of the development of educational facilities of the country. Three hundred million sucres will be necessary to implement a five-year educational program, which will have as its main purpose the eradication of illiteracy and a much greater attendance rate at schools for all Ecuadorean children. A third memorandum dealing with the problems of the municipality of Guayaquil will also be delivered tomorrow. The city has had several budgetary deficits because of misuse of municipal funds and at the present time funds aren't even available to pay for the collection of garbage.

President Kennedy stated that these were indeed difficult problems and he realized that sometimes countries dislike foreign officials who give advice on sensitive, internal matters—outsiders may be wrong. He spoke of our legislative and regulatory problems in rendering assistance and of the serious problem of the dollar drain problem resulting from our tremendous foreign assistance program over the last fifteen years. Furthermore, the Congress believes that Europe should share a greater part of the foreign aid burden. Because budgetary support is largely a dollar loss to the U.S. which can easily become a gold loss, it is this type of funds that are extremely difficult to obtain. On the other hand, funds are available for constructive, carefully planned development projects of a more lasting nature.

The President asked what could be done to increase the number of such projects. Ambassador Moscoso indicated that a $1 million project for school construction had already been approved and that studies were being made with regard to airport improvements and other public works projects. The main problem was the presentation of loan applications. The U.S. now hoped to assist Ecuador in the preparation of projects and loan applications in accordance with the requirements of existing assistance legislation.

Mr. Arosemena, the Manager of the Guayaquil Branch of the Central Bank, stated that the present Ecuadorean Administration had made tremendous efforts to put the country's economy back in order. An austerity policy has been in force and the Government is avoiding Central Bank financing so as to maintain a stable currency. However, if no assistance from the U.S. is forthcoming, the Government will have to turn to the Central Bank and the repercussions of such a move would be disastrous. The country has had very little inflation and a stable currency and Government. Many sacrifices have been made. Many public works have been curtailed and the number of unemployed people has risen drastically. Ecuador therefore needs the $14 million which might be a gold loss to the U.S., but it would help the country purchase American products in the future.

President Kennedy stated that it is important for the U.S. to counteract the dollar drain and to maintain world confidence in the dollar. The U.S., of course, realizes what the difficulties of Ecuador are and the only way to avoid disappointing people who have staked their hopes on the Alliance for Progress is by convincing the Congress that this Alliance is truly a joint effort. The President reemphasized that it was much easier to obtain funds for development projects than for budgetary financing.

President Arosemena said that Ecuador had believed that it would obtain $14 million and had been making plans on the basis of such assistance. However, a few days before his departure several American experts had visited Ecuador and asked him what the plans were for 1963 and 1964. He stated that he had hardly been able to make plans for 1962 and that plans for 1963 and 1964 and maybe 1970 were completely out of the question.

President Kennedy stated that $8 million had been granted to Ecuador and that the $14 million loan to which President Arosemena referred was to have been given "sympathetic consideration". This, however, did not mean that the loan had been approved. The Minister of the Treasury of Ecuador briefly outlined the history of the loan discussions and reemphasized that according to his Government's interpretation $8 million would have been approved for the year 1961 and $14 million would have been approved for 1962 for projects in the capital budget. The Government of Ecuador had made a number of plans on the basis of such an understanding. However, a few days ago, American technicians had visited Ecuador and had asked for specific long-term development projects. The Minister stated that only partial projects had been completed since the budget of 1962 was still in doubt. Now the capital budget is completely paralyzed. The Government has been taking measures and will take additional measures in the future. A technical body has been set up to carry out tax and administrative reforms. Civil servants are being trained. All these efforts would be fruitless without external financial support. The Country does not wish to devalue its currency again and it does not wish to ask for assistance, which might be inflationary, from its own Central Bank.

President Arosemena stated that he would bring up these problems again during these discussions tomorrow with other U.S. officials and that before leaving he would like to bring up another problem; namely, that of the old border dispute with Peru. When a military government has ruled Peru, it has always been very aggressive in its relations with Ecuador. Recent events have convinced President Arosemena that the highly unpopular military junta of Peru might try to “distract” public opinion by creating a serious border incident. The repercussions of such a move are very hard to foresee. The military are a curse in most of Latin America and even though Peru’s elections are a purely internal affair the possibility of military aggression should definitely not be overlooked. Ecuador supports Venezuela’s request for the establishment of some machinery to avoid militaristic coups in other Latin American countries.

President Kennedy strongly emphasized that the U.S. favors the resumption of normal constitutional processes in Peru and he hopes to know more about the Peruvian Government’s future in the next few days. He added that President Arosemena would have a chance to meet with Ambassador Moscoso again and discuss his country’s problems in more detail. Some of the other sister republics of South America, such as Argentina, Brazil, Chile and Peru also had considerable economic difficulties. If we look outside this Hemisphere, Vietnam, Korea and many other countries are also facing similar problems and the important thing is to try to obtain additional funds from the Congress to solve all of these needs.

President Arosemena ended the meeting thanking President Kennedy for his kind invitation and formally invited him to visit Ecuador “with or without a loan”.

103. Memorandum of conversation, July 24, between President Kennedy and President Arosemena¹

July 24, 1962

SUBJECT

Alliance for Progress

PARTICIPANTS

The President

Carlos Julio Arosemena, President of the Republic of Ecuador

Anthony J. Hervas, Interpreter

President Kennedy greeted President Arosemena and his party in his office and was presented with an album of photographs of the city of Quito by Mayor-elect Jorge Vallarino, and a gift for Mrs. Jacqueline Kennedy from Mrs. Vallarino. After the exchange of greetings, all those present with the exception of the two presidents and the interpreter, Mr. Hervas, left the President's office.

President Kennedy opened the conversation by saying that he agreed with the statement made by President Arosemena during their previous meeting on July 23 at the White House to the effect that there has been a great increase in the expectations of the peoples of this Hemisphere. He added, however, that no one has a perfect solution for the difficult problems to be solved, and pointed out that in this country also there are differences of opinion which result in changes of the political party in power.

The hope was expressed by President Kennedy that it will be possible to carry out in this Hemisphere a common effort toward progress. He noted that it is necessary to secure support for the Alliance for Progress program as well as financing for the Inter-American Development Bank. He added that it also is essential for Ecuador to adopt reform measures necessary to insure the success of these programs.

President Arosemena expressed his agreement with President Kennedy's remarks and added that he realized that there were problems within the United States arising from differences of opinion within and between the two major political parties. He also expressed his appreciation of the difficulties which must be overcome in achieving domestic support for United States foreign aid programs.

In reply, President Kennedy observed that there are two factors essential to the success of our joint undertaking, whether it be called the Punta del Este Agreement, the Alianza Para el Progreso or Operación Pan Americana; our countries must be linked together in a common effort and within each of our countries the necessary efforts must be made to adopt essential reforms and progressive legislation. These efforts must be given adequate momentum and support.

¹ Alliance for Progress. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Country Series, Ecuador, April-August, 1962.

President Arosemena stated that he agreed completely and that there was no difference in their views on this subject. He added that President Kubitschek of Brazil had originated this concept and that President Kennedy was carrying it out. He observed that this program offered President Kennedy an opportunity to assure his place in history. He further stated that Ecuador would cooperate to the fullest extent possible within its limitations.

President Kennedy referred to the feeling within the Hemisphere that, with the exception of the period of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's Administration, the United States has been identified with reactionary forces in Latin America rather than with progressive elements. He expressed the hope that the United States would be better understood in the Hemisphere for its positive contributions.

The meeting was concluded when President Kennedy presented an autographed copy of his latest book to President Arosemena.

104. Memorandum of conversation, July 24, between President Arosemena and Acting Secretary Ball and U.S. and Ecuadorean officials¹

July 24, 1962

SUBJECT

Meeting between President Arosemena and Acting Secretary Ball

PARTICIPANTS

Ecuador

President Carlos Julio Arosemena

Minister of Foreign Affairs Benjamin Peralta Paez

Ambassador Neftali Ponce-Miranda

Minister of Treasury Manuel Naranjo Toro

Former Minister of Economy Federico Intriago

¹ Financial and economic situation in Ecuador. Confidential. 4 pp. Kennedy Library, NSF, Country Series, Ecuador, April–August, 1962.

Guillermo Arosemena Coronel, Manager of the Guayaquil Branch of the Central Bank

Dr. Germanico Subia, Technical Director of the National Planning Board

United States

Acting Secretary George Ball

Assistant Secretary Edwin M. Martin

Ambassador Maurice M. Bernbaum

Mr. Moscoso, Assistant Administrator, AID

Mr. Belcher, Director of West Coast Affairs, State

Mr. Robinson, Director of West Coast Affairs, AID

Secretary Ball started the meeting by indicating that a joint group had been meeting earlier in the day to review some of the questions that had been raised during the White House meeting on July 23, and that Assistant Secretary Martin would proceed to brief President Arosemena with regard to the most recent developments.

Assistant Secretary Martin indicated that he had been very impressed with the outstanding character of the Ecuadorean delegation with which he and his advisers had discussed a number of fiscal and economic programs. These programs included a series of reforms that Ecuador had undertaken or was about to undertake and a review of some of the difficulties the country has had with the special emphasis on the need to control the expansion of credit and the economic repercussions of pending legislation affecting the collection of taxes and of import duties. There had also been a discussion of how Government income as a result of tax and tariff reforms would decrease during the next few months. The United States now felt that two specific questions would have to be answered in order to solve some of the difficulties that might be encountered in explaining the need for budgetary loans to Ecuador to the United States Congress. Mr. Martin reminded the President of the question that it so often asked; namely, why should the American taxpayer have to pay taxes to help other countries whose taxpayers refused to do the same? The two specific questions were: (1) To what extent can the amount of external budgetary support be decreased and still solve Ecuador's basic problem? It was the understanding of the United States that a reduction from $14 million to $7 million would not seriously hamper Ecuador's efforts and would still achieve the desired results. Secondly, in order to satisfy the American Congress and people, the United States would have to be assured that this would not become a permanent arrangement. The public should realize that this is a joint effort and that American assistance should go hand-in-hand with corrections of the causes of Ecuador's present capital budget deficiency.

Ambassador Moscoso reemphasized the main points made by Mr. Martin and stated that it would be very desirable to reach a solution before the 4:00 o'clock meeting of the two Presidents today.

President Arosemena thanked the Acting Secretary for his briefing and stated that it confirmed the interpretation given him by the members of his delegation. He expressed the hope that specific conclusions would be reached this afternoon. He stated that the discussion of Ecuador's problems had been very useful, that the time had come to solve the problems since another delay in their solution might well prove to be tragic. Ecuador understands that the United States has many problems in trying to aid all the countries in the world, and it also realizes that each country should solve its problems on the basis of its own efforts. However, without foreign assistance this process would be both slow and painful.

Mr. Salgado referred to a memorandum regarding Ecuador's economic development with a summary of its past and future loan applications. He distributed copies to all present.

President Arosemena asked Ambassador Ponce to bring up the question of Ecuador's sugar quota. Ambassador Ponce stated that Ecuador had been assigned a yearly quota of 25,000 tons of sugar which would benefit the country a great deal, although it was only a 2 or 2½ year arrangement. It was his understanding that during 1962 there would be a 300,000 ton deficit in supply of sugar to the United States which could not be covered by many of the supplying countries. The Ambassador therefore requested that sympathetic consideration be given to the possibilities of importing up to 41,000 tons of Ecuadorean sugar during this year which could be made available immediately since it was being stored in Guayaquil.

President Arosemena expressed his concern with regard to the recent Government changes in Peru and reiterated his fears as stated in his meeting with President Kennedy on July 23. He expressed his concern in the context of the United States position as one of the guarantors of the 1942 Rio Protocol. He said that Ecuador did not accept the Rio Protocol and considered it to be incompatible with the rule of law. However, the Peruvian-Ecuadorean dispute could and should be solved by peaceful means and Ecuador would drastically oppose the use of force to solve this paramount issue. "We will never become aggressors, but we will defend our country to the utmost", said President Arosemena. This would have to be done to avoid what he described as his country's mutilation in 1941.

Secretary Ball thanked the President and stated that he would take careful note of everything he had said and Assistant Secretary Martin emphasized that the United States could of course not approve any such action as the President feared.

Secretary Ball stated that he would like to bring up a problem of great interest to the United States—that of fisheries. During the month of June the Ecuadorean Government passed a decree setting up an area that was 125 miles long and 40 miles wide as an area in which, in effect, fishing by other than Ecuadoreans was prohibited. Aside from the fact that we do not agree on what constitutes territorial waters, tuna fishing off the coast of Ecuador was an important industry that benefited a number of western states in the United States. The United States realized that the Ecuadorean decree had not been enforced and we hoped that a satisfactory solution to this problem would be found through the efforts of the experts which we had sent to Ecuador to study the problem.

President Arosemena replied that he had discussed this problem with Ambassador Bernbaum in Quito and that he had reached an agreement with the Ambassador. The Ecuadorean decree would not be put into force until American experts in the field of fisheries had completed a study of the situation. He stated that the Ecuadorean decree was nothing but "a manifestation of a country's criteria as to the extent of its territorial waters". Ecuador was concerned with the possible disappearance of fish and the destruction of one of its richest natural resources. Ecuador could not oppose other countries if they wished to exploit the riches of the seas, but it would defend its own natural resources with a very logical sense of self-interest. He added that some experts in Ecuador, rightly or wrongly, claimed that "pirate ships" had been using dynamite in order to catch more tuna. This could cause great harm. Secretary Ball stated that it was his understanding that the report of the experts was about to be completed and he was certain that a satisfactory solution could be reached.

President Arosemena thanked the Secretary for giving him a chance to discuss some of his country's problems.

105. Memorandum of conversation, July 25, between President Kennedy and President Arosemena and U.S. and Ecuadorean officials¹

July 25, 1962

SUBJECT

Meeting between President Kennedy and President Arosemena

PARTICIPANTS

U.S. SIDE

President John F. Kennedy
Acting Secretary George Ball
U.S. Coordinator, Alliance for Progress, Teodoro Moscoso
Ambassador Maurice M. Bernbaum
Director of WST, Taylor G. Belcher
Interpreter, F. von Reigersberg

ECUADOREAN SIDE

President Carlos Julio Arosemena
Foreign Minister Benjamin Peralta Paez
Ambassador Neftali Ponce-Miranda
Treasury Minister Manuel Naranjo Toro
Former Minister of Economy Federico Intriago
Guillermo Arosemena Coronel, Manager of Guayaqual Branch, Central Bank of Ecuador

The President started the meeting by welcoming President Arosemena. He pointed out that this visit was an additional proof of American interest and concern for Hemispheric problems. The President also pointed out, however, that the U.S. has many problems these day and that it is important to realize that its resources are not unlimited.

President Arosemena thanked the President and stated that he wished to bring up several economic problems affecting his Country. He prefaced his remarks by noting the expressions of great concern on the part of the U.S. Government and of President Kennedy himself with regard to all of Latin America. Ecuador realizes that American assistance is not unlimited, and that it is subject to a number of internal political factors. President Arosemena said that there is one difficulty which all the assistance programs have in common; namely, paternalism. It is impossible to try to regulate or legislate on a number of subjects when you are miles away from the countries that will be affected by such actions. As an example, President Arosemena referred to an Inter-American Development Bank loan for the cultivation of African [illegible in the original], in which the Ecuadoreans have been compelled to utilize the funds in an area believed to be unsuitable to such crops.

¹ Economic problems and reform in Ecuador. Confidential. 4 pp. DOS, Presidential Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.

The President continued by stating that certain necessary reforms have already been initiated in Ecuador. A new inheritance tax law has just been approved and a number of bills have been drafted and submitted for Congressional approval, covering income taxes, tariffs and fiscal and monetary reforms. During the first two or three years following these reforms, fiscal revenues will undoubtedly decrease and if no immediate external assistance is forthcoming these measures would be self-defeating, and agricultural and industrial productivity could not be given the needed impulse. The worst thing that can happen in Latin America is the disillusionment of the masses who hope the Alliance for Progress will help them increase their standards of living. Ecuador has submitted a request for assistance to finance its 1962 capital budget. During the last ten months Government revenue has been decreasing considerably and most public works projects have come to a complete standstill. The number of unemployed has increased by leaps and bounds and those masses constitute a dangerous and explosive time bomb. Therefore, President Arosemena specifically requested a $14 million loan from President Kennedy for his Country's capital budget. He stated that Ecuador committed herself to undertake additional legal reforms and President Kennedy would be given a memorandum on these reforms tomorrow, July 24. A second memorandum would deal with another very important problem; namely, that of the development of educational facilities of the Country. Three hundred million sucres will be necessary to implement a five-year educational program, which will have as its main purpose the eradication of illiteracy and a much greater attendance rate at schools for all Ecuadorean children. A third memorandum dealing with the problems of the municipality of Guayaquil will also be delivered tomorrow. The city has had several budgetary deficits because of misuse of municipal funds and at the present time funds aren't even available to pay for the collection of garbage.

President Kennedy stated that these were indeed difficult problems and he realized that sometimes countries dislike foreign officials who give advice on sensitive, internal matters—outsiders may be wrong. He spoke of our legislative and regulatory problems in rendering assistance and of the serious problem of the dollar drain problem resulting from our tremendous foreign assistance program over the last fifteen years. Furthermore, the Congress believes that Europe should share a greater part of the foreign aid burden. Because budgetary support is largely a dollar loss to the U.S. which can easily become a gold loss, it is this type of funds that are extremely difficult to obtain. On the other hand, funds are available for constructive, carefully planned development projects of a more lasting nature.

The President asked what could be done to increase the number of such projects. Ambassador Moscoso indicated that a $1 million project for school construction had already been approved and that studies were being made with regard to airport improvements and other public works projects. The main problem was the presentation of loan applications. The U.S. now hoped to assist Ecuador in the preparation of projects and loan applications in accordance with the requirements of existing assistance legislation.

Mr. Arosemena, the Manager of the Guayaquil Branch of the Central Bank, stated that the present Ecuadorean Administration had made tremendous efforts to put the Country's economy back in order. An austerity policy has been in force and the Government is avoiding Central Bank financing so as to maintain a stable currency. However, if no assistance from the U.S. is forthcoming, the Government will have to turn to the Central Bank and the repercussions of such a move would be disastrous. The Country has had very little inflation and a stable currency and Government. Many sacrifices have been made. Many public works have been curtailed and the number of unemployed people has risen drastically. Ecuador therefore needs the $14 million which might be a gold loss to the U.S., but it would help the Country purchase American products in the future.

President Kennedy stated that it is important for the U.S. to counteract the dollar drain and to maintain world confidence in the dollar. The U.S., of course, realizes what the difficulties of Ecuador are and the only way to avoid disappointing people who have staked their hopes on the Alliance for Progress is by convincing the Congress that this Alliance is truly a joint effort. The President reemphasized that it was much easier to obtain funds for development projects than for budgetary financing.

President Arosemena said that Ecuador had believed that it would obtain $14 million and had been making plans on the basis of such assistance. However, a few days before his departure several American experts had visited Ecuador and asked him what the plans were for 1963 and 1964. He stated that he had hardly been able to make plans for 1962 and that plans for 1963 and 1964 and maybe 1970 were completely out of the question.

President Kennedy stated that $8 million had been granted to Ecuador and that the $14 million loan to which President Arosemena referred was to have been given "sympathetic consideration". This, however, did not mean that the loan had been approved. The Minister of the Treasury of Ecuador briefly outlined the history of the loan discussions and reemphasized that according to his Government's interpretation $8 million would have been approved for the year 1961 and $14 million would have been approved for 1962 for projects in the capital budget. The Government of Ecuador had made a number of plans on the basis of such an understanding. However, a few days ago, American technicians had visited Ecuador and had asked for specific long-term development projects. The Minister stated that only partial projects had been completed since the budget of 1962 was still in doubt. Now the capital budget is completely paralyzed. The Government has been taking measures and will take additional measures in the future. A technical body has been set up to carry out tax and administrative reforms. Civil servants are being trained. All these efforts would be fruitless without external financial support. The Country does not wish to devalue its currency again and it does not wish to ask for assistance, which might be inflationary, from its own Central Bank.

President Arosemena stated that he would bring up these problems again during these discussions tomorrow with other U.S. officials and that before leaving he would like to bring up another problem; namely, that of the old border dispute with Peru. When a military government has ruled Peru, it has always been very aggressive in its relations with Ecuador. Recent events have convinced President Arosemena that the highly unpopular military junta of Peru might try to "distract" public opinion by creating a serious border incident. The repercussions of such a move are very hard to foresee. The military are a curse in most of Latin America and even though Peru's elections are a purely internal affair the possibility of military aggression should definitely not be overlooked. Ecuador supports Venezuela's request for the establishment of some machinery to avoid militaristic coups in other Latin American countries.

President Kennedy strongly emphasized that the U.S. favors the resumption of normal constitutional processes in Peru and he hopes to know more about the Peruvian Government's future in the next few days. He added that President Arosemena would have a chance to meet with Ambassador Moscoso again and discuss his Country's problems in more detail. Some of the other sister republics of South America, such as Argentina, Brazil, Chile and Peru also had considerable economic difficulties. If we look outside this Hemisphere, Vietnam, Korea and many other countries are also facing similar problems and the important thing is to try to obtain additional funds from the Congress to solve all of these needs.

President Arosemena ended the meeting thanking President Kennedy for his kind invitation and formally invited him to visit Ecuador "with or without a loan".

106. Memorandum from Brubeck to Dungan, January 24¹

January 24, 1963

MEMORANDUM FOR MR. RALPH DUNGAN
THE WHITE HOUSE

THROUGH

Mr. McGeorge Bundy

SUBJECT

Your Request for a copy of the Contingency Paper on Ecuador

In accordance with your request to Assistant Secretary Martin I am transmitting to you a copy of the Contingency Paper on Ecuador recently prepared by ARA and approved by Under Secretary McGhee. The paper was transmitted to Embassy Quito for comment. The Embassy has indicated its general approval. The paper has not been cleared outside the Department of State but will be discussed at the Latin American Policy Committee meeting on Ecuador on January 31.

/s/ Howard Fumas
for

William H. Brubeck
Executive Secretary

Enclosure

Contingency Paper on Ecuador

Background

There is reason to believe that President Arosemena will not be able to complete his term of office scheduled to end on September 1, 1964. This paper is designed to review the contingencies which conceivably might occur in the latter eventuality and to set forth recommended U.S. positions thereon.

[text not declassified]

Arosemena's success in maintaining himself in office as long as he has is due to a number of fortuitous circumstances as well as to his own physical resiliency and political ingenuity. To date at least, his opponents in the various non-communist political movements have been unable to act in unison or with sufficient vigor and despatch to oust him. In repeated instances when the President was physically unable to resist any move against him, the procrastination and indecisiveness of the opposition allowed him sufficient time to recover physically and regain control of the situation. Perhaps the most critical factor in the President's staying power has been the frequently declared determination of the armed forces to uphold constitutional procedures. The position taken by the armed forces has effectively limited Arosemena's opponents to seeking constitutional means of ousting him. These efforts have revolved around the constitutional provision which states, inter alia, that the President shall cease to exercise the duties of his office when he is declared to be permanently incapacitated mentally or physically.

¹ Transmits a copy of the Contingency Paper on Ecuador. Secret. 6 pp. DOS, CF, 722.00/1-2463.

In view of the progressively more serious consequences of his alcoholism, both physical and political, it is believed likely that a change in government based on the constitutional provision relating to physical and mental incapacity is impending. The most likely contingencies in the above eventuality are presented below.

a) Accession of Vice President Varca to Presidency

The constitutional successor to Arosemena is Vice President Varca. Although for some time under a cloud because of alleged complicity in an arms purchase scandal, the Vice President recently was cleared of the charges by an overwhelming vote of the Ecuadorean Senate. Varca is a former Army Lt. Col., once served as Assistant Military Attaché in Washington, and has held the positions of Commanding General of the National Police, Minister of Defense, and Senator.

The Vice President's forceful action during the recent Cuban crisis in assuring GOE support for the U.S. position at a time when President Arosemena was incapacitated by a drinking bout is a hopeful indication of what might be expected from his prospective administration.

Varca is known to have presidential ambitions and field reports indicate some military and political support for his accession to the presidency should Arosemena be unable to continue in office. The Vice President's main strength lies in the priority of his claim to succeed to the presidency under the constitution. The constitutional question is particularly important in view of the above cited attitude of the armed forces. Nevertheless it is possible that the military and political leaderships might find Varca unacceptable and reach agreement on a compromise successor to Arosemena.

Recommended U.S. Position

Unless there is determined and widespread popular opposition, the U.S. should support Vice President Varca's accession to the presidency as the logical and constitutional successor to Arosemena.

b) Accession of Compromise Candidate to Presidency

There is still resistance among some political elements, particularly the rightists, to the possible accession of Vice President Varca to the presidency. Varca, it is claimed, is still tainted by the allegations made against him in the arms purchase scandal and therefore is not a suitable candidate for the presidency. It is therefore conceivable that Varca might be induced to step aside for a compromise candidate. The chances for this contingency might be enhanced if the expected ouster of President Arosemena encountered difficulties and required concerted action by a number of political and military elements. Any effort at this time to identify possible compromise candidates by name would be highly speculative at best.

Recommended U.S. Position

Support adherence to constitutional procedures to the extent possible under existing circumstances and urge upon military and political leaders the importance of selecting a political moderate who will maintain Ecuador's recently expressed concern in the OAS over the menace of international communism in this hemisphere and continue the efforts begun under the Alliance for Progress toward social reform and economic development.

c) Report by Arosemena to the Military

It is conceivable that faced with the likelihood of being ousted and believing that he has lost any hope of continued support from the Democratic Front, Arosemena may attempt to use the armed forces to stay in office in the face of widespread popular opinion that he resign or be ousted. It is known that Arosemena's wholesale shuffling of the armed forces high command was designed to eliminate potential threats from that direction to his continuance in office. In large measure the President's efforts have been successful, at least in so far as the top echelon of the armed forces is concerned. In the event the degree of his physical incapacity is doubtful, Arosemena may attempt to use the military to frustrate efforts to remove him from office. He could under such circumstances call upon the military to uphold the constitution and support him on the grounds that he obviously is not "permanently incapacitated".

The degree to which the military might support Arosemena under these circumstances, particularly in the face of widespread popular feeling to remove him from office, probably would be limited. Assuming that the military high command did support the President and were themselves successful in retaining the support of the bulk of the armed forces, it seems highly doubtful that Arosemena could for very long maintain himself in office solely with the backing of the military. Nor is it likely that the latter would for very long, if at all, continue to support the President in the face of widespread popular feeling that his usefulness to the country had come to an end.

Recommended U.S. Position

To make it forcefully clear to military leaders and to Arosemena that apart from the issue of constitutionality the best interests of the country are not served by attempting to thwart the will of the majority of the country's democratic political elements.

d) Appeal by Arosemena to the Extreme Left

In the event that Arosemena believes that he has lost the support of both the Democratic Front and the military it is conceivable that he might resort to making a demagogic appeal for help to the extreme left. This contingency in particular could produce serious disorders. It is not certain that the extreme left would take any overt action in support of the President under such circumstances in view of the almost certain reaction of the military and democratic political groups. In any such eventuality it is believed that the military would be capable of controlling the situation and assuring that the extreme left did not come into power. Any such effort by Arosemena would be one of desperation and probably would ensure his immediate departure from the political scene.

Recommended U.S. Position

Oppose any effort to establish the extreme left as the political base for Arosemena's continuance in office. Invite the Ecuadorean military to request emergency assistance from the United States deemed necessary to maintain order. Inform appropriate democratic military and political leaders that the ouster of Arosemena would not adversely effect United States-Ecuadorean relations.

e) Return of Former President Velasco

In the event that a more suitable successor to Arosemena cannot be agreed upon, it is conceivable that former President Velasco may be called upon to complete the balance of his term which began in September 1960. Velasco's supporters maintain that he did not formally resign in November 1961 and therefore is still Ecuador's constitutional president, a position which is debatable. There is reason to believe, however, that Velasco would prefer to wait until 1964 and run for a full four year term rather than complete the balance of the term he began in 1960. Velasco already has declared himself to be a candidate in 1964. Many seasonal Ecuadorean political observers believe that he still retains his remarkable hold on the Ecuadorean masses and has an excellent chance of becoming President for an unprecedented fifth term.

Recommended U.S. Position

Accept Velasco's return to office, convince him of the genuine desire of the United States to assist Ecuador to achieve the social and economic reforms which he himself has so eloquently espoused in the past, and attempt to use his popular appeal to the Ecuadorean masses as a vehicle for arousing a national sense of purpose for achieving genuine reforms. At the same time it should be made abundantly clear that any return to a neutralist position on the Cuban issue by Ecuador will have serious consequences on U.S.-Ecuadorean relations.

f) Military Coup

While unlikely, it is conceivable that events subsequent to the ouster of Arosemena, particularly the inability of the military and political leaderships to agree on a successor, could result in an attempt to establish a military junta in control of the government. While there are strong factors against such an eventuality it is always possible that the example set by Peru might appeal to Ecuador's military leadership as a solution to the problem of naming a successor to Arosemena. Even if such a contingency did occur, it is not believed that it would be of long duration. The marked tendency of the Ecuadorean military in recent years to play a passive role in politics, to avoid interfering arbitrarily in civilian government, and to uphold the constitution make it likely that a military coup would be of a short duration, for limited purposes, and would provide for a return to civilian government within a short time.

Recommended U.S. Position

Extend recognition to the Junta as soon as several other OAS states have done so, assuming that the Junta's basic orientation does not conflict with the goals of the Alliance for Progress and the recent stand taken by Ecuador in the OAS on the Cuban issue. Exert our influence for the earliest possible return to democratic, constitutional government.

107. Telegram 17 from Quito, July 11¹

Quito, July 11, 1963

Emergency. Action Department 17; Information Bogota 3, Lima 2, Guayaquil Unnumbered. Department please pass to US CINCSO for POLAD, also ACSI and AFCIN. RE telecons with Belcher.

Pressure building in military for replacement Arosemena culminated today in announcement by chiefs three armed services of Arosemena's ouster and formation of military junta. Five-man junta includes Navy Commander Captain Ramon Castro Jijon, Army Commander Colonel Luis Cabrera Sevilla, Air Force Commander Lt Colonel Guillermo Freile Posso, Armed Forces Senator Colonel Marcos Gandara Enriquez who also head of War Academy, and Colonel Santiago Morochz, Subsecretary of Defense. Proclamation, issued by junta at 3:30 PM, stated objectives of change are to crush communism and end terrorism, carry out constitutional and structural reforms, and put into effect social and economic reforms. Proclamation also placed country under martial law, prohibited strikes and demonstrations, and suspended constitutional guarantees. Text of proclamation sent separately.

Following a period of uncertainty, during which President holed up in Presidential Palace with support of Presidential Guard, presumably awaiting the effect popular pro-constitutional demonstrations in Guayaquil and hopefully in Quito, President finally convinced, during visit of three armed services chiefs, to relinquish his office to junta and leave for airport where he flown out at twilight to either Cali or Panama.

Info regarding pro-constitutional reaction sketchy and not yet clear. Reports from Guayaquil indicate that large pro-constitutional rallies being led by Mayor Bucaram. Also reported that various prominent citizens have issued an appeal for return to constitutional government and that Vice-President Varea has called an extraordinary meeting of the Congress to meet tomorrow afternoon. Junta reaction has been announcement that extraordinary session will not be permitted and that a constituent assembly will soon be called. Varea reportedly arrested and to be deported.

Curfew imposed as of 9:00 PM tonight.

Events arose from incident at banquet given last night at Presidential Palace by Arosemena in honor of Admiral Wilfred McNeil, president of the Grace Lines. President most noticeably drunk while reading speech during decoration Admiral McNeil. He made impromptu speech later at dinner in which he said he liked American public but that American Govt was exploiting Ecuador and Latin America. This naturally fell like a bombshell among official guests who were already shocked and ashamed over President's condition. In response to President's assurances to me that no personal offense was meant, I said that I could not agree with what he had said, and that the American Govt was the reflection of the American people. Arosemena staggered from the dinner table shortly thereafter and did not reappear.

¹ Announcement of five-man military junta ouster of Arosemena government. Confidential. 9 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Ecuador, July to November, 1963.

In accepting apologies on behalf of GOE from all ministers present and other dignitaries after dinner, I attempted play down incident, saying USG has no quarrel with Ecuador or its people, and that President's statement while drunk would not affect my attitude or that of USG toward continued good relations with Ecuador. The extreme concern over effect of incident to those with whom I spoke was apparent, despite my assurances. I expressed the same assurances this morning to MinPublic Works Salem who concerned that incident might effect pending consortium road loan. According FonMin Peralta, Arosemena's blast due resent over UPI press article appearing same day in which Felando of American Tunaboat Association quoted as saying at San Diego that fishing negotiations failed due GOE bad faith and recommending embargo on imports fish products from Ecuador. Resentment also fed, according Peralta, by Panama hat problem.

Rumor already circulating in Guayaquil that coup undertaken at my insistence due insult USG. Dept alerted to possibility that this may be used in commie propaganda here and elsewhere.

Junta objectives explained to Mil Att and to me during visit today by Colonel Gandara. He said military disgusted by events last night and decided this morning to put an end to "disgraceful situation." Since preparations had already been underway for such a move in armed services, it took little time to put them into effect. Consideration given to Arosemena replace by Vice President Varea but idea discarded in face almost unanimous opposition. Presenting a partial preview of later junta proclamation, Gandara said junta proposed initiate new regime with revision laws to outlaw communism and put teeth into anti-communist measures. Planned promptly to call a constituent assembly to draft new constitution. Proposed take advantage of opportunity to effect clean sweep of Ecuador's outmoded social structure through agrarian, administrative and fiscal reforms to extent possible.

Gandara stated in response my query re restoration constitutional govt that current Congress could not be relied upon to make necessary changes in view its demonstrated incapacity, with result that job would have to be done by junta with collaboration patriotic and competent civilians. Although constituent assembly would be called promptly, he estimated that elections could not be held before about two years. He assured me that military sufficiently unified to feel satisfied that junta could carry on for this period of time in face possible leftist, anti-junta reactions.

He repeated junta would merely represent military facade over civilian govt which should be able count support people through effective implementation reform measures while at same time controlling communist subversion.

I emphasized importance of an early return to constitutionality. I said US Govt wanted to help Ecuador and that assurance of return to constitutionalism within reasonably prompt period of time would facilitate always sticky problem of recognition, while determination of new govt to push social and economic reform would facilitate collaboration under the Alliance for Progress. Gandara replied he would not be honest if he said return to constitutionalism could be accomplished in six months because of needed structural changes in social, political and economic systems could not be effectively worked out in so short a period. He said junta did not want to repeat mistake of Peruvian junta which missed opportunity to institute widespread reforms required by Peru. Without arguing, I repeated a few times my original point on the importance of assurances of prompt return to constitutionality and implementation of social and economic reforms. I drew his attention to successful results of forward-looking attitude of Salvadoran military on constitutional and reform problems.

Colonel McRochz, another member of junta, telephoned me later. He said decision change govt taken in belief it essential for Ecuador's well-being and honor, and that crack-down on commies would be amongst first moves of junta. I repeated position told Gandara. I also noted wisdom of reform program since purely negative position against communist would leave door open communist-stimulated reaction, whereas immediately emphasized program of reforms and prompt return to constitutionality could reassure public and gain its confidence.

Visit from Alfredo Albornoz, independent liberal ex-Min govt, confirmed Gandara's assurance of high level civilian cabinet and understood that names various other well-known civilians being considered and approached. Said had been assured of prompt return to constitutionalism through near future convocation constituent assembly to reform outmoded constitution and then elect new president. Albornoz agreed on importance promptly announced guarantees of return to constitutionalism and said would push this further talks. He optimistic over future and confident junta in control situation. He discounted importance congressional reaction and thought political parties would fall in line. Albornoz was hard hitting Min govt who left govt last year due Arosemena's refusal clean house in govt.

[less than 1 line not declassified] reaction to current developments:

1. Directorate of CTE meeting tonight 7:00 PM to consider calling general strike July 12.

2. Commie youth instructed to hold street demonstrations tonight after 9:00 PM curfew. Slogan will be “poder al pueblo; abajo la dictadura militar.”

3. Junta has issued order to arrest all known communists.

Comment: [less than 1 line not declassified] junta proclamations have in my opinion over-emphasized commie problem, [2 lines not declassified]. Aside from demonstrations in Guayaquil led by Mayor Bucaram, we have not as yet heard from other elements who, while opposed to Arosemena, may be expected also to oppose a military junta. Vice-President Varea has apparently been attempting to capitalize on this sentiment, particularly in Congress, in hope that he would be logical beneficiary under constitution. He has apparently been put out of the way. We should have some idea tomorrow of the congressional reaction and that of the political parties. If strong enough, these could conceivably influence a greater readiness for a prompt return to constitutionality. We shall of course press this point in further conversations. Strength of leftist reaction will undoubtedly be important factor for future.

Although US support clearly being solicited, question of recognition has not yet arisen. We propose, as the opportunities present themselves, to continue pressing for a prompt return to constitutional government, as well as guarantees that the new govt will honor its international commitments, including obligations under the Alliance for Progress. No problem anticipated with respect latter two points.

Although initially the three armed services and their commanders in the junta display high degree of unity and resolve, it is doubtful this unified facade will persist indefinitely, and it seems likely that questions of personal and service interest will eventually be divisive.
[text not declassified]

Bernbaum

108. Memorandum of conversation, July 17, between Rusk and Ambassador Ponce¹

July 17, 1963

SUBJECT

Informal Call on Secretary by Ecuadorean Ambassador

PARTICIPANTS

The Secretary
Edwin M. Martin, Assistant Secretary ARA
Ambassador Ponce, Ecuador

The Secretary opened the conversation by mentioning that this would have to be considered an informal discussion between old friends in view of the fact that we had not established diplomatic relations with the new regime. Ponce said he understood and agreed fully.

The Secretary expressed the hope that the new regime would announce its plans for restoring constitutional government soon and expressed the hope that this would include a reference to elections, perhaps in June 1964 when they were originally to have been held. The Ambassador said he thought it might be possible to hold elections at that time, but he rather thought that what needed doing before the holding of elections would take long enough that elections at that time would only be those to the constituent assembly and that one would have to expect the Assembly to spend 4 to 5 months drawing up the constitution and electing the first president to serve under it. He pointed out this dual role for the constituent assembly had a considerable amount of precedent in Ecuadoran history.

The Secretary also stressed the great importance, to the future of Ecuador and to its external relations, of the junta respecting civil liberties, the rights of assembly and the free press and the freedom of all political parties to campaign preceding any election. The Ambassador said he agreed fully and felt sure that this was the approach which the junta would follow. He indicated that he would not have accepted a position in the junta if he had believed it was going to be a dictatorial regime and did not intend to restore civil liberties and a constitutional democratic government. He pointed out that there were to be six civilians out of the seven member cabinet and that those who had been selected so far were all known to him as able and responsible people. The Secretary welcomed this report and commented that he thought that in the current world one had to distinguish between authoritarian regimes and regimes in which there was a monopoly control at the top for a limited period pending a restoration of democratic government.

¹ Informal discussion of new regime and future of Ecuador. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Ecuador, July to November 1963.

The Secretary mentioned the usefulness of Ecuador making available to the pertinent OAS bodies the information they had recently secured in connection with the arrests of leftists returning from training in Cuba. He thought it important that the Hemisphere know what the Cubans were doing in this regard and see evidence of the possibility of frustrating their aims. The Ambassador said that he was sure the new regime was strongly anticommunist in character and determined to prevent communist subversion and would be happy to cooperate in this.

The Secretary referred to the problem of new members in the OAS and hoped the Ambassador could take a look at the Ecuadoran position on this issue. The Ambassador said it was a question with which he had been familiar for several years and he hoped to be able to get out new instructions before the end of this week.

The Secretary referred to the recent differences between the United States and Ecuador on the fishing question, and said he thought it of great importance to work out arrangements which would keep the temperature down in both Ecuador and the United States and permit maintenance of our traditionally friendly relations. The Secretary pointed out the concessions which we have made with respect to the 12 mile limit and the importance of working something out from the Ecuadoran side on the questions of base lines and licenses.

Having pointed out that these matters could only be discussed when relations had taken place, the Secretary said he could not predict when this would happen but hoped conditions would be established which would permit it in the not too distant future. He said there was a great deal to be done in Ecuador, and he was happy to see the junta indicating that they wished to tackle some of the problems there. We were anxious to be able to cooperate with them in dealing with these issues in the framework of the Alliance for Progress.

The Secretary inquired whether the Ambassador had made any plans to attend the UN General Assembly for the first couple of weeks. The Ambassador indicated he had not thought about it, but, if it were desirable, he would try to get there. The Secretary said it was an occasion when a great many Foreign Ministers came to New York and he thought there were advantages in the club of people holding this [illegible in the original] getting together for exchanges from time to time, as had been done in recent years at the opening of the General Assembly.

109. Circular telegram CA-73 to certain American Republic posts, July 18¹

July 18, 1963

Dept's CA-73.

USG considers Ecuadorean Junta has demonstrated ability retain effective control, has restored most essential civil liberties, has given satisfactory assurances re acceptance of international obligations and desire carry out AFP. Major remaining point which US would like to have in hand is public statement by Junta indicating intention return to civilian government via constitutional procedures within approximately one year, thereby not departing significantly from previously scheduled elections in June 1964 and following basic Argentine and Peru time schedules. However USG will not extend recognition until at least several other Latin American countries have done so. You may indicate foregoing in consultations with host government.

Rusk

¹ U.S. withholding recognition new Government in Ecuador until junta indicates intention to return to civilian government and several other Latin American countries have recognized Ecuador. Confidential. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Ecuador, July to November 1963.

110. Circular telegram 170 to certain American Republic posts,
July 26¹

July 26, 1963

On assumption several other Hemisphere countries recognize Ecuadorean junta by July 30-31 U.S. Government planning extend recognition July 31. You are requested informally consult host government re above timing and any developments their plans on recognition. Action posts other than BA, Santiago and Rio may also say U.S. understands Argentina, Chile and Brazil considering recognition by July 31.

¹ U.S. plan to recognize Ecuadorean junta by July 31 if several other Hemisphere countries do so by then. Confidential. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Ecuador, July to November, 1963.

Rusk

111. Memorandum of conversation, August 7, between President Kennedy and Foreign Minister Ponce¹

August 7, 1963

SUBJECT

Farewell Call of departing Ecuadorean Ambassador, the New Foreign Minister

PARTICIPANTS

The President

Dr. Neftalí PONCE Miranda, Foreign Minister of Ecuador

Mr. Ralph A. Dungan, Special Assistant to the President

Mr. Taylor G. Belcher, Director, Office of West Coast Affairs

Dr. Ponce thanked the President for receiving him on such short notice, saying that aside from wishing to say good-by and thank him for all his kindness and hospitality during his two years here, he was under instructions from his Government to deliver a message from the Junta. He wanted to emphasize the desire of the new Government to work quickly and closely with the United States in achieving the goals of the Alliance for Progress. His Government was hopeful that they could get off to a good start utilizing the enthusiasm and the determination which were now apparent in the country. He said that for the first time it was obvious that there was a will on the part of the Government and the people as a whole to move forward.

The President inquired regarding the pending development programs, and Mr. Dungan said that there were a number in the pipeline which should be able to move ahead rapidly now that the new Government was organized.

The Foreign Minister referred to the fact that a number of very capable civilians were participating both in the Cabinet and in senior administrative positions, and said that with such talent in the Government many of the obstacles which had been apparent in the previous administration would disappear.

¹ Farewell call of departing Ecuadorean Ambassador (the new Foreign Minister); Alliance for Progress; subversion of Communist activities in Ecuador. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Ecuador, July to November, 1963.

Dr. Ponce then read a translation of the message received from the Junta covering the following three points:

1. Cooperation with the United States in the Alliance for Progress.
2. A readiness to join with the United States and other American Republics in moves to control communist subversive activities.
3. A firm desire to reach an early solution to the fisheries problem.

In response to the President's inquiry as to possible solutions to the problem, the Foreign Minister said only that he was certain there was an area of agreement and that he intended to explore this fully immediately upon his return to Ecuador this week end. He would then engage in further conversations with Ambassador Bernbaum.

With regard to the communist problem, the President expressed his gratification at the willingness of the Ecuadorean Government to move to control subversion. He asked the Foreign Minister to comment on the position of the Communist Party in Ecuador. Dr. Ponce said that the Party itself had been outlawed by the new Government, that it was small and, with the exception of a number of extremists who were very active and vocal, it had not achieved any success. On the contrary, whenever it had attempted some action, it had failed with the exception of certain isolated instances of violence. He felt that with the recent moves to outlaw the Party and challenge its leaders, plus a determination to move forward in the eradication of social and economic evils in the country, the Party had no prospect of prospering.

The President inquired as to Dr. Ponce's possible replacement here. The Foreign Minister said that agrément had just been requested for Dr. José Antonio Correa, a career diplomat with previous experience at the UN and at Washington.

The President wished Dr. Ponce well in his new job and expressed his pleasure in knowing that someone who knew us and our problems so well would be in authority in Quito.

El Salvador

112. Memorandum from Mann to Rusk, January 25¹

January 25, 1961

SUBJECT

Overthrow of Government in El Salvador

According to reports received from [less than 1 line not declassified], the Military Attaché and our Chargé in El Salvador, the Junta Government of El Salvador was overthrown last night by the Salvadoran Army. There is apparently a tight control on communications. The reports are scanty and indicate that San Salvador is quiet this morning and that there is no indication of danger to U.S. citizens. The fragmentary reports indicate that the coup is a rightist one directed against the communists and against ex-President Osorio who is a moderate.

If this proves to be a rightist coup and the Army succeeds in stabilizing the situation it means that the immediate problem which I mentioned in staff meeting this morning of coping with a rapid communist build-up in the country is temporarily in hand. This would mean, on the other hand, that we have a new problem of convincing the new government that it should carry out elections under appropriate safeguards and institute needed reform.

Finally, we have received reports that Castro might attempt to intervene in Salvador if this kind of a situation develops.

¹ Overthrow of the Junta Government in El Salvador by the Salvadoran Army. Confidential. 1 p. DOS, CF, 716.00/1-2561.

113. Memorandum from Mann to Rusk, February 9¹

February 9, 1961

SUBJECT

Recognition of New Government of El Salvador

Discussion

On January 25, 1961, a military coup d'état overthrew the Junta of government of El Salvador which had assumed power by a similar coup on October 26, 1960, and replaced it with a new "Civilian-Military Directorate". The Junta had been showing signs of favoring or being susceptible to the growth of Cuban and communist strength in El Salvador. The new government is avowedly anti-communist and favorably oriented toward the U.S. The Directorate government now appears in effective control of the country, has indicated its desire to cooperate closely with the U.S., to carry out necessary social and agrarian reforms in the spirit of the Act of Bogota, and to hold early elections with a view to returning El Salvador to constitutional government.

While it is in our interest to recognize the new government, I believe we should defer our action until some additional Latin American countries have recognized to blunt the probable allegation that the new government is the result of United States' intervention. To encourage such action by these countries, as well as by others having resident diplomatic representatives in El Salvador, I believe we should inform these governments of our intentions along the lines suggested in the attached telegram (Tab A). This would afford them the opportunity to proceed with recognition in advance should they desire to do so.

Our Ambassador to El Salvador has recommended that we recognize the new government about February 15 and has reported that Guatemala, Nicaragua, Honduras, Austria, Germany, Argentina, Spain, and Nationalist China have already recognized.

Recommendation

That you sign the attached suggested circular telegram informing certain other governments of our intent to recognize the new government of El Salvador on or about February 15.

Attachment:

Suggested circular telegram (Tab A).

¹ Recommendation to recognize new Government in El Salvador on February 15. Confidential. 1 p. DOS, CF, 716.02/2-961.

114. Memorandum from Mann to Rusk, February 11, transmitting a memorandum from Rusk to the President¹

February 11, 1961

To: The Secretary

Through: S/S

From: ARA—Mr. Maan

SUBJECT

Recognition of the New Government of El Salvador

There is attached a suggested memorandum to the President. My thought is that recognition will be somewhat controversial and an announcement, especially by the President, might be somewhat counterproductive in terms of our effort to establish a more liberal, forward looking image of the United States in Latin America.

If you agree, I recommend that you sign the attached memorandum to the President.

Tab A

SUBJECT

Announcement of Recognition of New Government of El Salvador

On further reflection I believe it would be preferable to play in a low key our decision to recognize the new Junta Government of El Salvador.

The takeover by the Junta arrested a dangerous drift in El Salvador toward Castroism and Communism and it has promised to hold elections and to institute needed reforms. We believe that by recognition we will have our maximum opportunity to influence the new government to adopt a liberal approach to its very difficult economic and social problems. Nevertheless, Venezuela, Costa Rica and possibly Colombia may not recognize the Junta for some time on the theory that recognition should not be extended to governments which come into power by force. Some liberal elements in Salvador and in other parts of Latin America are not too happy with the new regime.

¹ Recommendation that no formal statement be made by the President or the Department at time of recognition of Salvadoran Government. Confidential. 1 pp. DOS, CF, 716.02/2-1161.

On balance, I therefore recommend that no formal statement be made at the time of recognition by either you or the Department.

Dean Rusk

115. Telegram 321 to San Salvador, February 13¹

February 13, 1961

Downs as Chargé is instructed to request appointment for February 15 to deliver following note of recognition:

QUOTE

I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of Your Excellency's note No. A-800-D-261, dated January 27, 1961, informing me of the establishment of a Civil-Military Directorate on January 25, 1961, which assumed full legislative, executive and judicial powers. Your Excellency's note states that the new Government intends to comply strictly with all treaties and conventions to which El Salvador has adhered, to respect its obligations and commitments, and to maintain the closest possible friendly relations with democratic governments.

My Government notes with pleasure the statements in the Civil-Military Directorate's Manifesto of January 27, 1961, to the effect that the fundamental objective of the Directorate is to bring about free and democratic elections. It is also gratifying to note the Directorate's determination to work for the resolution of existing economic and social problems.

In view of the assurances set forth in your note, and the objectives proclaimed by the manifesto of the Civil-Military Directorate, my Government has instructed me to state that it is pleased to extend recognition to the Civil-Military Directorate as the Provisional Government of El Salvador.

Accept, Excellency, etc. END QUOTE

Inform Department promptly of changes in date and manner delivery. It is expected the President will make a statement regarding recognition new government at his press conference seven p.m. EST, February 15.

Rusk

¹ Transmits text of note of recognition of Salvadoran Government. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 716.02/2-1361.

116. Telegram 651 from San Salvador, April 13¹

San Salvador, April 13, 1961

Reference: Department telegram 379.

To assist directorate achieve its goals, which we believe in full accord our own policies and objectives in Latin America, it is essential for US and international lending agencies act promptly on principal requests for financial assistance as they are submitted. We are gratified that Department already helping in negotiations for Export-Import Bank loan airport improvement. After that there seems to be no other single project so advanced in planning and so worthy of immediate support as housing development on Ilopango road (G-99). Gonzalez who is moving force in that scheme is presently at IDB meeting Rio but said before leaving he could fly directly to Washington afterwards with engineers in order to present request for long term loan.

Besides direct financial support, we believe regime should be given our strong moral encouragement. Its program so far seems directed both to improving lot of masses of country and to developing nation's economy. All this is in tune with principles alianza para el progreso. Directorate's latest measure, exchange control, has incited wrath of some of rich families and also of merchants. Yet some control measure would seem necessary for a developing economy, which needs capital for its growth, Rivera and Portillo told me yesterday in private meeting it seemed only fair that capital formed by "sweat of Salvadoran workers" should be available for domestic investment.

Considering that exchange controls, if properly administered, seem reasonable and considering that next few weeks may provide severe test of regime's power survive against machinations of rich, I believe timely word of support from us may be helpful. Accordingly, I recommend that Department authorize me in course of general interview, which has been sought since my arrival by several newspapers, to express US Government's gratification that directorate has already given substance to its clear determination improve standard living of people of country. I might also say that decision to institute exchange controls was of course taken by Salvadoran Government independently without consultation with us. I would add, if the Department concurs, that exchange controls if properly administered have often been found during critical periods in many other countries, great and small, to be a useful means of encouraging economic development by making a nation's own capital available to promote its prosperity. In such an interview I would also quote again as I have already so often done in El Salvador, sentences from President Kennedy's inaugural address e.g., "If a free society cannot help the many who are poor, it cannot save the few who are rich". While this will not make me popular with our rich friends, I believe time may have come when we must use our influence in frank talk so that El Salvador can be saved from fate of Cuba which Department white paper so clearly states was brought on largely by indifference of previous regimes to "needs of the people for education, medical care, housing, social justice and economic opportunity".

¹ Need for direct financial support and moral encouragement for new regime. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 816.10/4-1361.

As a separate measure I believe we should privately and discreetly encourage government to seek outside assistance, possibly through Robert Nathan's mission to bring here soonest a group of fiscal advisers to assist in reform of tax structure.

Meanwhile, we shall endeavor appropriately to make it clear to the rich that efforts to resist sound reform especially through threat to overthrow government will receive no sympathy from Washington.

Williams

117. Telegram 391 to San Salvador, April 15¹

April 15, 1961

EMBTel 651.

Dept recognizes sensitivity of situation and concurs regime should be given moral encouragement. You are authorized make informal statement in press interview commending Directorate's demonstrated determination improve standard of living, promote social reform and develop nation's economy. To extent possible draw on public statements already made to reduce disadvantage personal attribution. Avoid specific reference to exchange restrictions or reference to measure as "useful means of encouraging economic development". If pressed for comment you might say that such restrictions have in emergency situations been helpful in some cases in meeting specific problems.

¹ DOS authorization to commend Directorate's determination to improve standard of living, promote social reform, and develop economy. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 816.10/4-1361.

FYI Dept concerned that GOES considered it necessary to impose exchange restrictions departing from historical convertibility of colon. Experience other countries has shown that such restrictions once imposed may become difficult to remove, may lead to economic distortions, black market corruption and discourage foreign capital investment. In general if domestic capital desires to go abroad it finds means evading controls. END FYI.

While encouraging GOES officials seek outside expert assistance soonest in reform tax structure you should discreetly caution against seeking advice from multiple advisers. Problem reviewed here with Nathan who will discuss further with you on return Salvador on Monday. Salvadoran Embassy advises GOES intends work closely with IMF and that Fund representatives arriving next week.

Rusk

118. Memorandum of conversation, June 9, between Ambassador Lima and Ball¹

June 9, 1961

SUBJECT

Salvadoran Political Situation and Need for U.S. Financial Assistance

PARTICIPANTS

Ambassador Francisco R. Lima of El Salvador
B—Mr. Ball, Under Secretary for Economic Affairs
Mr. Schaetzel, Special Assistant
OAP—Mr. Gwynn, Officer-In-Charge, Salvadoran Affairs

Ambassador Lima called at his request to make a courtesy visit and briefly discuss substantive problems. In the course of the conversation he made the following points:

1. The existing political situation in El Salvador is still very dangerous, with the present Government lacking a broad base of popular support and facing serious threats from the extremes of both right and left.

¹ Salvadoran political situation and need for U.S. financial assistance. Limited Official Use. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 716.00/6-961.

2. The country is facing serious economic problems which are aggravating the situation.

3. The Salvadoran economy is highly dependent upon the world market price of coffee.

4. The Government is anti-Communist, pro-US, and in the face of strong resistance by the entrenched interests is demonstrating its expressed intention of implementing social reform, in line with the principles of the Act of Bogota and the Alianza para Progreso.

5. It anticipates that it will be able to obtain U.S. assistance in attaining these objectives in due course, but it is vitally important for the existing Government to be able to obtain US financial assistance now, both to help in resolving Salvador's current economic problems and to provide tangible evidence to the Salvadoran public of U.S. support for the present Government and its objectives.

6. The Government appreciates the US$4 million Exim Bank-DLF loan for airport expansion recently announced.

7. The Government is agreeing to a proposed IMF program for solving its current balance-of-payments problem.

8. He expressed the hope that US agencies such as the Exim Bank would continue to consider pending Salvadoran applications for U.S. balance-of-payments assistance measures as highly urgent and would continue to expedite consideration of these.

9. He suggested that the U.S. consider using El Salvador as a model for carrying out the President's Alianza para Progreso program.

Mr. Ball indicated that he considered this last an interesting offer and stated that the Department would endeavor to assist El Salvador in its pending applications to other U.S. agencies for balance-of-payments assistance measures.

119. Telegram 502 from San Salvador, April 29¹

San Salvador, April 29, 1962

Seven Embassy teams blanketed country today to observe elections. Voting procedures greatly improved over last December with number voting places almost doubled and little congestion or confusion. While voters moved much more rapidly through polling places, teams consensus is that vote will be much lighter than in December when it totalled 345 thousand, possibly running as much as 30 to 50 percent smaller. Number of trucks and buses engaged in moving campesinos to polls was not impressive and overall enthusiasm of December contest was clearly lacking. Talks with officials at polling places indicate that single party ticket being given by them as reason for apparent apathy.

No known incidents occurred but early this morning some streets and roads in and around San Salvador were strewn with devises with nails for puncturing tires.

Despite foregoing assessment, CGS labor leaders told Embassy officer at 5 p.m. that they anticipate total vote would reach 500 thousand (double what PCN received in December).

Williams

¹ Report on elections. Official Use Only. 1 p. DOS, CF, 716.00/4-2962.

120. Memorandum from Moscoso to President Kennedy¹

Washington, June 13, 1962

SUBJECT

The Alliance for Progress in El Salvador

1. I submit for your information this brief report, based on my three-day visit last week to El Salvador on the occasion of the opening of a U.S. Trade Fair.

¹ Alliance for Progress in El Salvador. Official Use Only. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Brubeck Series, Salvador, 1961–64.

2. The recently-elected regime which takes office on July 1 came to power on an Alliance for Progress platform. This new regime, pro-U.S. and backed by the military, is headed by Colonel Julio Rivera and enjoys unanimous support in the Salvadorean legislature. A major problem facing the new government is to effect a face-saving but not principle-sacrificing rapprochement with the oligarchy dominating the business community so that the stagnant economy may grow again at the pace attained in the 1950's (This problem may seem not without modest parallels to you). My contacts with members of the present and future administrations, which are to a large extent identical, and with the business community were designed to assist this rapprochement. Indeed, one of our major loan projects there will be devoted to a private industrial development bank which the government sees as a concrete step in the direction of better relations with the business community. El Salvador has both money and managerial talent in its private sector and can grow significantly if the business community can be convinced to put its money to work in the country once more. President-elect Rivera, with whom I talked at length at the outset of my visit, seemed to see this problem clearly, as well as the need for social reform and for the building of stabilizing national institutions. While his cabinet seemed distinctly second rate, his posture thus far and the heavy emphasis he has placed on building a sound planning facility bode well for the future.

3. In addition to many discussions with members of the present and future government and business leaders, my four major public speeches, and my examination of the local US A.I.D. program, among other highlights of my visit were meetings with democratic trade union leaders, violent communist-inspired student attacks on the Alliance for Progress, and right-wing criticism of the Alliance in daily full-page advertisements. Another high spot was the inauguration of the first in a series of approximately 100 schools to be built this year in El Salvador. I attach photographs of the inaugural ceremony. This school was built in only 29 days to be ready for the opening of the Trade Fair. I have informed our mission in El Salvador that I wish the other schools built with comparable haste.

4. Local press coverage of the opening of the school and other aspects of my visit was heavy and prominent. There is no doubt that the Alliance for Progress is known widely in El Salvador. It is welcomed and supported by the Government and, as far as I can tell, by the chief non-Communist opposition to the government as well. It is violently attacked by the Communists, who have surrendered the issue of reform to us and campaign on the sterile ground that we seek to colonize their country. It is strongly criticized also by the oligarchy, which wants us to buy El Salvadorean coffee, sugar and other exports without limit and to stop talking of social change. Thus attacked from both the right and the left, we and your able Ambassador, Murat Williams, intend to move ahead with the new government to rekindle economic growth, encourage social reform, and bring to the Salvadorean people the schools, homes and jobs they seek as the first fruits of the Alliance.

Teodoro Moscoso

121. Airgram CA-6720 from San Salvador, December 20¹

San Salvador, December 20, 1962

SUBJECT

El Salvador—Plan of Action from Present to July 1, 1963

The Latin American Policy Committee met on November 28 to discuss a Plan of Action for El Salvador. The enclosed Plan incorporates recommendations made by the Committee which then approved it for the guidance of all agencies concerned with U.S. policy toward El Salvador.

Rusk

Enclosure

El Salvador—Plan of Action from the Present to July 1, 1963

I. OBJECTIVES:

A. Political

1. Further reconciliation between the business-industrial community and President Rivera and his administration in order to make it possible for the Government to move ahead vigorously with development and reform programs along the lines advocated by Rivera in his inaugural address.

2. Assertion of leadership by President Rivera in the executive and legislative branches of the Government to get action on essential, long-delayed legislation.

¹ Plan of Action for El Salvador to July 1, 1963. Secret. 5 pp. DOS, CF, 611.16/12-2062.

3. The commencement of a program aimed at developing local community consciousness of and enthusiasm about their local developmental possibilities; capability for initiative and for producing effective and democratic local leadership; and a sense of responsibility and a will to use their own local resources to meet their necessities.

4. Reduction of communist, pro-Castro, anti-government and anti-U.S. influence in the national university, and further isolation of the Salvadoran Communist Party from political life.

5. Continuation of attitudes favoring political stability and moderate social and economic reform on the part of the Salvadoran military, the only really effective organized anti-Communist force.

6. Continuing development, as rapidly as is feasible, of responsible and democratically-oriented labor unionism, though realizing that it will have to continue to be supported largely by Government subsidy for the present.

B. Economic

1. Continuation of economic development activity at a steady or increasing pace, based on external loans and on an increase of 15% to 20% in tax revenues in 1963 over 1962 through proposed tax law reform and improvement in administration.

C. Security Forces

1. Maintenance of military and police forces capable of preserving law and order, detecting and countering subversive attempts against the government, and contributing through a civic action program to social and economic development.

[Here follows section II, "Current Situation," describing El Salvador's recent political changes, President Rivera's prospects, the strength of the communists, the orientation of the labor movement, the influence of the National University, prospects for economic development, and the need for government revenue.]

III. LINES OF ACTION:

A. Political

1. Continue to emphasize to both sides, especially the business community, the importance of cooperation between the government and the entrepreneurial class in the development of the country and the improvement of the condition of the individual, and the importance of adequate consultation between the Government and businessmen in preparing and carrying out forward-looking plans to accomplish these aims.

2. Continue to impress on President Rivera and members of his administration that continued failure to enact amendments to the hastily-drafted 1961 decree increasing income taxes, to make it appreciably more effective, could seriously hinder achievement of the administration's economic and social development aims. Stress the importance of taking steps to build a public administration capability for increasing government revenues, to speed the mobilization of the country's resources and spread the tax burden more equitably, while ensuring that private initiative will not be stifled by excessively punitive measures.

3. Stimulate President Rivera into active leadership of his administration by making disbursements on forthcoming AID loan projects contingent on the adoption of measures outlined in 2 above; and by vetoing disbursements under the existing IDB housing loan in excess of US $1 million unless the long-promised basic savings and loan legislation is enacted by the time that level of disbursements is reached.

4. To obtain Objective 3, attempt to encourage development of constructive local leadership, self-confidence among rural inhabitants, and improved conditions in rural areas. Do this through an integrated community development approach, defined as "A movement designed to promote better living for the whole community, with the active participation and, if possible, on the initiative of the community, but if this initiative is not forthcoming spontaneously, by the use of techniques for arousing and stimulating it in order to secure its active and enthusiastic response to the movement". Assign necessary AID resources to the early development and implementation of such a program.

5. Mindful of the fact that a political opposition which believes it cannot win in elections will inevitably attempt to foment coups, encourage initiatives by the Rivera Government designed to permit non-Communist opposition elements to acquire and hold local and national elective offices.

6. Seek to encourage development of stable political parties with well-organized grass-roots structures by both the "Ins" and the "Outs".

7. Support the IDB regional university reform program of introducing, via the Superior Council of Central American Universities, Basic Studies curricula and other measures to raise scholastic standards, eliminate politically-motivated "professional students" from the university, and direct the efforts of the country's qualified youth toward serious study and away from politics.

Increase still further U.S. contacts with university students, and secondary school teachers and students. Special attention should also be given to contacts among normal school students and teachers.

8. Continue to assist the weak non-communist labor unions to raise the qualifications of their present and potential leaders by offering training grants, as available; arranging contacts with U.S. labor union representatives interested in helping them; and providing informational and similar services available from the U.S. Government, along with a morale-lifting show of interest in their problems and activities. Suggest to Salvadoran Government officials and to private employers where feasible the desirability of adhering to labor relations policies which will permit the democratic unions in the country to build independent strength by obtaining tangible benefits for their followers. Attempt to make clear to employers that otherwise the inevitable development of labor unions will be dominated by the communists.

9. Suggest to President Rivera and to his public security officials the importance of implementing the much-needed and stringent new anti-communist law with strong emphasis on accuracy in identifying targets so as to avoid popular discrediting of the new law and the Rivera Government as merely arbitrary and repressive. Continue training activities in intelligence as needed.

10. Discreetly promote the adoption of an Army retirement plan providing for the automatic and mandatory annual retirement of appropriate numbers of officers in the higher command and civilian government positions. The objective would be to avoid future congestion in the senior ranks and consequent discontent among younger officers, while diverting the energies of honorably retired officers to useful activity elsewhere in the society.

11. Expose fully the Castro-Communist threat to El Salvador's future, with particular emphasis on the failure and negativism of the Communist experiment.

B. Economic

1. Urge government-business collaboration in planning economic development, as in Political Line of Action No. 1, above.

2. In recognition of the fact that the Salvadoran Government's own resources are insufficient to match to any significant extent additional infusions of external credit for economic development, adjust, as needed, the matching requirement for AID development loans to a nominal percentage, provided the Salvadoran Government for its part adopts tax reforms which together with improvements in administration could increase tax revenues in 1963 on the order of 15% to 20% over 1962.

3. Support future Salvadoran approaches to the IMF for a judicious increase in the present Central Bank credit ceilings, provided that the Salvadoran Government takes prior or concurrent actions to increase public revenues as in 2 above. These measures would together be intended to enable the government to continue to borrow abroad and to maintain sufficient investment activity to keep up the momentum toward expansion of the economy without causing serious risk to fiscal and monetary stability and, as a consequence, to investor confidence.

Encourage maximum utilization of the available private capital on deposit in Salvadoran banks.

4. Urge the Salvadoran Government and private organizations to plan jointly with regional, national and private Central American entities to strengthen the Central American Common Market and regional development.

5. With a view towards achieving a fully operating and effective economic planning mechanism by the end of 1963, assist in the expeditious procurement, either through the consultant firm of Robert Nathan or if necessary through AID/W, of the needed additional technical staff.

6. Use our influence to help El Salvador and the other Central American countries get faster response from the Central American Bank for Economic Development on its application for loans for its segment of the regional cadastral survey, which is needed for improved land tenure, use and tax policies.

C. Security Forces

1. Make available to the Salvadoran Government, on a grant basis if necessary, the minimum military and police equipment and training needed to maintain public order and internal security.

2. Support a civic action military program through MAP and AID which would include training for literacy and technical skills.

3. Support a troop information program which would contribute to the objectives outlined in this paper.

122. Memorandum of conversation, March 20, between President Kennedy and President Rivera¹

March 20, 1963

SUBJECT

Salvadoran Political and Economic Situation, Plans—Support for Alliance Informational Activities—U.S. Cotton Policies—Requests Being Submitted for 5 Loan Projects, More Peace Corpsmen—Communism in El Salvador—Travellers to Cuba

PARTICIPANTS

United States
The President
The Secretary of State
Assistant Secretary Martin
Mr. Moscoso
Ambassador Williams

El Salvador
The President
Dr. Rector Ecobar Serrano, Minister of Foreign Affairs

After expressing his greetings and admiration, President Rivera said that in El Salvador his government was making a great effort to overcome certain backwardnesses which had handicapped the Republic for years. He spoke first of the political situation and emphasized that there was free activity of political parties except for the Communist Party. He said proposals were being undertaken for improvement in the electoral system and he expected that proportional representation would be introduced this year. He said that there was unrestricted liberty of the press.

Turning to the Alliance for Progress he mentioned his great friend Mr. Moscoso with whom he had collaborated closely in promoting the Alliance for Progress. He said that he felt now that there was need for greater dissemination of information about the Alliance for Progress. He referred to Ambassador de Lesseps Morrison's recent visit and said that he hoped that through his assistance a committee could be established to undertake this task. (There was further discussion between the President, the Secretary, Mr. Moscoso and Ambassador Williams of the role that USIA played in helping to spread information about the Alliance for Progress. It was pointed out that while the Committee to which President Rivera was referring was sponsored by the OAS, much work was already being done by USIS.)

Rivera next spoke of the success of El Salvador in creating an atmosphere of confidence so that economic production would increase.

¹ Salvadoran political and economic situation and plans; support for Alliance informational activities; U.S. cotton policies; loan projects; Peace Corps; communism in El Salvador; travelers to Cuba. Confidential. 5 pp. DOS, CF, POL EL SAL.

He said that when he began his program, there was much resistance by the wealthy people to social security. "As you know, Mr. President," he said, "wealth in our country is often in the hands of a few. We have achieved conciliation with the wealthy. The big capitalists are cooperating with us." He said that there were two representatives of the private sector on the National Planning Committee, one from the wealthy group, the other from the artisan level.

He then said that social progress and economic progress must move forward together. He said that much was being done now in economic sectoral planning.

Rivera expressed his concern over newspaper reports that there would be an increase in cotton subsidy in the United States which would have an unfortunate effect in El Salvador since it would probably cause a drop in cotton prices. This would have a bad effect on the economic growth of the country.

President Kennedy intervened to say that he thought that no legislation to permit an increase in cotton subsidy was likely in the near future, but he would let President Rivera know when he returned to Washington what the answer might be. He said that the matter had been raised in the United States.

Rivera then turned to his social program. He emphasized that 20 per cent of the national budget was going into investment in the public sector. He stressed the need for hospitals and First Aid Stations. He expressed pleasure over the arrival of the first mobile health units. He said he hoped to have two units in every department of the country (or a total of 28). President Kennedy asked how many there were now. Only two were in service but ten more were expected. Ambassador Williams noted that a mobile health unit had recently arrived from Germany, which would have an important contribution to the program.

Rivera had words of praise for the Peace Corps and said there was great support (simpatia) for it in the country. He said that the Minister of Agriculture had emphasized to him the value of the Peace Corps in education, technical improvements and community development. He said that he himself (Rivera) had had opportunity to observe the Peace Corps directly. El Salvador would soon request an increase in the number of volunteers. He hoped the Corps could assist in achieving two purposes: one, to raise production, the other, to foster a healthy spirit in the countryside which would resist Communism.

Rivera mentioned agrarian reform and said that El Salvador needed it, but suffered from severe lack of land. He had a committee studying it which would not seek the creation of many minifundias but rather a reform that would help to increase production and improve the lot of the campesino. He hoped to achieve land ownership for the small farmer which would be protected against exploitation.

On his over-all economic program, Rivera said he expected to see an increase in gross national product, from the present 4.7% per annum to a rate of 6.5%. This would require a considerable investment—150 million dollars in the next five years. Rivera then spoke of the industrious character of the Salvadorans. Unfortunately there was 18 per cent unemployment. It was vital to provide work. He said if people worked they will not be misled by Communism.

(Parenthetically, Rivera asked Ambassador Williams when the new American Embassy building would be constructed. Secretary Rusk said that there had been some delay in the Congressional appropriation. President Kennedy asked the status of the plans. Ambassador Williams replied that land had been bought, architectural plans had been made, construction could start as soon as the appropriation was available.)

President Rivera said that his government was submitting five new loan projects. These include three agricultural loans, one industrial development loan, and one loan for school construction for an over-all total of about 17 million dollars.

With respect to housing, President Kennedy inquired as to the status of the projects. Ambassador Williams said that a loan of 6.1 million dollars had been received from the Inter-American Development Bank and that low cost housing had already been built under this program. President Rivera spoke of his great satisfaction in having approved, just before his departure for Costa Rica, a new law authorizing the establishment of a savings and loan association designed to bring local savings into housing.

Rivera spoke next about measures to control Communism and said that Salvador now had a law for this purpose which he believed would be effective. He indicated that he had precise information about Communists and stated that in a population of 2,600,000 there were only 200 real Communist leaders and 5,000 sympathizers. In contrast, he said, President Somoza had said that in Nicaragua there were 35,000 Communists. Rivera said that violence had diminished in El Salvador lately and he believed that with an improved economy these would have less temptation to Communism.

Referring to his economic program he said that El Salvador had been handicapped by the lack of technical experts. Too many, he said, have gone over to international organizations, especially the Organization of American States. He was grateful for Mr. Moscoso's assistance in providing technical experts especially in planning. He expected El Salvador's national plan to be finished by the end of 1963.

President Kennedy asked what happened with Salvadoran students in Cuba. Did President Rivera know what they did when they returned?

Rivera replied that his government kept well-informed on these persons. Most of them were in the University. Ordinarily, he said, Salvadoran workers were not Communists. He mentioned the fact that the principal trade union confederation had 40 thousand members, whereas the Communist confederation had only about 3 thousand. What preoccupied him was that some of the workers who went to Cuba came back and did sabotage while students who went to Cuba went into the coffee and cotton fields to stir up the workers by illusory promises. Among measures to control this agitation were the National Guard patrols and the good work of the Catholic Church in the countryside.

Rivera said that he had noticed an interesting development among the Communists in El Salvador lately. There was a split between the advocates of Krushchev and the advocates of Mao. Some felt defrauded by Krushchev because of the Cuban crisis and had turned to Mao. There consequently had been changes in the personnel of Communist leadership. The psychological blow of Cuba had demoralized many who had now turned to the Chinese Communists. Neither of the two lines of Communist policy suited Rivera.

President Kennedy noted that we might be better off if they followed Krushchev, because if Krushchev thought he was losing the Communists abroad to Mao, Krushchev might feel a compulsion to become more violent.

In bringing the meeting to a close, President Kennedy said that he had been particularly anxious to meet President Rivera and to express to him the support for the Alliance during its early times. There had been much criticism of the Alliance but “these trees don’t grow overnight”. President Rivera said that he had delivered to Ambassador Williams a report on El Salvador for the President. President Kennedy said he would take it with him to Washington and would certainly do what was possible to help Salvador in its development program. (The report was delivered to General Clifton).

123. Memorandum from Brubeck to McGeorge Bundy, July 22¹

July 22, 1963

SUBJECT

El Salvador—Short-Term Prospects for Political Stability Good—Long-Term Prospects Less So

Despite El Salvador's Alliance for Progress accomplishments, there continues to be fairly serious underlying political weakness. Several recent developments underline the fact that the honeymoon is over for the year-old administration of Lt. Col. Julio Rivera. In this context Ambassador Williams has submitted the enclosed new assessment of "Political Realities in El Salvador", focusing more sharply on the lack of organized support for the Government of El Salvador and the Alianza among many civilians.

Recent unfavorable developments in El Salvador include the following:

1. The weakening of the ORIT-supported labor confederation—the Government's major ally in the elections of Rivera and his one-party Legislative Assembly—which became apparent in its poor showing in this year's May Day parades. This recurring problem stems from the fact that the infant non-Communist labor movement continues to be basically dependent on GOES support and subject to its restraint, with the result that the individual union member has difficulty seeing how union membership is benefitting him.

2. The recent success of opposition political figures in spreading rumors of coup attempts and/or GOES financial difficulties, thereby creating an atmosphere of uneasiness.

3. The apparent inability of the GOES to get the story of their "program" to the people as a means of evoking public support.

4. A recent report by the Vice President that the "young" military officers in particular are becoming more insistent concerning the need for social and economic progress, and harder to satisfy on this point because of the influence of the anti-Government press.

5. An indication that President Rivera may be becoming careless about the delicate problem of maintaining close personal contact with his military peers. (His Minister of Defense and Chief of Staff are concerned because he failed to consult them before appointing a key military "Out" to a political position.)

¹ El Salvador—long- and short-term prospects for political stability. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Brubeck Series, Salvador, 1961–64.

In his assessment, Ambassador Williams outlines in a general way what can be done and is being done to attack the underlying problem. His thinking is in the line with current policy directives, including the plan of action approved for El Salvador by the Latin American Policy Committee. Continued attention will be given to this problem and possible means of attacking it in the next plan of action submitted for the consideration of the Latin American Policy Committee.

Grant G. Hilliker
for

William H. Brubeck
Executive Secretary

Enclosure:

San Salvador's A-706.

Guatemala

124. Telegram 459 from Guatemala City, April 20¹

Guatemala City, April 20, 1961

Met with leading members American Community Noon today to exchange impressions and get their views gravity present situation and outcome current events. Majority view these men is that Ydigoras, by his deftness and stratagem of being firm enough but not too firm, will overcome present threat law and order posed by Castroists and extreme leftist continuing hold unauthorized manifestations. Minority view, while not doubting Ydigoras personally dedicated anti-Castroism/anti-Communism, fears Ydigoras allowing Communists too free hand and may allow situation get beyond control. This might have further effect, some thought, alarming military and causing important elements of them push Ydigoras aside and take matter in own hands. Some felt indeed some army elements, in conjunction political outs, might try overthrow Ydigoras on pretext he not acting forcefully enough, whether he were or not.

Last night's confrontation pro and anti-Castro groups somewhat unique. Presence armed anti-Castro groups, and their engaging pro-Castristas undoubtedly inspired by Ydigoras as Machiavellian way breaking up unauthorized pro-Castro meeting without use official armed forces. Deaths resulted but these were not martyrs shot down by Ydigoras's soldiers and police but people unfortunately shot by fellow citizens in melee which would not have taken place but for unauthorized public demonstration on part pro-Castro forces.

While air uncertainly and apprehension prevails, Embassy inclined subscribe majority view businessmen noted above that Ydigoras will be as firm as situation requires but not unduly so, and that he will overcome current crisis.

Muccio

¹ Report on exchange of views of current situation at a meeting with leading members of the American Community. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 714.00/4-2061.

125. Despatch 494 from Guatemala City, March 31¹

Guatemala City, March 31, 1962

REF: Embtel 428; Deptel 344. SUBJECT: U.S. Interests and the Guatemalan Political Scene.

The events of the past fortnight in Guatemala necessitate a reappraisal of the situation in terms of prospects for U.S. policy objectives. It is my belief that these events have significantly weakened the Ydígoras Government, that Ydígoras' chances to finish his term have been seriously depreciated, and that a major gain has been gratuitously presented to the candidacy of Juan José Arévalo. These events have, in other words, strengthened and encouraged the Communists and those opposed to the United States, and have dimmed the prospects for the success of U.S. policy.

A month ago, I had the impression that the Ydígoras Government, while almost certainly one which was going to be subjected to increasing attack as the weeks and months went by, would be able, as it had so many times before, to weather these storms, pursuing the standard Ydígoras tactics of dividing the enemy by a combination of deals and threats. The major necessities seemed to be to achieve some appreciable progress in social and economic development, to preclude an Ydígoras-Arévalo union, to seek and foster the development of a candidate who could succeed Ydígoras and defeat Arévalo. While I believed these to be difficult of attainment and that their prosecution required urgent and careful application of our skills and energies, they did not appear to be impossible of achievement.

The recent events, I believe, caught us by surprise—not in failing to anticipate the probability of demonstrations such as the students initiated, but in not having foreseen the manner in which Ydígoras would respond to the challenge. I believe that his response was equally surprising to the students, to the Communists, to the non-Communist opposition, to the military, to the public and indeed to members of his own party. The students were undoubtedly egged on by the Communists, ever eager to foment disorder, and by the non-Communist opposition, always willing to attack the Government. These elements may have hoped, for different reasons, that the Government would fall; the Communists doubtless hoped some martyrs could be produced so that further agitation would be abetted; but I do not believe that they expected these results. I believe they expected the President to be able to defeat their efforts and did not anticipate that he would adopt such violent methods as to offer what proved to be a major opportunity to overthrow his Government.

¹ U.S. interests and the Guatemalan political scene following recent demonstrations. Secret. 7 pp. DOS, CF, 714.00/3-3062.

The President argues that the students' tactics left him no option but the use of force. He points out that they had planned their demonstrations to occur in the crowded downtown area both to effect a maximum disruption of normal activity and to involve large numbers of people not a part of their group. Thus traffic in city streets was to be blocked off and a minority of demonstrators spread throughout the groups of people could give the impression of a much larger protest and render more difficult the problem of policing the area. The President also contends that it was the demonstrators who commenced shooting and that the police were defending themselves. The possibility that non-Governmental forces initiated the shooting certainly exists, but it is equally likely that it began with the hated judicial police. Whatever the facts may be as to the first to shoot, the action of the police in the days that followed was brutal, violent and indiscriminate. It is impossible to conclude anything but that the President personally determined to use full force against the demonstrators (and as an obvious corollary), anyone else in the way, and to take the opportunity to bully his political enemies. I believe this decision was deliberate and I believe it was a basic political mistake.

The President's public justification for his action, and his private assertions, were that the movement was Communistic, that its participants were not students (except in the first days when there were some student dupes), that the power of the Communists was increasing rapidly by reason of outside support in the form of arms and money, and that the liberty of Guatemala was at stake. The Cuban radio provided him with considerable assistance in this effort by its claims that a "socialist" government was going to get power, its appeals for revolt, its threats of legions led by Arbenz, Paz Tejada, etc. It is noteworthy, however, that his actions did not include jailing Communist leaders.

The general public reaction against the violence of the repressive measures brought the non-Communist opposition to the sudden realization that Ydígoras could be dislodged if the military forces of the country could be persuaded to join in such a movement. While a union of the opposition and the military could have effected such a result at any time, the opportunity which presented itself for such a union was real, immediate and unexpected.

The military, and I must add that a major weakness in this Mission is its scarcity of information as to the attitudes and aspirations of the officer corps—excepting a few of the senior officers, is assumed to be anti-Communist and generally right of center in its political philosophy. Whether this assessment is valid, I do not know. Based on the available evidence, it is my opinion that the senior officers at least are genuinely fearful of and thus opposed to a regime of the left since the events of Cuba have shown that such a regime would be adverse to the interests of the military itself. In all likelihood there are less crass motivations also present among the military, such as devotion to constitutional government, intellectual conviction as to the merits of democracy, and in some cases loyalty to the President.

Whatever the proper political analysis, there can be no doubt on the evidence we have from a variety of sources, including the President, that there was a substantial resistance in the Army to the proposal that the Army replace the police in patrolling the streets of Guatemala City and in maintaining order. As the President himself told me there were quite a few officers who felt that the Army should not be asked "to shoot boys and girls." It is a fact that there was a long delay between the issuance of the notice that responsibility had been given to the Army and the actual appearance on the streets of any military patrols. There is reason to believe that if the demonstrations had continued and that if substantial numbers of citizens had joined in them during the period after the order for Army control was issued and before the actual initiation of patrols, the Army might not have obeyed the order. The feeling of the officers was that it would not be the enemy at whom they were to fire.

For at least a brief period toward the end of the week of March 11–17 the non-Communist opposition believed it had achieved agreement with military leaders adequate to force the resignation of the President. Why this agreement collapsed or failed to last (if it indeed existed on any firm basis) is not entirely clear. Some believe the President was just a jump or two ahead and succeeded in shifting commanders just in time, others deny the agreement was ever soundly based—that is, that it had not obtained the consent of sufficient or sufficiently influential officers, others feel the President's warnings of Communist leadership and the Habana broadcasts frightened the officers off. A general feeling is that the spectre of a chaotic situation fertile for the Communists or of a Commie takeover, appeared a worse evil than the continuation of Ydígoras. Certainly the student movement had not been preceded by any really organized plan for or agreement on an anti-Communist succession to the present Government.

From the Communist point of view the events were splendid. The Government had reacted with violence, it had shocked even its own supporters, the division between Ydígoras and the anti-Communist opposition had been deepened and intensified. Current opinion among anti-Communist opposition to Ydígoras is that any union or cooperation between them and Ydígoras is "absolutely impossible." I don't think the Communists expected to take over, nor indeed is the situation yet ripe for them. The logical sequence would seem to me to be one of continuous opportunistic exploitation of public antipathy for the Government, exacerbation of the division between the non-Communist forces, capitalizing upon targets of opportunity and paving the way for a government either so extreme (rightist military), so weak (a divided and inept coalition), or so amenable (Arévalo) that an ultimate Communist takeover is facilitated.

The Ydígoras Government has been gaining in unpopularity for some time. It may be true, as the President says, that his regime compares favorably in most respects with all of its predecessors, and that the opposition to him is a combine of envious competitors for power, none of whom he considers to have sufficient strength or conviction to be capable of preserving a democratic state, and of the Communists. However, it is also true that there is a great discontent with the regime which is based upon considerations other than Communism or political opportunism. This discontent stems first and foremost from the general public belief that the Ydígoras Government has overstepped the bounds of permissible graft, that is, that the "take" has been and continues to be greatly excessive. Secondly, the Ydígoras policy of "divide and rule" has left him devoid of much support beyond the sycophants or fellow grafters. No one can feel confident of his position; it is the Old Man and he alone who exercises power. Thirdly, and while this point receives less public attention, it does worry many and it worries me, the President has not really acted vigorously and effectively against the Communists within Guatemala. Some members of the American business community believe that the general public is fed up with Ydígoras' failure to be a strong man and contend that his handling of the riots was not strong enough rather than too strong. Action against non-Communist political enemies has been more frequent and prompt than against Communists. For example, the Government paper printed pictures and biographies of the four Communist student leaders during the recent events but professed inability "to find" them to arrest. They appeared rather easy to locate in our opinion.

The conclusion that the President has not only "gone easy" on domestic Communists but has found it politically convenient to have such a group seems to me well founded. Efforts made by U.S. representatives to persuade him to establish effective intelligence arrangements have been unsuccessful to date. No effort has been made by him to obtain more effective anti-Communist legislation. Information provided regarding Communist activity has not resulted in effective counteraction. The Old Man is a courageous and stubborn person who has managed to confound and refute those who have prophesied his fall for quite a long time. He knows his advent to power was opposed by the U.S. He has succeeded so far in keeping power by what he calls his tightrope walking, balancing his opposing forces off one against the other. To his mind, I think, the Communists have helped to balance the non-Communist opposition and to keep some of his own conservative supporters in line. He told me he had flirted with Arévalo not because he liked him or intended to support him but to balance off—i.e., counter the “U.S. support of his enemy, Mario Mendez Montenegro.” He exudes confidence, enjoys this sort of political action, and, I expect, believes sincerely in his ability to continue the performance, “handling” the Communists and the opposition, the U.S., and the British (in re British Honduras) without mishap.

There is, of course, some truth in what I have assumed his analysis to be. It is a fact that the opposition lacks unity and if it has strong men capable of effective leadership, their presence is not obvious. It is true that the Arévalo-Arbenz period produced Communists, Communist sympathizers and a degree of indoctrination in Communist ideology which cannot be eradicated by force alone. It is true that to govern at all among the congeries of political forces here is a difficult feat requiring a mastery of political give and take and of the art of balancing competitive forces.

Perhaps the Old Man will prove to be correct in his belief that he can last out his term without either the Communists or the non-Communists being able to upset him. Certainly the non-Communist opposition has so far been frustrated by the Old Man’s success in avoiding overthrow. If it is assumed, for hypothesis, that he can last, it seems to me the likelihood of an Arévalo Government is greatly increased unless he changes his present techniques. If the non-Communist opposition comes to the conclusion, or if a substantial segment of it comes to the conclusion that no existing political leader or group alone can unseat Ydígoras, the temptation to accept Communist support will certainly be much harder to resist. With or without such support (since I assume the Communists would regard Arévalo’s election as a victory) the tendency to look for a charismatic leader will grow and grow. Arévalo’s highly intelligent position of remaining aloof from the present events, of maintaining that government should only change constitutionally, and his statements of rejection of Communist support are all likely, even if not calculated to be, to engender enthusiasm for him among the body, if not the leaders, of the non-Communist opposition as “the man” who can reunite and save the country.

I realize the danger of political prophesy in a scene such as exists here, and I am deeply conscious of my own limited experience in and knowledge of this environment. But I do not believe that Ydígoras will find it as easy to stay in office as he seems to think and I am reluctantly forced to the conclusion that, if he does succeed through the use of his present tactics, we will have lost Guatemala. To continue in power, Ydígoras must keep the military with him, or develop (as he has given many indications of a desire to do) a counter-military force of campesinos along with a part of the military, and he will be able and will be tempted to use them in increasingly harsher measures. If the opposition continues its actions against Ydígoras and provokes such harsher measures, or if it elects to join with the Arévalo camp and wait for 1964, the effect of either of these actions will be to force upon the U.S. a choice between the extremes of right or left.

I am inclined to the view that the opposition is not yet prepared to give in nor to join the Communists nor to support Arévalo. I think their efforts to find a means of getting military support so as to unseat the President will continue and are apt to reach a climax at any time, and possibly in the next two or three months. Their problems are difficult ones, however. They are united now in only one respect—they all desire the departure of Ydígoras. In varying degrees they are appreciative of the dangers inherent in dislodging him if no agreement on a successor exists. Some wish a constitutional change with Ydígoras resigning, the first designate becoming provisional President and elections within four months. Others feel a military junta is the answer, again with early elections. Some advocate a civil-military junta to hold and exercise power for a year or more. (A six man—three civilian and three military—junta with a larger advisory council, was the proposal that almost succeeded.) Their programs for action after they assume charge are somewhat vague. I am told they agree on (1) honesty in government, (2) better administration, and (3) anti-Communism. That these laudable principles or objectives need leadership, organization, discipline and executive capability to accomplish is acknowledged but such acknowledgment is not yet visibly accompanied by any specific plans or programs. No one of the leaders of the various political groups is an obvious good choice; their capacity and/or willingness to work together as a team is of uncertain but doubtful dependability.

None of them, as of this moment, is prepared to entertain cooperation with Ydígoras. They say such cooperation might have been conceivable prior to the recent events but that Ydígoras has made it impossible. Whether this attitude will persist I do not know, but it seems to be pretty firmly held now. Ydígoras has been making efforts to attract the opposition—using different emissaries to different groups—to join with him and has held out the bait of Cabinet changes, etc. They believe (and I expect Ydígoras does too) that this is a question of the spider inviting the flies into the parlor. It seems evident they lack conviction of their ability to deal on equal terms in any union. Thus the theoretical and desirable solution of a negotiated peace between the anti-Communist opposition and Ydígoras does not seem presently practicable. I believe that if the opposition could agree on a specific set of demands for reforms and a program for anti-Communist action and for progress in the social and economic field, that it could secure the backing of the military for these, and that with the backing of the U.S., the President could be forced to accept the terms. But, as long as the opposition includes in its conditions the primary (presently sole) requirement of Ydígoras' resignation, no such solution appears possible.

Failing the possibility of a genuine cooperative program of this sort, presumably the next best thing for U.S. interests that an Ydígoras Government could do would be on its own to effect reforms, curb the Communists, and push a vigorous development program in a manner which would permit the growth and development not only of a suitable successor to the Office of President but of a political climate which could assure his election against Arévalo. This is a tall order. Whether Ydígoras could take actions which would deflate and satisfy the opposition is problematical. As for honesty in government, he will, of course, as he has before, deny the allegations and attribute them to his enemies. If he were to put an end to the present graft (assuming that he could) the charge of past graft would remain. Some victims for a purge (Alejos, Samayoa) might satisfy the public but the purging might prove hard to do and unless the Old Man felt confident of its effectiveness, he would be unlikely to act. As for anti-Communist action, I am not sanguine of success in persuading him as long as he is convinced of a greater need to counter other opposition elements. He would, I believe, be enthusiastic about development as long as the moneys come from aid and were used to improve his political stature. However, any real mobilization of the people of the country behind a developmental program is probably impossible as long as the larger issues of political conflict continue.

We have embarked on efforts to push him in these directions. I have insisted on the urgent necessity of an effective campaign against Communists here. It is too early to feel the effectiveness of these representations. I have also insisted that a better organization and plan is essential to economic progress. Efforts to produce something here are in motion but caution is the watchword. I have talked to him about the need to develop a candidate to beat Arévalo, but he is not giving an inch so far in terms of fostering any competitive political figures.

The chances of successful prosecution of U.S. objectives cannot therefore be described as bright.

We must, of course, consider other possible alternatives. These fall within the assumption that the Ydígoras Government is overthrown. This may happen with or without our concurrence or support. Obviously, also, the lack or existence of our concurrence or support could increase the chances of one or another of these alternatives. Thus, Ydígoras could be overthrown by a rightist military junta, or by a junta of civilian and military elements. Such juntas might be of either temporary or enduring nature, and might or might not seek to maintain a cover of constitutional change. Again they might or might not be agreed upon a platform and an organization.

If we were to be able to secure a true cooperation between Ydígoras and his non-Communist opposition, I believe such would be the most desirable alternative for U.S. interests. A unilateral Ydígoras effort at reform and improvement of the sort described before would be preferable to a chaotic competition of oppositionists. However, it cannot be denied that if the Ydígoras Government were overthrown under a facade of constitutionality, by a civilian and/or civilian/military group united in direction and purpose to have clean government, rout the Communists and develop the economy, the interests of the U.S. would not necessarily be damaged and in reality might be advanced, especially if the alternative appears to be two more years of business on the same old basis.

In this highly volatile environment the possibility exists that an effort of this latter sort may be made; certainly the possibility of a request for U.S. support is a real one also. The granting or denying of such support by a course of either action or inaction may present us suddenly with a political decision of great importance. I think our judgment in such event must be coldly pragmatic in the light of an assessment of the probabilities and alternatives which are open to us.

John O. Bell

American Ambassador

126. Telegram 496 from Guatemala City, April 19¹

Guatemala City, April 19, 1962

In one and one half hour meeting with Ydígoras today I took occasion to point out that danger of Communist takeover in Guatemala greatly increased over past several months by success in creating belief in public mind that government (A) engages in or permits graft, corruption and inefficiency in conduct public business, (B) while attacking Communism abroad permits and fosters it at home and (C) lacks active economic financial policy and program to reverse current deterioration and assure progress and that I felt imperative recognize these beliefs were political facts whether or not accurate and that equally important to mount vigorous counter offensive to dispel them. Suggested series of actions with respect to each which President might take, giving these as personal views not official US Government representations. President took this in good spirit and spoke with feeling (and I must say in moving fashion) of extreme difficulty encountered throughout term of office in finding honest, patriotic persons willing and able serve government effectively. Said he would give serious thought my views and thanked me for them. I remain convinced of accuracy in terms of US interests of local saying “con Ydígoras-malo; sin Ydígoras-peor”.

¹ Danger of a Communist takeover in Guatemala discussed with President Ydígoras. Secret. 1 p. DOS, CF, 714.00/4-1862.

Bell

127. Memorandum from Edwin M. Martin to McGhee, April 26¹

April 26, 1962

TO: M—Mr. McGhee

THROUGH: S/S

FROM: ARA-Edwin M. Martin

SUBJECT

Guatemala

I have not forgotten your memorandum of April 24 with respect to a Presidential communication to Ydigoras. We have been discussing it carefully as the Guatemalan situation has been evolving. At present we in ARA are unanimously opposed to getting the President into the act at this time. We feel that to do so would inevitably involve his prestige in one way or another. This we think would be unwise for several reasons.

Ydigoras has up to now refused to arrest the Communist leaders, in fact there are some people who feel he has given the Communists financial support on the grounds this strengthens his position with the ¹ Reasons to keep the President from getting involved in Guatemalan situation for the time being. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 714.00/4-2662.

United States and with his own military. He also is in close touch with the exiled, soft on Communism and politically popular leader, Arevalo.

At the same time he is constantly crying "wolf, wolf" with respect to the Communists and Castro in a most irresponsible fashion. There is almost no evidence to back up his repeated charges that the Communists were doing this or that.

He and his immediate entourage are thoroughly corrupt and becoming conspicuously so even for Latin America. This is a major factor in the opposition to him.

He has up to now shown little or no interest in governing the country in an even moderately decent way, particularly with respect to the Alliance for Progress objectives.

He is able to maintain himself in power and maintain order primarily as a result of the support of the military. His increasingly inept performance, as described above, is alienating some elements of the military and they can no longer be counted upon to be solidly behind him.

The alternative to Ydigoras is not necessarily chaos or Communism but more likely the succession of the military officer recently chosen as Vice President-designate and, hence, Constitutional successor in case of resignation of Ydigoras. There are one or two opposition leaders in whom we are interested, but none of them has adequate public or military support at present.

We have been working for some time on the problem of what to do in the absence of Ydigoras, and the LA Policy Committee meeting this afternoon will be devoted to this subject. I will let you know what progress we are making. Meanwhile I attach an ARA proposal.

Attachment:

Memo to EMM from OAP-Mrs. Bracken, dated 4/26/62 (Tab A).

128. Memorandum from Katherine W. Bracken to Edwin M. Martin, April 26¹

April 26, 1962

SUBJECT

Guatemala: Current Situation and Contingencies

A. Current Situation

Ten days have passed since President Ydígoras announced on April 15 that he would reorganize his cabinet and otherwise attempt a conciliation with the opposition. With the breathing spell afforded by the Holy Week truce, an announcement of cabinet changes had been expected on Monday, April 23, but still has not been made. Some minor disturbances and some work stoppages have occurred since April 15, but a threatened “general strike” on April 23 failed to materialize. The most potentially serious development is the stoppage of railway service into and out of Puerto Barrios which threatens paralyzation of this major port and has already caused spoilage of banana shipments. It appears that Ydígoras’ promise to seek a conciliation with the opposition did not mean he would agree to form a coalition government with the opposition or enter into any formalized agreement with them; his action so far indicates he was seeking a peace period in order to divide opposition elements. The opposition still distrusts Ydígoras and remains adamant in its position that he must resign.

The fact is, however, that time is running out for Ydígoras unless he promptly announces a new cabinet which will command wide public respect and support, which would in turn probably assure Ydígoras of the continued support of the military. On the other hand, if he is unable to put together such a cabinet, the opposition forces will redouble their efforts to oust him. The final straw might be major disturbances sparked by the forthcoming May 1 labor day celebrations.

Unless Ydígoras can achieve a rather drastic improvement in his current status, he seems almost certainly headed for replacement within the very immediate future. Should this occur, then one of the following contingencies (in the order of their probability) may develop.

B. Contingencies1. Constitutional Substitution of Ydígoras.

Should Ydígoras voluntarily or forcefully be removed, the constitutional process could likely be preserved, especially if the military supported this solution. In this case, the First Presidential Designate, Colonel Ernesto MOLINA Arreaga (tough, unimaginative, pro-United States and strongly anti-Communist) would become President. Elections must then be held within four months. This solution is the more likely since it would appeal to the more conservative forces by avoiding abrupt changes and would still hold a promise of change to the more liberal forces through the electoral process.

¹ Current situation and possible contingencies in Guatemala. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 714.00/4-2662.

2. Military-Civilian Junta.

Such a Junta may be formed if there is any split in the military. The major civilian representation would likely come from the opposition. However, the opposition was unable during the March disturbances to get sufficient military support to form such a mixed Junta. Since the constitutional succession (No. 1) would put in power Colonel Molina, nominated by Ydígoras as the First Designate (although at a time when the military were calling the shots), the opposition may prefer a mixed Junta where they could have representation rather than consent to the constitutional succession procedure.

3. Military Junta.

Should the political situation become chaotic to the point that a Communist or extreme left usurpation represents an imminent threat, or should there be no civilian agreement on either contingency Nos. 1 or 2, then the military will assume power themselves, to prevent anarchy and for self-preservation.

C. Suggestions for United States Action and Timing Under Contingencies

1. The United States should be prepared to support immediately and energetically a constitutional succession to Ydígoras, assuming that the constitutional provisions for election were immediately invoked.

2. Recognition of a military-civilian junta should be withheld for a short period pending clarification of its intentions and objectives, especially as regards a prompt call for elections. Recognition should be withheld until a consensus, especially in Central America, favors recognition.

3. Should military assumption of power be based only on failure or default on the part of the civilian powers, then recognition should be withheld until there is civilian participation with acceptable minimum guarantees of elections and freedoms.

129. Airgram A-142 from Guatemala City, September 11¹

Guatemala City, September 11, 1962

SUBJECT

Guidelines for Policy and Operations: Guatemala

Policy—Limit Distribution—S/S

The attached paper was prepared prior to the receipt today of a revised draft of "Guidelines of United States Policy and Operations Towards Guatemala." While comment on that draft will be forwarded as requested, this paper, it is requested, should be distributed on a limited basis to those concerned with U.S. policy towards Guatemala.

John O. Bell

Attachment

Guidelines for Policy and Operations: Guatemala

A variety of stimuli prompt me to the belief that it is timely to attempt a general review of U.S. policy and program in Guatemala in an effort to suggest a course for the future or at least for the balance of the legal term of office of the present government.

Eight months of opportunity to observe and study the Guatemalan scene and to revalue prior judgments and opinions is one such stimulus. The promised advent of the Byroade team with its mission of inquiry is another. A congeries of instructions from Washington reflecting a desire for emphasis upon particular goals and directing focussing of plans and programs to their ends is another.

In April of this year draft guidelines for policy and objectives for Guatemala were prepared by the Department in consultation with other interested Departments and Agencies. We are also in receipt of instructions which establish "youth" and "youth" programs as important goals, cite Central American integration and "regionalism" as warranting priority; call for development of internal defense plans "because Guatemala is within the cognizance of the Special Group (counterinsurgency)"—presumably as a country considered to be threatened by subversive insurgency; direct development of "civic action" programs as important priority needs; insist upon "reforms" in accordance with Alianza "pledges" as essential to security; direct participation in regional health programs for mobile health units despite earlier insistence on reducing health activities to achieve "concentration"; direct participation in regional scholarship programs as important for U.S. interest; stress the need for military and police participation in health programs; emphasize the importance of child-feeding programs in our interest; warn of required emphasis on police programs, etc., etc., etc.

¹ Transmits guidelines for policy and operations in Guatemala. Secret. 10 pp. DOS, CF, 611.14/9-1162.

While it could not be contended that all of these instructions were inconsistent with or contradictory of the April guidelines, it is somewhat difficult to reconcile all of them into a coherent pattern of policy and program for Guatemala. I am familiar with the variety of reasons which lead to organizational arrangements and ensuing instructions emphasizing functional goals. I appreciate that it is hardly possible to draft these so as to be readily applicable to the particular and peculiar situations to be found in each foreign nation with which we have relations. Presumably it is the function and responsibility of the field mission to assure that the interpretation and application of these instructions is so accomplished as to fit the needs of U.S. interests in the country to which it is accredited.

It seems to me at this point in time that the definition of U.S. objectives set forth in the April draft require considerably more alteration and adjustment than was suggested by this mission in May. The purpose of this message is to discuss the first of the stated objectives.

To my mind the primary and overriding objective of U.S. policy in Guatemala should be to prevent it becoming a Communist state. I am not convinced that the objective set forth in the April guidelines: "the continuance of a legally established constitutional government in Guatemala, including the peaceful transfer of administration following the 1963 elections," if accomplished, would necessarily assure that Guatemala would be saved from Communism.

It is entirely conceivable, that Juan José Arévalo could be elected in a free election, and a peaceful transfer of administration achieved. If this occurred, political power in Guatemala would be in the hands of a man not only passionately and pathologically antagonistic to the United States and all its works, but a man who certainly paved the way for the accession of Communism into power in Guatemala during the Arbenz regime. In my opinion the coming of Arévalo again into power would be most likely to set into motion again a chain of events leading toward a seizure of power by the Communists. A close review of Guatemalan history certainly supports the contention that Arévalo paved the way for Communist control; if he did not realize he was doing so, he is dangerously stupid; if he did realize the logical results of his acts, he must be assumed to have intended or to have accepted those results. In either case, it is hardly credible that the nature of the man has changed. He was nearly 50 years old at that time; he was no misguided, well-meaning youthful reformer. Even if one were prepared to make the very risky assumption that Arévalo, as President, would try to keep the Communists at arms length, the prospects for any cooperation with the U.S. in the Alliance for Progress would still be very slim indeed, and this would certainly contribute to the strengthening of Communism in Guatemala.

To many Guatemalans, perhaps to a majority, Arévalo is a dramatic figure of great appeal. Arévalo was the first President following the overthrow of the Ubico dictatorship and while his role in that overthrow was far from being the primary or even a significantly contributory one, he fell heir to the role of hero as a result. It is true that during the early days of his regime some reforms occurred; probably these would have taken place under any leadership succeeding Ubico, but Arévalo inherits the credit and the public image of a reformer. Coffee prices were high, the economy prosperous in Arévalo's days—although the fact of his administration had nothing to do with this, so that people think of Arévalo in terms of the "good old days." Arévalo succeeded in attaining recognition as a teacher outside of Guatemala; an international status is always an important asset to a politician in a small country. He has carefully avoided connecting himself in the public mind with the regime of his successor under whom Guatemala was given into Communist hands. He has been absent from Guatemala for many years and wisely remained aloof from the problems and issues with which other politicians have had to deal. At home, the competitors—rival politicians—are readily visible; their dimensions as men are apparent; their faults and weaknesses are open to notice. Given all these factors, it is not unnatural, especially among people largely inexperienced in self government, culturally conditioned over centuries to the concepts of the caudillo and the evasion of individual and group responsibility for political decisions, that Arévalo should appear to be the man on horseback whose return to power would assure a return to good times and relieve the people of having to worry about conditions.

To many other Guatemalans, however, especially and naturally those who have a more advanced economic status, those who are more politically sophisticated and have longer and more accurate memories of the past, as well as to a majority of the senior officers of the military, the prospect of an Arévalo return is a frightening and dismaying one. I am convinced that the single greatest reason and much more influential than all other reasons, which discourages Guatemalan capital investment and encourages its flight, is the fear of an Arévalo return. There is ample evidence now available to support the belief that conservatives and military leaders are seriously and with increasing determination considering how to achieve a coup as a means of preventing an Arévalo return. The Minister of Defense, Col. Peralta, has recently said "the Army of Guatemala will not permit Arévalo to be President." Whether these men can or will muster the courage and the force to overthrow the Government probably depends on their assessment of the degree of probability of Arévalo's success, their assessment of public reaction, and their assessment of U.S. attitudes. The events in Peru have been the subject of close and careful scrutiny. It is quite conceivable that in the final analysis the decision of these people as to whether or not to attempt a coup will depend on U.S. attitudes.

I am not suggesting that I believe we should encourage or abet those who are considering the solution of the Arévalo problem by means of a coup; certainly I think such action at this time unwise. I do suggest that it is conceivable that the time may come when the literal application of the stated policy objective would place us in the position of trying to assure Arévalo's assumption of power and thus the probability of a Communist Guatemala. If that situation should arise, and our policy were to be as indicated, I would ask to be relieved of any responsibility for its execution, since I believe such a course of action would be inimical to the interests of both the United States and Guatemala.

It seems to me that the objective of policy and operation earlier quoted might well be replaced by two objectives somewhat as follows:

"1. The prevention of the accession to power of the Communists in Guatemala.

"2. The continuance, if possible within the framework of objective No. 1, of a legally established, constitutional government of Guatemala, including the peaceful transfer of administration following the 1963 elections."

I do not think that the people of Guatemala really want what I think Arévalo would bring; I do not believe there are many Guatemalans who seek a Communist state. Nevertheless, Arévalo's appeal, his very real demagogic and political capabilities can serve to maintain the illusion in the minds of many Guatemalans that his Government would not be a Communist one or the inevitable forerunner of such a Government.

I am not prepared to concede at this point in time that another and acceptable candidate cannot be brought to victory over Arévalo at the polls, although many obstacles impede that achievement and although some Embassy personnel believe that such an achievement is not possible. I am not convinced that a coup to forestall Arévalo's election is presently practicable, even if we wanted one, and I am very doubtful that such a coup would prove to be more than a stopgap measure. The election of an acceptable successor to Ydigoras through constitutional processes and democratic procedures is the only solution which would fully satisfy the needs of both the U.S. and Guatemala. I think our efforts must be directed toward this goal and that it should be considered the primary goal. If, in order to promote its attainment, we need to defer other goals, or to subordinate other desiderata, then we should do so. Nevertheless, as earlier indicated, we cannot exclude the possibility of failure nor the possibility of having to consider alternatives which fall short of the ideal solution.

I am convinced that the attainment of the objectives suggested above necessitates on our part a maximum effort to exert whatever influence and power we can bring to bear to coalesce support around a non-Communist opponent to Arévalo, to obtain a maximum unification of politicians and parties to this end.

In any such effort the role of Ydigoras is of considerable significance. Few would contend that Ydigoras could dictate the choice of his successor—certainly he does not have this power—but acquiescence in or support for the candidacy of Arévalo by Ydigoras would materially and perhaps fatally weaken the chances for defeating him.

It also seems apparent to me that the prospects for Arévalo's election would be materially improved if for the balance of Ydigoras' term the economic and fiscal situation were to deteriorate further. A growing conviction of failure of the Alianza to effect improvement in Guatemala's present status, regardless of where responsibility for such failure properly should be attributed, would certainly increase the political attractiveness of the great "spiritual socialist" Arévalo with his implication of capacity to solve all problems through acceptance of his mystic xenophobic doctrine. In this context (the economic and financial scene) the role of Ydigoras is also significant.

Ydigoras is the President of Guatemala. While his power and influence for the future surely wane as his term of office draws to a close, he is nevertheless the most powerful man in the country. The acts and functions of his government will directly and greatly influence the people, not only in their daily lives but in their assessment of the future and of the kind of government they will choose.

I am concerned, I hope unduly, that our relations with Ydigoras have been and may be handicapped by our attitudes toward him and his Government having been and perhaps being more harsh and more condemnatory than objective and realistic in terms of U.S. interests. This concern prompts me to an elaboration of this point, since I consider, as indicated above, that it is of considerable importance to our objectives to possess the maximum capability possible to influence Ydigoras.

Our relations with Ydigoras, while outwardly correct and friendly, are in fact as pleasant as they are primarily because the General is an intensely practical politician. He has realized and accepted the necessity, in his own self-interest and preservation, of maintaining friendly relations with the U.S. and, in my opinion, has done his best to do so. The U.S., for reasons based on evaluations which do not appear to stand the test of hindsight judgment, was strongly opposed to Ydigoras' candidacy for President, and supported an opponent in that election with very considerable financial and other assistance. This fact was well known to Ydigoras, but he presented himself to Washington shortly thereafter as nevertheless determined to follow policies at home and abroad with which we would be in accord. We accepted the olive branch officially but, to express it crudely, we appear to have classified him as a "bad guy" and, while occasionally prepared to concede he might not be all "bad" and might have "some" good points or do some "right" things, essentially our attitude seems to me to have been one of doubt, suspicion and derogation. At any rate, this is generally believed here to have been the U.S. attitude. Ydigoras has certainly thought so. Similarly, other political groups in Guatemala have sensed U.S. reserve regarding Ydigoras; both the President and his opposition have believed we were against him and I believe with reason. The attitudes of U.S. officials toward Ydigoras, our readiness to see and accent the bad side of his regime and our discounting of its accomplishments, cannot really be dissociated from the uniformly unfavorable press which he has received in the U.S. No U.S. newspaper or periodical or news service has maintained or stationed an American reporter in Guatemala. (TIME is an exception, although its correspondent is more Guatemalan than American.) Reliance is placed on spasmodic visits in times of trouble by reporters, whose stories appear to have been written before they arrived, and/or local nationals whose objectivity is hardly noteworthy. It seems quite probable that the U.S. press detects an hostile attitude by U.S. officials, as do Ydigoras and his opponents.

Such an attitude on our part, I would suggest, has not been and is not justified, even if one believes antipathy warranted on moral grounds. We must not let it color our judgment and influence our decision when to do so is counterproductive to our interests.

The criticisms of Ydigoras are many and not without some degree of validity. It is not my purpose to portray him favorably or unfavorably; my point is that it is he with whom we have to deal—whether we like him or not is unimportant and irrelevant; we need to understand him, to know his strengths and weaknesses, to evaluate correctly what he can and cannot do, and to use this knowledge to our advantage. It is my opinion that his record to date, all factors taken into consideration, does not compare unfavorably with other Latin Chiefs of State. The background portion of the April guidelines states: "The ill-defined social and economic objectives to which he gives lip service are more nearly identified with those of the liberal-leftist opposition than of his erstwhile conservative supporters So far, a shrewd political touch has enabled him to maintain himself in power in the face of seemingly overwhelming odds. The tragedy is that Ydigoras has neither chosen nor been able to use his abilities to rally support behind the fundamental changes which he apparently approves."

Ydigoras is not a man to originate nor to hold deep attachment for particular social or economic theories; he is not politically original nor creative. Nevertheless, in his own stubborn way he has sought to develop and to practice democracy in Guatemala within the limits of maintaining himself in power, the limited capability and willingness of the Guatemalan citizenry to practice it, and the nature of his own cultural and educational formation. If Washington is disappointed that he did not push or has not pushed (or tried to push regardless of the prospects of success) those ideas of the liberal leftists on which platform he did not run; the conservatives who elected him are similarly disappointed that he has not been a strong and dominant leader who would establish and maintain conservative government. In evaluating him, we must consider his power to act in realistic terms.

As noted in the background quoted above, Ydigoras has faced great difficulty in maintaining power. Submission of political differences and personal ambition to accept the fact of victory on the part of the opposition is not a characteristic of Guatemalan politicians and parties. (The recent vote in the Congress on the Investment Guaranty Agreement, for example, featured adverse votes by a number of Congressmen who, to my personal knowledge, believe the agreement important to Guatemala's progress but were more interested in opposing the Government for the sheer sake of opposition.) Our own attitudes referred to earlier have done little to temper or discourage the non-cooperative approach of the Ydigoras opposition; indeed, they may well have served to strengthen and encourage this position. From Ydigoras' point of view, he has been in a precarious position from the outset of his term, surrounded by opponents on all sides, denied full support by his own following, denied U.S. confidence and support if not actually denigrated by U.S. attitudes and actions, attacked by his enemies on any and every pretext. He has described his position as equivalent to a man on a slack wire equipped with a balancing pole which required careful and constant adjustment if he was to remain on the wire. His efforts to induce the so-called "better elements" of society to participate in government met with little success. His reaction to these circumstances has been to play off persons and groups against each other so that no one group would obtain enough power to upset him and so that a coalition of opposition would not occur. This had led him to a tolerance of Communists internally in the country. It has led him as well to wish to maintain the appearance of friendly relations with the U.S. despite our opposition to his election and our subsequent attitudes. It has led him to even greater reliance on his own judgment and instinct in dealing with problems, since he has felt a lack of confidence in both the capability and the trustworthiness of those who surround him. It has been pretty much a one-man government, but very far indeed from being dictatorship. Whether for tactical reasons of self-preservation, or from a conviction of the importance of human rights and the necessity for cultivating the growth of constitutional concepts, it is noteworthy that there has been during most of his term the maintenance of civil liberties for the great majority of Guatemalans.

Ydigoras in some ways is suggestive of a big city boss of the old Tammany type. He has maintained a personal relationship with the people especially the poorer elements in the country and in the city. He is always open to a personal appeal from such elements and provides help in enough cases to maintain their confidence that he has basic good will toward them and interest in their problems. He has sought to bring advancement to the country; since 1960 he has built 189 new schools and 126 more are under way, as compared with 370 in 63 years preceding; he has supported and stimulated efforts to deal with illiteracy; he has supported and stimulated distribution of land to the campesinos, 4,613 new owners have been created; he has supported and stimulated low cost housing programs, 2,568 new houses have already been built under this program and more are included in approved projects; he has pushed road and highway construction; he has spent a larger percentage of the federal increase on development activities than his predecessors. During his regime there is no doubt that personal profit has been taken. Give the well-established Latin tradition that to the victor belongs the spoils, it would have been remarkable if Ydigoras had broken the practice of some self-aggrandizement which has characterized all previous regimes. Critics claim his take has been excessive; supporters claim it has been less; no one claims 100% honesty—hardly anyone seems to have expected that or even to regard it as sensible! The moral standard seems to be one of reasonableness in profit taking. It is doubtful that Ydigoras has been excessively corrupt in Latin terms.

Ydigoras' foreign policy has been one of rather complete cooperation with the United States. We have become so accustomed to expecting Guatemala to vote our way in every international forum and to support our position on every international issue that we take this pretty much for granted. This record of support and cooperation reflects, however, Government policy rather than an absolute identity of U.S. and Guatemalan interests, or of Guatemalan and U.S. opinion and thought. The principal and almost only aspect of Guatemalan foreign policy which has troubled us has been the Ydigoras position on Belize—British Honduras, a claim antedating his regime. He has enjoyed pulling the tail of the British lion on this issue; it has proved a useful distraction from domestic issues; it is unlikely that this problem would ever prove more than passingly troublesome to us.

It is also worth noting that during Ydigoras' regime, the economy of Guatemala—long dependent on the basic crop of coffee—has been adversely affected by the growing excess of coffee supplies in the world. Government revenues based on coffee export taxes to a very great extent has accordingly depreciated. Thus as demand for additional Government services has grown, the financial capacity of the Government to provide them has depreciated. Obviously the need has been for fiscal and tax reform but such measures are largely dependent on legislation and Ydigoras' power to compel legislation has never been complete. As discussed in some detail in a separate airgram (A-120 of September 1, 1962), the U.S. outlays of aid following the overthrow of the Arbenz regime have in part made possible a continuation of a pattern of expenditures in excess of revenue, concealed or muted the need for reform and we had not until recently called either our own or the Guatemalan Government's attention to a consideration of either need or remedies.

Ydigoras' own temperament, his lack of creativity, his self-reliance, his lack of adequate political power, the lack of cooperation and support with which he has had to live, the U.S. attitudes, the deteriorating economy—all have had a part in history of the past four years and its accomplishments and failures.

While I think we must continue to press upon the President the need for actions to improve the political and economic situation in Guatemala, as we have been doing, I also think we should strive "to accentuate the positive" in our dealings with him. I do not suggest that we embark on a love-Ydigoras campaign, but I do suggest we strive to create in his mind the belief that we evaluate him fairly and that it is to his interest to play ball with us all the way. The establishment of such a conviction can go a long way in obtaining Ydigoras' cooperation in the achievement of our objective of a non-Communist Guatemala.

130. Memorandum of conversation, November 28, between President Kennedy and Ambassador Alejos¹

November 28, 1962

SUBJECT

Ambassador Alejos' Call on President Kennedy

PARTICIPANTS

The President

Edwin M. Martin, Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs

Ambassador Alejos, Guatemala

Ambassador Alejos started out by expressing his Government's and the Guatemalan peoples' warm congratulations and admiration for the President's handling of the Cuban incident.

He then commented in general terms about the recent attack by Guatemalan Air Force personnel on the Government in Guatemala City. While he explained the primary motivation as being fear of Arevalo as President and concern on the part of conservative elements about recently enacted agrarian reform and income tax laws, he also stressed that a professional student organizer had recently returned to Guatemala from Cuba with large sums of money and was passing out checks in great profusion. It was not quite clear how the two things meshed together in this particular action.

He then said that President Ydigoras had long been deeply concerned about the Castro threat and felt that there could not be peace in the Caribbean until the Castro regime had been removed from power. The President and his advisors had drawn up a plan to this end in April, had been studying it since that time, but had decided a month or so ago that it was worth passing on to President Kennedy for such use as it may be to him.

President Kennedy read the plan quickly and noted that it was based primarily on training and arming Cuban refugees. The President expressed his appreciation for the suggestions and said they would be studied but that it seemed doubtful that one could get enough Cuban refugees to do the job. He referred to the special arrangements we have made for a Cuban brigade but indicated that relatively few Cubans had volunteered to serve. The President concluded the conversation by asking the Ambassador to convey his appreciation to President

¹ Unrest in Guatemala and concern over Castro threat. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Guatemala, September–December 1962.

Ydigoras for the proposals made and said a reply would be forthcoming soon.

131. Telegram 385 from Guatemala City, December 18¹

Guatemala City, December 18, 1962

Action Department 385, Information POLAD CINCARIB Un-numbered.

FY 1962 MAP included four T-33 aircraft for Guatemala which are now at Kelly Field in Texas ready for delivery. Such delivery had been planned for December, GAF readiness to receive and maintain having been established. Events of November 25, 1962 initially publicly described as attempted Air Force revolt, necessitated suspension of delivery action until those events and results could be assessed. Embassy view is that we should proceed with delivery action at early date, subject only to conditions discussed below.

Appears clear that attempted coup was not (repeat not) a revolt by Air Force, but rather a badly planned, poorly managed, and wholly unsuccessful effort by small group officers probably stimulated and encouraged by other officers (including some Army officers) and by some civilians, to overthrow Ydigoras. Plot well advertised and probably made known in advance by some of its members to President, since he was well prepared to deal with it. Conspirators undoubtedly of rightist political persuasion and not (repeat not) communist nor communist-supported. Some of limited number of Air Force personnel who participated in sorties were under impression that Army in revolt and that Air Force role was to protect government. President told me he now satisfied that only handful of Air Force officers involved.

Motivation for attempt appears to have been combination of concern over economic and fiscal situation, general dissatisfaction with lack government leadership, fear that trend of events and attitude of Ydigoras fore-told advent to power of Arevalo and, of course, the usual ambitions for power. This current of thought not confined in Guatemala to persons active in revolt but extends to substantial group politically right of center. Possible that recurrent rumors of United States sympathy for Arevalo, credibility of which strengthened greatly here by recent reports of Moscoso-Arevalo talks, increased feeling of this group of need for early action preclude his return to power.

¹ Review of attempted "Air Force" revolt and MAP deliveries. Secret. 6 pp. DOS, CF, 714.5622/12-1762.

While President was clearly informed of plans and was ready to deal with rebels, appears likely that he was not at all certain of extent of movement nor as to backing. An interesting aspect was that President early morning Sunday Nov. 25 telephoned [less than 1 line not declassified] to invite him come at once to Casa Crema for a discussion of no particular urgency. We believe it not unlikely that Ydigoras at this point was not entirely sure whether revolt might not have U.S. backing and that his invitation, which was readily accepted, was to check to see what reaction our people would have at being asked to be present at the scene where armed attack had been planned. Presumably ready and truly innocent acceptance served to dispel his concern. Also possible that vigorous and wholesale action against all of Air Force taken in aftermath of shooting reflected not only natural reaction to being subject of armed attack in rebellion against government, but also reflective of uncertainty as to degree to which Air Force as whole was involved.

Some opinion among U.S. Air Force personnel here, which not without logic, that President saw involvement of Air Force personnel as giving him opportunity effect some adjustments in Air Force, to reduce its growing aggressiveness regarding its wants, and to redress balance in influence with Army which to some degree envious Air Force prestige, better pay and greater emoluments. Friction between Lemus and Batres, numbers one and two in GAF, had been notorious and since both men well known Ydigoras supporters, this presented President with trying problem. Lemus had been increasingly strong in pushing the President for Air Force requirements and Ydigoras not type to enjoy pressure from subordinates. Ydigoras noteworthy for tactics of keeping groups divided and balanced against each other and may well have felt that Air Force getting a little big for its breeches.

In any case initial actions against Air Force were indiscriminate and harsh, perhaps pleasing to Army critics and public who suffered three dead and about a dozen wounded, but certainly resented by loyal and non-involved Air Force personnel. Ydigoras has now decided time has come to distinguish between guilty and non-guilty, and has taken opportunity to deal with command problem at same time. Both Lemus, who it could hardly be expected would retain command after being personally over-powered by rebels and ineffective in dissuading them, and Batres, who was playing golf (even though he reports that he phoned in and was told by Roberto Alejos not to report for duty), have been removed from their command positions and the Air Force has been placed under command of Gen Carrascosa, reputed to be strong on discipline. Air Force prestige is at a low point and it will be a long time before it can regain influence it once had. At same time, it is clear Ydigoras does not want Air Force to become insignificant militarily or politically or in terms its balancing off of army forces, for which reason he is eager to get fresh start with Air Force. His idea is to proceed with delivery of long-wanted jets and on delivery to have an Air Force Day celebration, (previously scheduled event for December 10 having been cancelled in wake Nov. 25 events), and thus improve Air Force morale. It is hard to dispute Ydigoras' judgment as to wisdom these tactics, even if it seems in retrospect that the spanking given the Air Force will leave resentments not likely to be eradicated readily even by delivery T-33's.

From our point of view, there is no disputing that we are committed to the delivery to the T-33's. Not to do so at this point would not only be a breach of contract, but would be deeply resented by both the President and the Air Force to which the T-33's symbolize being a modern Air Force. The delivery of the aircraft appears to me essential to our policy of supporting the Ydigoras government, as well as essential to maintaining a relationship with the Air Force which would permit flexibility in considering alterations or modifications in our current policy at some future date if that should prove desirable. The political and military justifications for programming and committing ourselves to deliver these planes have not been basically altered by the fact of participation in an unsuccessful coup by a few Air Force officers.

At same time it would appear propitious moment to discuss with President certain measures which would appear necessary or desirable to assure an effective Air Force and conducive to restoration of Air Force morale—and thus to the Air Force becoming a balancing element of the sort Ydigoras is believed to want. While we are not overly concerned by Zea's previous opportunistic record as in itself constituting any great threat, since his history seems to reflect more of a desire to advance than a political concoction, and since his present post must exceed his past expectations, he is not a very attractive or dependable type. Further, our Air officers believe that his Prussian type ideas of discipline and his lack of flying capacity augur poorly for improvement in Air Force morale. Given the fact of his appointment, it would seem unrealistic to expect the President to change him now, but possibly he could be persuaded to make this a temporary appointment and to plan to change Zea in the not too distant future.

The time also seems propitious to get the President to order the Air Force to clean up its inventory by disposing of old aircraft (T-6 and C-45) which are presently only a burden but to which Air Force has held on in hopes that they could be disposed of in such a way as to assure that the proceeds went into Air Force funds. We will insist as a condition precedent to delivery of the T-33's that the organization of the GAF squadrons and the assignment of pilots be re-established in accordance with sound practice. We will also require agreement that our Air Mission certification of competence be a prerequisite to permitting GAF pilots to fly the T-33's. We will also seek to obtain agreement to confining GAF pilots to flying one, or at most two, types of aircraft rather than the hit or miss assignment of any pilot to any aircraft which has prevailed and which prevents the top skill in handling any type to be obtained. The President will also be advised that to accept proposals to reduce Air Force pay and emolument and to require a common uniform of all military would seem inadvisable if the morale of the Air Force is not to be totally destroyed.

The occasion will also be used to discuss some general problems of MAP supply clearance. I think we can make some useful suggestions for more effective liaison arrangements between our military missions and elements of [illegible in the original].

In summary, I propose proceed as above envisaging delivery of aircraft on or about January 6. Would appreciate immediate telegraphic concurrence in this course action since President returning Guatemala mid-week and I will have to tell him something about our views shortly thereafter.

General O'Meara who enroute Washington and with whom foregoing discussed, is in accord that T-33's should be delivered.

Bell

132. Memorandum from Dungan to President Kennedy, January 22¹

January 22, 1963

Attached are two background papers—one dealing with Haiti and one with Guatemala. They were prepared for your 4 o'clock meeting today.

As you will note from reading them, the situation in both countries has one similarity—both regimes are discredited, there is no suitable alternative on the horizon, and we have relatively few assets.

Ralph A. Dungan

¹ Transmits attached background paper on Guatemala. Top Secret. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, President's Office Files, Guatemala, Security, 1961-63.

Attachment

SUBJECT

Guatemala

1. The term of President Ydígoras ends in March 1964, with the election of his successor scheduled to take place late this year.

2. The prospect that former President (1945 to 51) Juan José Arévalo may successfully mobilize his considerable popularity to win re-election to office has spread fear and confusion among middle-of-the-road and other anti-Communist elements in Guatemala. Arévalo is not a Communist, but his confused, ill-balanced, political philosophy of "spiritual socialism", fed by deep prejudice against the United States, served the Communist purpose well during his administration, precursor to the Communist dominated Arbenz administration of 1951 to 54. Should he regain power, he would likely serve the Communist purpose well again, turning his country away from friendly relations with the United States, and away from a constructive role in the Alliance for Progress for which he has no apparent understanding or sympathy.

3. The moderate forces opposing Arevalism within Guatemala persist in their traditional inability to unify for victory. They have been unable thus far to produce a leader of significant political stature.

4. Ydígoras, through his mastery of internal Guatemalan politics, has maintained himself in power, but he is not leading his country anywhere. He suppressed a brief Air Force revolt on November 25, and has managed to overcome the most immediate severities of his administration's chronic budget problem and to meet Government payrolls quickly enough to avert disorder which threatened to come from arrears in payments.

(Guatemala recently succeeded in floating $7 million in bond sales to private United States banks, removing the apparent need for an emergency budgetary support loan of the same amount which we had been prepared to make to the Government. While the basic condition of the Guatemalan economy is reasonably good and will probably improve, assuming political stability, Government finances are in need of drastic reform and the administration will operate on a hand-to-mouth basis for the foreseeable future.)

5. It is no secret that there is wide-spread feeling in Guatemala favoring a military coup to oust Ydígoras, and arrange for elections which would exclude the participation of Arévalo. Under Guatemalan electoral law, Arévalo would be ineligible to assume office for a term beginning before March 1963, i.e., before the end of a 12-year interval since he last held the office of President. The key element in this respect is the military; its intent is still uncertain.

6. Ydígoras is withholding endorsement from any of the current candidates, hoping to maximize his influence on the ultimate choice. While he has been an outspoken opponent of Arévalo, there has allegedly been some contact between them, and the possibility is not to be excluded that Ydígoras could accommodate himself to an Arévalo victory in return for assurance of being left in peace in Guatemala after retiring from office.

7. The Latin American Policy Committee with the participation of Ambassador Bell in November 1962 examined the problem of the presidential succession in Guatemala and decided on the course of action set forth in the Secretary's Memorandum for the President of December 7, relating to the Special Letter Attached to the Byroade Report on Guatemala.

[text not declassified]

133. Memorandum for the record, January 22¹

January 22, 1963

SUBJECT

Meeting at the White House, January 22, 1963

Assistant Secretary Martin, AID Administrator Bell, Mr. Graham Martin, Deputy Coordinator Alliance for Progress; Mr. John Crimmins, Director of Caribbean and Mexican Affairs, and I were present at a meeting at the White House January 22 to discuss Guatemala and Haiti. Col. J.C. King, Chief of the Western Hemisphere Division, and Mr. Helms, his immediate superior from the Agency, were also present.

The President opened the meeting, asking about the situation in Guatemala and the candidacy of Arévalo. He was told that the Latin American Policy Committee had agreed in December on eight courses of action for Guatemala as follows:

[text not declassified]

Mr. Martin [less than 1 line not declassified] indicated that [less than 1 line not declassified] not too much progress had been made. Finding and building up an acceptable candidate in Guatemala seemed almost impossible. Mario Mendez Montenegro had been discredited in the municipal elections and possibly Jose Cruz Salazar was stronger in the interior than had been expected. Three observers are working on the poll of Arévalo's strength in the interior and find that it is not as strong as it was suspected. By March, the results should be known. [less than 1 line not declassified] Arévalo's prestige in Guatemala without the United States appearing to take [less than 1 line not declassified]. Positions at Padua and West Berlin Universities have been found for Arévalo and, after there is some pressure on him, possibly he might take one of these. [less than 1 line not declassified] is also beginning to look into the military attitude. The military leaders at present seem to indicate that they will not tolerate Arévalo's election. [text not declassified] another inter-agency meeting will take place early in March. The President was very interested and wanted to know more about Arévalo himself. He does not feel that we should appear to be in open opposition to Arévalo because he is afraid that if we could not do anything about stopping his election we must keep some lines open to him. The President wanted to know what the Mexicans think of Arévalo. (Mr. Martin has sent Tom Mann a letter on this subject.) [text not declassified] Mr. Martin indicated he had also written President Betancourt and Foreign Minister Muniz of Argentina that Arévalo was not a suitable candidate and the President wanted to know what Betancourt thought of Arévalo. Mr. Martin said that our Ambassador had twice reported that Betancourt was pretty disillusioned about Arévalo and the President suggested that the inter-agency meeting take place in mid-March before the Costa Rican meeting and that he would talk to Betancourt about Arévalo when the former visits Washington soon. [less than 1 line not declassified] indicated that one course of action open to Ydígoras is a trial of Arévalo for killing a Colonel Arana. The President made it clear that he did not want any physical action taken against Arévalo. This was clearly understood. He also wanted to know who Arévalo's friends in the United States are. It was agreed we would try and find this out. He was very interested in Arévalo's recent book and arrangements were being made to send a copy to Mr. Dungan. The President especially wanted to know what Arévalo had said or done the last two or three years, does this show he has changed? What does he think about things? Would it be possible to get along with him?

¹ Meeting at the White House to discuss the situation in Guatemala and Arévalo's candidacy. Top Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 714.00/1-2263.

In the Haiti talks (reported separately) Mr. Martin indicated that President Duvalier had failed to perform properly and would probably not retire when his normal term of the presidency ended in May. Mr. Martin recalled that he had gone through a phony election last May allegedly extending his term six years. The President again indicated that [less than 1 line not declassified] (Mr. Martin had made it very clear that the opposition was completely fragmented) we should not cut all our bridges to Duvalier.

Another topic of interest introduced was the President's question as to why Muniz had raised a question of budgetary support in talks earlier that day. Mr. Martin reported that even when Ambassador McClintock had left Buenos Aires budgetary support was not on the schedule and that Muniz was very embarrassed to raise this but had apparently gotten orders from his President at the time of his departure to try and get some money.

The President also spoke of his visit to Costa Rica which will be covered in a separate memorandum.

V. Lansing Collins

Director

Office of Central American and Panamanian Affairs

134. DOS Guidelines for Policy and Operations: Guatemala, February 1963¹

February 1963

TABLE OF CONTENTS

- I. BASIC APPROACH
- II. BACKGROUND
- III. OBJECTIVES
- IV. LINES OF ACTION
 - POLITICAL
 - ECONOMIC
 - EDUCATIONAL, INFORMATIONAL and
 - CULTURAL

GUIDELINES OF UNITED STATES POLICY AND OPERATIONS TOWARD GUATEMALA

I. BASIC APPROACH

Guatemala knew three centuries of harsh grandeur as headquarters of the Spanish Capitancy General until independence in 1821. It suffered dictators, several bearing the 19th Century "liberal" label, from 1821 to 1944. Since that time, ferment rather than growth has characterized the political scene. Indians, Ladinos² and Euro-Americans make up its people, in that order, with little sympathetic rapport between the segments. Economic development beginning in the late 19th Century centered principally around the coffee lands owned in great part, until World War II, by energetic German planters and merchants, and the banana plantations of the United Fruit Company. Economic growth and political upheavals since 1944 have created an emerging middle group, composed of new entrepreneurs and their employees, men in the professions, and civil servants, which favor movement toward a more modern economic and political system.

¹ Secret. 23 pp. DOS, S/P Files: Lot 67 D 396.

The wealthy landowning and business elements, numerically few and not organized to exercise direct political power, strongly influence legislation and government actions touching their interests through sporadic pressure group organizations and by dealing individually with politicians and bureaucrats. Political life takes place before a largely inert, apathetic disillusioned public, and consists mainly of maneuver among a few politicians for personal advantage.

The numerous political parties are mostly paper organizations, none of them having any historical continuity. The army is the ultimate arbiter of power. Its officers have a vested interest in safeguarding their status in society, which for most of them represents an advance from relatively modest origins. They are not sympathetic to communism or extreme leftism, tend otherwise to be politically neuter, with the leaders cautiously watching for the opportune time to use their power to shape political events to suit them.

The present administration has not exercised leadership in setting targets or means of encouraging any meaningful national effort at combined political and economic growth. Despite the surface indications of well-entrenched power, political unrest and social ferment is strong and increasing and if the desire for basic change is unduly thwarted it will undoubtedly lead to further upheaval in Guatemala.

We seek to use our total influence, comprising our economic aid and all other aspects of our presence in Guatemala, to induce action on a range of development programs with pre-conditions which will give a widening segment of the Guatemalan population a sense of confidence in combined political-economic growth, and faith in the ability of the country's governmental machinery to move toward satisfaction of democratic aspirations.

² A Ladino is a person of Indian or mixed Indian blood who has left traditional Indian community life and assimilated himself into the money economy and the social modes of the towns and urban centers. Three-fifths of the population is still pure Indian in blood, and 95% have some Indian blood.

II. BACKGROUND

Recalling its earlier role as the seat of Spanish power in Central America, literate Guatemalans desire that their country exercise leadership among its small neighbors. This aspiration has been frustrated in part by Guatemala's own economic, social and political weaknesses.

Economically, the country is tied to the prosperity of its export crops—coffee, bananas and cotton. Socially, the population is divided on class and racial lines, with the lower class being comprised principally of the Indian segment, which in recent years has begun to require more attention in the field of economic development as it moves into the money economy.

Politically, the country is in a transition period with control by the moneyed class of sectors on which they depended for power—rural labor and personal influence in ministries—being loosened but not yet broken. The politico-socio structure which would support development toward moderately representative government since 1944 has suffered alternate over-encouragement, artificial organization and restructuring in such rapid succession that the base for stable party organization today is still weak.

The social and political revolution beginning in 1944 manifested the aspirations of urban civilian groups. In its wake, political organization was established from the top down, and at the community level in varying degrees replaced, conflicted with, or operated parallel to the cofradia or sodality organization which had characterized Indian villages. These discontinuous changes, reflected in urban centers by a proliferation of labor unions and other quasi-political associations, were not understood by leaders or members. Personalism, caudillismo and caciquismo ("bossism") still dominate the political atmosphere today.

In 1944, the last of the 19th Century type dictators who had ruled Guatemala for most of the time since independence from Spain in 1821 was overthrown and Juan Jose Arevalo emerged to institute the first real social and economic changes the country had experienced.

The politically conscious segment of the population plunged for the first time into the exhilarating experiences of freely organizing and choosing among political groups, enjoying freedom of speech and press, forming labor unions and using their power against entrenched wealth, and demanding and getting from their government some of the social welfare benefits which they were learning to identify with advancement of their nation.

When Arevalo turned over power in 1951 to an elected successor, Jacobo Arbenz, it was the first time in Guatemalan history an elected President had served his full term. Arbenz was elected by a leftist coalition that had wide popular appeal. His administration, however, came quickly under the effective control of a small group of well organized Communists. His excesses brought on the successful counter-revolution of Colonel Castillo Armas in 1954. In its zeal to obliterate every vestige of communism, the Castillo Armas regime allowed some worthwhile liberal social changes to founder in the shambles which Arbenz left behind.

The Guatemalan labor movement, in particular, still is affected by its resentment of the repressive tactics used by Castillo Armas to correct the excesses of the Communists during the Arbenz regime. However, by the time of his assassination in July 1957, Castillo Armas had begun to get some of his moderate forward-looking programs under way. His death was a blow to Guatemalan political development, not only because of the chaos of the nine months interim before Ydígoras Fuentes finally took office in March 1958, but because he had set on positive goals and had the understanding leadership to carry the people into a combined economic and political growth for the first time in Guatemalan history.

The liberationist (MDN) regime of Castillo Armas was replaced by the conservative Redencion administration of General Miguel Ydígoras Fuentes, a military officer who had grown up under the last dictator Ubico and had been his Director General of Public Roads. The ill-defined social and economic objectives to which he gives lip service are more nearly those of his liberal leftist opposition than his erstwhile conservative supporters. In many ways he is still an enigma. In an apparent atmosphere of political freedom, he has been politically shrewd in dividing, fractioning and playing off any individuals or groups who give indication of leadership competitive to his own. He has not demonstrated the same political acumen in cultivating support for necessary economic measures (such as congressional ratification of a badly needed highway loan agreement) in a Congress where his party presumably controlled a coalition majority.

He has been in the forefront of Latin American presidents in the anti-Castro campaign and in proclaiming the dangers of Castro communism to Guatemala. At the same time, he has consistently refused to take measures to control or even give proper surveillance to Communist activities within Guatemala. He has allowed Communists to infiltrate major unions but has so far avoided major disruptive labor agitation by keeping key Communist union leaders on his payroll. Although his administration has managed a minimum amount of rural development apart from that financed by the AID program, he has capitalized on the opening ceremony of every schoolhouse and distribution of land title to enhance his image as the Cacique whom Indians will respect.

He cannot comprehend cooperative effort toward certain objectives; he deals in quids pro quo. In his mind, the United States owes him assistance for his international stance against Castro. The Charter of Punta del Este is for the others who have been less cooperative than he. His government is highly personalized but ineffective. Just as many Guatemalans link the United States with the successful overthrow of Arbenz and blame us for the relapses that followed under Castillo Armas, they hold us responsible for the lack of progress under Ydigoras.

During his administration (which ends in March 1964), Ydigoras has weathered demonstrations by students, teachers, labor groups, one serious revolt attempt in the Army (November 1960), another abortive attempt by Air Force elements (November 1962), and periodic small-scale guerrilla activity in rural areas. In March-April 1962, he was brought almost to the brink of overthrow when the use of excessive violence in dealing with student demonstrations served to fan the fires of resentment that had smouldered since December 1961 when alleged widespread election frauds had created an issue. At the same time, unplanned coincidence of guerrilla activity near Puerto Barrios led by the November 1960 army dissidents kept the military off balance. Throughout these trials he has managed to remain in power because of support by the military.

During the April disturbances, responsible military elements reportedly maneuvered seriously with an opposition coalition. Well-to-do businessmen who have remained outside the political arena, except to manipulate on behalf of their private transactions, were constrained to begin a participation as a private enterprise group that may keep them in the political scene.

The military forces are identified with the preservation of the constitutional process insofar as the threat of a coup by leftists is concerned. While unified in this ideal, the higher ranking officers tend to think in caudillo terms of personalized military leadership, and the younger officers give indications of having been influenced by the desire for social progress. Another strain on military unity has been the lack of promotional opportunities for younger officers because of the already overcrowded higher ranks (of 801 officers, 357 are full colonels).

Many Guatemalans demand the renewal of the fundamental social revolution as it was promised in the 1944 movement under Juan Jose Arevalo, before the Communists took over and aborted it. From his exile in Mexico, Arevalo has announced his availability for re-election to the presidency for the term beginning in 1964, and there is wide belief in Guatemala that he can win. Hopelessly obsessed with a psychopathic hatred of the United States and blind to his own role in betraying the 1944 movement to the Communists, Arevalo's ambition and latent strength pose a danger to the peaceful evolution of Guatemala. There is ample ground to believe that Arevalo's return to power would represent a significant gain for the Communist/Castroite cause. Nevertheless, there is a cloud of doubt over Ydigoras' attitude toward, and relations with, Arevalo. There are traces of evidence that in his spiteful determination to thwart the presidential aims of an overt and apparently untainted leftist-liberal party in Guatemala (Revolutionary Party—Partido Revolucionario—PR), Ydigoras is engaged in covert collusion to build up Arevalo.

Guatemalan Communists number some 1200 hard-core members in their "Guatemalan Labor Party" (Partido Guatemalteco de Trabajo—PGT), with about 2500 sympathizers elsewhere, particularly in the United Revolutionary Party (Partido Unido Revolucionario—PUR). They have infiltrated both student and labor groups. However, as was demonstrated in the April disturbances, they are organized to exploit quickly and effectively minor breakdowns of public order or issues over which public emotions can be aroused.

Economically, the short term prospects for substantial progress in Guatemala are not encouraging. The very sharp reduction in coffee export earnings, the marked decline in both foreign and domestic private investment, and the critical fiscal situation of the government with the resultant drastic cuts in public investment, have all contributed to producing the economic stagnation that has endured since early 1960. Ydigoras certainly cannot be blamed for all the economic ills that now beset Guatemala, but the political unrest and upheaval of which he has been the central target have certainly compounded the effects of the other economic developments. The Gross National Product (1961: $678 million) on a per capita basis has declined since 1960, whereas in the 50's Guatemala had enjoyed an average annual per capita GNP increase of 4.9 per cent. The imposition of exchange controls in October 1962 because of declining reserves would indicate the economic situation continues its deterioration. Constructive leadership by the government which would restore confidence and give a sense of direction would go a long way in putting the economy into forward motion.

The creeping discrepancy between actual revenues and minimum necessities for ever-expanding expenditure requirements is the single most critical economic problem of the moment in Guatemala. It can only be solved by creating new sources of revenue or more effective enforcement of existing measures. It has been difficult for Ydigoras to muster sufficient political support for additional revenues partially because he himself does not understand the long term problems involved. Limited fiscal resources have led to temporizing, with available funds applied where they will reap the most immediate political advantage. This failure to deal with basic fiscal problems has been cited as an example of his essential failure as a leader.

From January to April of 1962, Ydigoras carried on an intensive agitation campaign against the United Kingdom over Belize, threatening rupture of relations, confiscation of British interests, etc. As a result, informal tripartite talks were held in April between United Kingdom, Guatemala and British Honduran representatives. The resultant arrangements decided upon for improved economic cooperation have lightened pressure by the Guatemalans for the time being.

III. OBJECTIVES

Within the framework of the primary U.S. objectives outlined in the Latin American Guidelines, the following are specific objectives for Guatemala:

A. Short Term

1. Initiation by Ydigoras of actions or programs in which U.S. support can be identified with obvious long-term advantages for social and economic development in Guatemala, rather than merely with the personal prestige of Ydigoras.

2. The election of a successor to Ydigoras who from a broad political base will promote needed economic and social development in Guatemala, and favor a close and friendly relationship with the United States.

3. Strengthened capability of military and police forces to penetrate and control subversive activities of Castro-Communists.

B. Longer Term

1. The adoption of fiscal and other legislative and administrative reforms in order to provide a sounder basis for planning and implementing development under the Alliance for Progress.

2. Improvement of the capabilities of the military and police forces to maintain public order and internal security and contribute to development within a constitutional democracy.

3. Moderation of Guatemalan claims to Belize (British Honduras) and the reduction of Anglo-Guatemalan friction over this issue to the extent this can be accomplished without direct United States involvement.

IV. LINES OF ACTION

Political

1. Mindful of the threat which highly personalized government represents to the continuity of stable, democratic government, seek to convince both Ydigoras and his opposition that for the common good, they should concentrate their efforts on building political organizations which will participate in elections, rather than depend on coups or counter coups.

2. Encourage groups and associations of prominent and influential Guatemalans (such as the National Independent Union—UNI), who have a larger economic stake in political stability and social order, to contribute both their personal capacities and their financial resources in working with the government to promote both short and long term social and economic goals. This could have a decisive influence in reinforcing the line of action set forth in 1 above.

3. Encourage greater delegation of authority and responsibility within the administration in order to dilute further the effect of personalism on the development of orderly democratic development.

4. Encourage activation of programs such as community development in order to instill techniques and institutions which will permit the predominant Indian population to assimilate into the mainstream of Guatemalan life with a minimum of friction and frustration.

5. Encourage the Guatemalan Government to cooperate in the orderly and peaceful transition of British Honduras to independent status, when its economic viability has become more assured, and to induce the latter to integrate economically with the rest of Central America.

Economic

6. Seek to secure basic improvements in all phases of public administration, but with most urgent priority on fiscal reforms which will increase revenues, distribute tax burdens more justly, diminish evasion, reduce expenditures and systematize fiscal planning and control. Continue, in this connection, the informal joint United States-Guatemalan steering group on the Alliance for Progress, created at our Embassy's initiative.

7. Persuade the Government of Guatemala and the private sector to develop jointly a broad plan for a self-sustaining rate of growth. Essential elements of a plan meriting our support would be (a) diversification of agriculture including expansion of the livestock and dairy industry, (b) development of agricultural processing industries and light and medium manufacturers, (c) study and development of power, communications and transport resources, and (d) eventual integration into the national economy of the large Indian population.

8. Encourage the Government of Guatemala and private organizations to plan jointly with regional, national and private Central American entities to strengthen the Central American Common Market and regional economic development.

Educational, Informational and Cultural

9. Encourage the Government of Guatemala and university leaders to cooperate with the Central American Superior Council of University Rectors or other regional educational organizations which will provide better regional use of funds invested in higher education.

10. Encourage part-time or evening class enrollment in the University of junior officers of the Embassy, USAID and our Military Mission, where they could not only exert some individual influence but more importantly acquire information on student movements and reactions and assist in spotting potential candidates for student exchange grants. Close liaison with American students and teachers at the University would serve similar purposes.

11. Within reasonable limits continue the successful USIA- and AID-assisted experiments in the use of television as an informational and educational media which has both intrinsic and demonstrational value.

Labor

12. Encourage the progressive relaxation by the government of the restrictions and controls on moderate, democratically oriented trade union elements, and increase our own assistance for training and orientation of carefully selected trade unionists.

Military and Police

13. Make available to the Government of Guatemala, on a grant basis if necessary, the minimum military and police equipment and training needed to assist in the maintenance of public order and internal security.

14. Support a civic-action military program by providing personnel and suitable equipment.

15. In order to implement the provisions of NSAM 140,³ applicable to Guatemala, encourage the continued friendly relationship between the Guatemalan and United States military establishments, the use by Guatemala of United States military material, the generation of greater understanding and acceptance of United States military doctrine, and expanded exchange programs between Guatemalan and United States military personnel.

V. CONTINGENCIES

Contingencies which would frustrate United States policies include:

1. Coup by "outs" or assassination of Ydigoras: If either contingency should occur, it could be followed by a period of chaos and uncertainty, particularly if Ydigoras were assassinated. Should Communists or radical leftists appear to be moving into a position of control over the new government, the military would probably react with force of arms.

³ NSAM 140: Subject: Participation of U.S. and Latin American Armed Forces in the Attainment of Common Objectives in Latin America.

2. A 1963 election victory by an anti-American leftist. If leftist, anti-American Juan Jose Arevalo, or someone of his stripe or under his influence, should win the 1963 elections, the new government (taking office March 1, 1964) would probably adopt policies and programs inimical to the interests of the United States.

135. Memorandum of conversation, March 20, between President Kennedy and President Ydígoras¹

March 20, 1963

SUBJECT

Relations with Cuba; Elections; Belize; Domestic Reforms

PARTICIPANTS

UNITED STATES
The President

GUATEMALA
President Ydígoras

The President expressed his pleasure in meeting President YDÍGORAS, whom he admired for his courageous stand during the Cuban affair in 1961. President Ydígoras stated that Guatemala was ready to follow whatever policy the United States Government might adopt with respect to Cuba, and that he fully understood Cuba's place within the context of the over-all world situation. He stated that Guatemala would, if required, offer its territory for the training of another contingent of anti-Castro Cubans. He expressed the opinion that the United States should not directly participate in the invasion, but rather serve as a banker for the participants.

The President reiterated the situation of Cuba within the framework of the world situation and said that perhaps the elimination of Castro himself might lead to an improvement of the Cuban situation since Castro individually was of such great psychological importance.

The President inquired as to what the situation was for the forthcoming elections and as to what measures might be taken to make it more difficult for Arévalo to win. He expressed the belief that Arévalo would undoubtedly campaign as an anti-Communist moderate but that he would be dangerous if he won the elections.

¹ Relations with Cuba; elections; Belize; domestic reforms. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 15-1 US/KENNEDY.

President Ydígoras said that Arévalo's projected return to Guatemala in March would undoubtedly cause a big stir, but that in the forthcoming months he expected Arévalo's popularity to drop. He said that he would attempt to create a split among Arévalo's supporters by indirectly proclaiming the need of Arévaloism without Arévalo and for having a new man as a candidate to carry out Arévalo's program. He agreed that Arévalo was dangerous because were he to win the elections he would not be able to contain the extreme leftists in his movement. Should Arévalo win, a preventive coup might be called for such as the ones that took place in Argentina and Peru.

The President said that he would look into this and pointed out that President Betancourt had expressed his opposition to Arévalo, to which President Ydígoras replied that a reconciliation was always feasible.

President Ydígoras explained a problem with Great Britain related to the outstanding payment due of $1½ million on some bonds which were issued in 1830. The case was now in the lower courts in Guatemala and would undoubtedly take years before it is settled. Meanwhile, the World Bank has been holding up credits to Guatemala because of this. He stated that it was not appropriate for the World Bank to serve as a debt collector for any country.

President Ydígoras gave the President some reports on Guatemala's claim to Belize explaining that this area closes a potential outlet to the Caribbean from the richest area of the country. Guatemala wants Belize to eventually become an associated state in the Central American Federation with a status similar to that of Puerto Rico.

President Ydígoras said that Guatemala is working on its internal reform and that a proposed income tax law was pigeonholed in Congress for three years. He had pressured Congress into approving the law, and the day after he signed it, a group of right-wingers hired two Air Force pilots to strike his Palace in an assassination attempt that was almost successful. He said that for political reasons he had blamed Castroites and Communists for this attempt.

President Ydígoras said that his Administration needed to give tangible evidence during the months of April, May and June of its intentions to benefit them and that United States assistance would be very useful in this program.

136. Memorandum from Edwin M. Martin to U. Alexis Johnson, March 27¹

March 27, 1963

To: G—Mr. Johnson

THROUGH

S/S
FROM: ARA—Mr. Martin

SUBJECT

Guatemala Situation—Information Memorandum

Conclusion:

Imposition of a state of siege on March 25 was a political maneuver by Ydígoras to provide legal basis for denying Arévalo entry into Guatemala for at least the next 30 days.

The armed subversive acts alleged by the GOG to be justification for the state of siege are either staged or non-existent.

Background:

1. Ex-President Arévalo, strongest potential candidate in the presidential elections scheduled for the end of this year, has announced his intention to return to Guatemala in March to begin his campaign.

2. Arévalo, while not a Communist, is a super-egotistic leftist of confused political thinking whose return to power could dangerously facilitate growth of Communist influence in his country, as it did during his administration 1945–51.

3. The Arévalo threat has thoroughly frightened moderate and other anti-Communist political elements in Guatemala, but they have no effective leadership and have not come forward with anything resembling an agreed political program.

4. Ydígoras has found himself in a dilemma. He claims to believe Arévalo can be beaten in fair elections and that it is wiser to allow him in the country rather than give him the martyrdom other courses of action would afford. On the other hand, Ydígoras has been under heavy pressure, particularly from his military, to exclude Arévalo.

5. The Guatemalan Army Chief of Staff on March 18 informed our Embassy in Guatemala of “guerrilla activity” in Guatemala which might result in requests to United States for helicopters and other equipment. Intensive efforts by the Embassy have failed to elicit any evidence of guerrilla threat. A series of more or less of harmless bomb explosions has taken place in Guatemala City, with nothing to indicate they could not have been provocations staged by GOG.

¹ Background information on March 25 siege imposed by President Ydígoras. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL GUAT.

6. Guatemalan Minister of Defense Peralta on March 21 in what was no doubt an unintentional gaffe admitted to reporters that he had no information of guerrilla activity. He later issued vague announcements alleging guerrilla activity in outlying areas.

7. Guatemalan Supreme Court on March 22 issued provisional injunction against exclusion of Arévalo from Guatemala by Government authorities.

8. Anti-Arévalo demonstration planned for March 23 was uneventful.

9. Guatemalan Government on March 25 decreed a 30-day state of siege due to "vast Communist plan of agitation and violence", suspending, among other constitutional guarantees, Article 46, which accords all Guatemalans the right to enter or leave the country.

Cleared in substance

CIA—Mr. Shivers

DOD—Capt. Sanborn

137. Memorandum from Brubeck to McGeorge Bundy, April 24¹

April 24, 1963

SUBJECT

Review Guatemalan Developments Since Coup d'Etat

There is enclosed herewith a memorandum summarizing developments during the first three weeks of the new Peralta regime in Guatemala. This summary has been prepared in reply to a verbal request made to the Department by Mr. Bromley Smith.

¹ Transmits memorandum summarizing the first 3 weeks of the Peralta regime in Guatemala. Confidential. 4 pp. DOS, CF, POL 2 GUAT.

/s/ B.H. Read
for

William H. Brubeck
Executive Secretary

Enclosure

THE NEW GUATEMALAN REGIME: ITS FIRST THREE WEEKS

Summary

The Guatemalan regime, headed by Col. Enrique Peralta, which took power through a coup d'état near midnight on March 30 completed three weeks in office on April 21. In that time it has accomplished its basic administrative organization, has announced and begun to implement its program of government, has received the recognition of a majority of the American Republics, and has continued to enjoy a wide base of political support within the country. There has been no challenge to the authority of the new government and no violence except for small-scale action taken at the initiative of the government itself against small guerrilla groups already in existence prior to the coup. While active opposition will undoubtedly soon emerge, the new Peralta regime has enjoyed a period of political calm enabling it to consolidate its position. The future success of the new regime will depend in large measure on the wisdom with which it wields its absolute power and its success in instilling a sense of urgency for social and economic improvement and the reestablishment of a constitutional democracy through free elections.

Consolidation of New Regime. Within twenty-four hours after the coup, most of the major political parties, including the center and moderate left, had approved the coup and indicated their support of the Peralta regime, at least for the emergency. This wide support was motivated as much by anti-Ydigoras sentiment as it was by anti-Arevalo feelings. Wide sectors were simply "fed-up" with the mal-administration, corruption, political anarchy, and lack of positive leadership by Ydigoras. The new regime's first decree-law continued the Labor Code in effect and thus confirmed the rights of labor. The new cabinet named on April 1 contrasted with that of Ydigoras in that it was largely composed of civilians and its members had a much higher degree of professional and technical competence. Though it had not yet been recognized by any of the participating countries, Guatemala sent delegates to the Managua security and Alianza conferences, in order not to break the continuity of purpose achieved so recently at San Jose.

Recognition. From information now available, some eleven Latin American and some sixteen or more other countries (including nearly all major Western powers) have thus far recognized the Peralta Government. At the time the United States extended recognition on April 17, eight Latin American and eight other countries had done so. Eventual recognition by all the Latin American republics seems assured except for Venezuela, the Dominican Republic, and possibly Costa Rica. Costa Rican leaders (including ex-President Figueres) have expressed approval of Peralta to United States officials and Costa Rica may seek some formula to extend recognition without offending their understanding with Betancourt on non-recognition of military coup governments.

Before recognizing the Peralta regime, the United States consulted closely with other Hemisphere governments and determined that there was a consensus favoring eventual recognition. Special note was taken that Mexico and three of the four Central American countries had by then extended recognition. Also, it was fully evident that there was wide support in Guatemala for the new regime in spite of its unconstitutional inception. Despite strenuous efforts we were not able to extract an official public statement fixing a specific timetable for elections. However, Peralta did give Ambassador Bell verbal assurances that hopefully elections would be held within a period of not more than two years. Also, on April 4 Peralta had been quoted in a Miami Herald story as stating: "It will take Guatemala about two years to get ready for free elections." He claimed that this was a public statement. In delivering our note of recognition on April 17, Ambassador Bell reminded the Foreign Minister of our acceptance of these assurances and our hope that elections would be held within the shortest possible time. We intend to keep reminding the regime of this point.

Program of the New Government. To date the Peralta Government has issued some fourteen decree laws. Among the more important were the Fundamental Charter of Government (No. 8 of April 10) and the Law for the Defense of Democracy (No. 9 of April 10). The Charter stated that public power would reside in the Army and be exercised by the Minister of Defense (i.e. Peralta) as the Chief of Government. It provided that the Chief of Government would exercise all executive and legislative functions acting with the assistance of the Council of Ministers (the cabinet) and the advice of an appointive Council of State. The courts were to function in an independent and exclusive manner. With the sole exception of the University of San Carlos, appointments of all officials in the country would be made by the Chief of Government. Rigid control and drastic penalties for communist and other subversive action was established by the “Law for the Defense of Democracy” and in a companion decree-law (No. 10) to protect public order and prevent crimes of violence. A significant aspect of Decree Laws 9 and 10 is that violations of these decrees on subversion and crimes of violence will be tried in military and not civilian courts. This seems to contradict the “independent and exclusive” jurisdiction supposedly given the civil courts.

An important pronouncement was issued by the new government on April 19 which outlined its program. Besides pledging special attention to the poorer classes, its intention to honor its international obligations, and its support for the Declaration of Central America signed at San Jose on March 19, the government specifically announced an eight point program to implement its “full and enthusiastic support” of the Alliance for Progress. These eight points were: (1) reorganization of the public administration as an instrument to promote social and economic development, (2) institutional reorganization to provide more social benefits, (3) agrarian development, including rational land distribution, supervised credit and marketing services, (4) accelerated Central American economic integration, (5) industrial development using both public and private resources, (6) fiscal reform and effective administration, (7) coordination of government fiscal and monetary policy with public investment policy designed to secure an equitable redistribution of the national income, and (8) reinforcement of the National Planning Council in developing rational development plans.

U.S. Assistance to the New Government. No basic changes will be required in our AID assistance strategy in order to assist the implementation of the above program. Our programmed assistance was designed specifically for such purposes but was unable to work effectively with the previous Ydigoras administration. It is not anticipated that large additional amounts of aid will be needed or could be effectively used at this time. At the moment there is some $30 million in unexpended funds, mostly loans from U.S. sources, which have not been used due to the inability of the Ydigoras Government to provide matching funds or otherwise take effective action. Should the present government prove effective in devising and implementing development plans then it can be anticipated that our assistance could be much accelerated and with only minimum requirements for grant assistance. This prediction is based on the present satisfactory economic situation in Guatemala and the prospects of greatly accelerated progress, provided the economic community can look forward to a more stable political atmosphere and the support of an efficient and effective public administration. The unwholesome domestic climate, administrative disarray and fiscal mismanagement have constituted more of a deterrent to the Guatemalan economy in the past three years than have low coffee prices.

138. Memorandum from Read to McGeorge Bundy, July 31¹

July 31, 1963

SUBJECT

Guatemalan Request for United States' Mediation of British Honduras Dispute

After presenting his credentials to the President on July 10, the new Guatemalan Ambassador, Dr. Carlos Garcia-Bauer, made reference to a note requesting the friendly mediation of the United States in the British-Guatemalan dispute over British Honduras (Belize). Ambassador Garcia-Bauer stated this request had been conveyed to Ambassador John O. Bell, the American Ambassador to Guatemala. The President indicated he wished to see and consider this request.

Ambassador Bell had reported an informal request made by the Guatemalan Foreign Minister on July 1 for friendly United States mediation in the dispute. At the same time Ambassador Bell was given a copy of a sharp note delivered to the British Chargé in Guatemala. The note to the British protested the unilateral British action of convening on July 11 "constitutional" conversations with British Honduran representatives on the future political status of British Honduras without previously consulting Guatemala. The note stated that if the UN persisted in creating a new state at the expense of Guatemalan territory then Guatemala reserved the right to take measures, also unilaterally, deemed appropriate to Guatemalan interests. Actually the Foreign Minister gave Ambassador Bell a Memorandum (text enclosed) implying that the consequences of such British unilateral action posed a threat to stability in the Caribbean area and, therefore, he solicited the friendly mediation of the United States to bring about an "understanding" on this problem.

Shortly before the above events, British representatives at the Birch Grove meeting on June 29 between the President and Prime Minister Macmillan sought the Secretary's views on United States assistance should complete independence be given to British Honduras. The Secretary subsequently requested Embassy London to convey the following views to HMG: 1) while appreciative of the British policy of moving its colonies as rapidly as feasible toward independence or self-determination, we wonder how independence can be accomplished quickly and smoothly in view of the complete lack of economic viability of British Honduras and the uncertainties of Guatemalan, and even Mexican, political attitudes; 2) we speculate whether independence will merely mean the shifting of economic liability from the UK to the US; 3) we feel an interim step, contributing partially to economic viability, might be some form of British Honduran association in the Central American Common Market, the political and economic consequences of which might facilitate an eventual solution to the dispute; and (4) since we firmly support the Central American Market, we would examine carefully how we could be helpful should British Honduras become associated with it and the political problems with Guatemala and Mexico substantially eased.

¹ Guatemalan request for U.S. mediation in British Honduras (Belize) dispute. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Guatemala, April-July 1963.

The Department considers that the United States should not offer to mediate the territorial dispute over British Honduras, which would appear to some as intervention in behalf of Guatemalan interests and as an impingement on the principle of self-determination. However, the Secretary had earlier agreed that we would be willing to explore separately with Guatemalan and British diplomatic representatives in Washington to see if areas of agreement exist with reference to economic development of British Honduras wherein the good offices of the United States could be usefully employed. While there has not yet been an opportunity to carry this out, we are hopeful that circumstances will eventually permit it. The British replied on July 13 to the Guatemalan note of July 1 that HMG desires to see fully implemented the recommendations for social and economic development agreed on at the tripartite talks in San Juan in April 1962. The note also suggested informal discussions with Guatemala after the London constitutional talks, which were concluded on July 22 and provided for full internal self-government as of January 1, 1964.

After Guatemala on July 24 broke diplomatic relations with Great Britain, the British asked us to protect their interests in Guatemala. Our response has been to point out the disadvantages to the United Kingdom and the United States of such a proposal. Instead we suggested that the United Kingdom and Guatemala keep contact through their consulates.

We assume that Guatemala's request of July 1 for our mediation of the British Honduras dispute may no longer apply under the circumstances created by Guatemala's severance on July 24 of diplomatic relations with the United Kingdom. Ambassador Bell has recommended, and the Department concurs, that the President should not permit the Guatemalan Ambassador to involve him in this dispute. Meanwhile, the Department will continue to give close attention to the problem to determine what, if any, action we can take to ease the situation, looking toward a resumption of Guatemalan-British relations.

*/s/ John A. McKesson
for*

Benjamin H. Read
Executive Secretary

EnclosureMEMORANDUM

(Delivered July 1 to Ambassador Bell by the Guatemalan Foreign Minister)

On this same date the Ministry of Foreign Relations of Guatemala delivered to the Chargé d'Affaires a.i. of Great Britain in this city the note of which a copy is attached, pointing out that in case Great Britain persists in her intention of creating a new state in Belize at the expense of Guatemalan territory, this country will remain at full liberty to take the measures most suited to its interests.

In view of the vital interest that an adequate solution of this matter has for the stability of the whole region of the Caribbean, which would be seriously upset if Belize is unilaterally given a supposed or actual autonomy without taking into account the well-founded aspirations of Guatemala, this government solicits the friendly mediation of the Government of the United States which, as it has done in other similar cases, can, if it so wishes, make an effort to bring about an understanding on this question.

139. Telegram 123 to Guatemala City, September 24¹

September 24, 1963

We are increasingly concerned over failure of Peralta regime to organize any effective attack on the main economic and political problems facing it, and over its refusal to accept badly needed help and advice.

We fully endorse your intention (as set forth in para 1, page 3, A-147) assiduously to cultivate relationships leading to greater US influence with Peralta regime and to greater receptivity to help which is available from us for the asking. This in fact should be your central purpose during the coming months. We recognize that it is one which requires slow and careful action, and which must be based on elements of mutual respect, correctness and dignity, and best accomplished through little steps forward without appearance of pressure or preaching.

¹ Concern over failure of Peralta regime to begin to solve the main economic and political problems facing Guatemala. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL GUAT-US.

Since Peralta is in less secure political position now than in early days his regime, and the gross inadequacy of his government's own unaided efforts presumably more apparent, you may find opportunities to begin applying useful leverage, not only on operational matters of mutual concern, but on some of the more fundamental questions. For example, possibly using your relationship with Peralta's brother or other influential individuals, you should look for, and take advantage of, any opening to draw the Peralta regime toward the realization that its repression of political activity only drives it underground, inviting violent subversion, and that regime should consider trying to bring politics out into the open and into constructive channels.

We note that you have in fact already started to work toward objectives outlined above, but wish to emphasize importance of continuing effort.

Request your comments on foregoing, including identity of some of the people which you and other members CT believe you can most usefully cultivate for purposes stated. If you concur, we will try to use Garcia Bauer to similar end. We have found him to be reasonably friendly, cooperative, and, in contrast to his predecessor Alejos, intelligent.

Ball

140. Telegram 254 to Guatemala City, November 27¹

November 27, 1963

Subject: Guatemalan Plans for Constitutionality.

Department continues have keen interest in return of constitutional government in Guatemala. When opportune, Ambassador should seek to elicit from Peralta his latest thinking on measures to restore constitutionality. FYI. During visit for funeral President Kennedy, Aguilar de Leon stated Peralta contemplating having a constituent assembly early in 1964 to prepare new constitution. He indicated that transitory article to constitution would give constitutional status to Peralta who would continue in office until 1964. Aguilar not clear how constituent assembly would be created but implied that it would be based on some degree of political activity. Questions will arise if constituent assembly is not representative body, has not come into being by free choice of people, and serves only to perpetuate Peralta in office. Such steps would arouse criticism in hemisphere and would make it extremely difficult for Guatemala to qualify for exception to restrictions on foreign aid to military governments likely to be imposed by Congress. END FYI.

¹ Guatemalan plans for return to constitutional government. Confidential. 1 p. DOS, CF, POL 15 GUAT.

Rusk

Honduras

141. Telegram 657 from Tegucigalpa, March 13¹

Tegucigalpa, March 13, 1961

Embassy telegrams 652, 653.

President this afternoon listened quietly to recital of concern re threats to stability GOH from Hondurans, many militant oppositionists to government but many also sincere anti-communists who fear what they consider to be government's toleration or even encouragement of communist and Castrista activities. I emphasized danger of this anti-communist crusade becoming identified as an anti-Villeda Morales crusade and suggested moment had arrived for action to be taken which would make clear to any observer the anti-communist, anti-Castro position of his administration.

President indicated full awareness of problem and of sincere concern many people as well as of campaign being waged by enemies. Said action is being taken and will be continued against illegal communist activities; referred specifically to closure of Tribuna Popular and planned closure of other similar publications which he said will be forcibly maintained despite cries in name of freedom of press which he assumes will arise from leftist quarters. He referred to temporary haven being offered Cuban refugees through issuance visas in Havana by Honduran Ambassador and said demands of those who are calling for expulsion these refugees on grounds their anti-Castro activities will be ignored. Other steps will be taken which will make clear his government's position and which will satisfy true anti-communists; these steps will be short of driving PCH underground, which he considers ineffectual move in country like Honduras.

When I asked Villeda Morales about Cuban consulate in Puerto Cortes he reflected surprise; telephoned acting foreign minister who verified consulate functioning on provisional exequatur with 11 employees; and instructed immediate (this afternoon) withdrawal exequatur. Said no Cuban consulate has legitimate business in Honduras and expressed determination ascertain how exequatur issued without his knowledge.

I spoke of uniforms which have been seen here (Embassy telegram 652) and which are being used to "prove" communist infiltration. President again demonstrated surprise but said he assumed they came from Cuba and if this could be established he would break relations immediately.

¹ President Villeda Morales informed about threats to stability of his government. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 715.00/3-1361.

President expressed belief no division in armed forces. Said Colonel Lopez had told him of report GOES was concerned re situation in Honduras and was planning corrective action. Villeda Morales had called on highly-placed Salvadoran friend for report on this and had received today coded message which he read me denying any such concern or planned move by GOES but repeating reports Nicaraguan money passing through Salvadoran hands for use with Honduran military for subversive purposes. Message also conveyed warning re activities in Puerto Cortes which VM associated with news I had given him re Cuban consulate that place.

President's attitude today was in contrast, his usual relaxed dismissal of problems as of no importance. Although nothing was achieved in terms of break in relations with Cuba, closure of consulate in Puerto Cortes, largest official Cuban establishment in Honduras, would be first concrete action against Castro.

Burrows

142. Telegram 705 from Tegucigalpa, April 3¹

Tegucigalpa, April 3, 1961

Department telegram 415.

Although it may be possible President Villeda Morales is simply putting on as good a show as he can to impress us without going so far as to alienate completely his leftist friends, I believe he is sincere in his anti-communist protestations. In any case our tactic should be to accept his statements with open confidence they will continue to be followed by action.

Must be recognized he does have problems and does not have undivided support from any group. Thus his own Liberal Party while supporting him as President contains elements who are actively concerned with their own candidacy for next election, as well as some of those very leftist elements against whom President would like to move.

¹ Embassy assessment of President Villeda Morales' anti-Communist position. Secret. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 715.00/4-361.

Armed forces thus far honors its commitment to defend constitutional regime but feels no personal loyalty to Villeda Morales, some would even like to see him in trouble with Nationalists and leftist members his own party. Nationalists while pressing for action against Castro, at same time and for purely political reasons question government seizure communists literature and harassment “intellectuals.”

Under these circumstances, and assuming sincerity of his motivations, President must move cautiously and along what must seem zig-zag course. Likewise, I feel US, rather than exerting inflexible constant pressure, should step into breaches as they appear, pressing government to take action appropriate to moment, but keeping in mind possible counter-productiveness of too much pressure at wrong time. Villeda Morales could be toppled from either the right or the left and I fear the one nearly as much as the other.

I would hope that during the next three to six months we shall see a continuation of the hardening process which has already begun in the stance of GOH against Communism. I would hope also that the government's political opponents of the right may be brought to the realization that whatever Villeda Morales does in this direction is to the benefit of all and that he should receive the support of all loyal Hondurans in at least this program. Their political attacks should not be designed to deflect him from anti-Communist course in order that they may continue to attack him as pro-Communist.

I would hope that Villeda Morales will continue to separate well-known Communists and leftists from their government positions. This has been begun and the President assures me he intends to continue; recognition should be given his actions, even from his political enemies and insofar as possible the Embassy will endeavor to elicit such recognition.

We can hope to see continuing progress toward an openly anti-Castro position, with perhaps even a rupture of diplomatic relations. In regard to this last, however, we must keep in mind the moral influence of Argentina, Brazil, Chile and Mexico as well as the near hero-worship of Villeda Morales for Betancourt and Lleras Camargo. It would be difficult although I believe not impossible for Honduras to break with Castro in advance of at least one of these more influential LA colleagues.

I feel that the near future calls for an alert and unremitting awareness of our goals in Honduras but at the same time an ad hoc approach to action. We must be prepared to counsel, needle and press; we must also be prepared to accept at times what may appear to be dangerous vacillations. Whatever is obtained in the way of action will strengthen the moderate Liberals position and reinforce armed forces support for the Villeda Morales administration if they (and the nationalists) can be brought to recognize the constructive nature of those actions. At the same time, of course, Villeda Morales must be brought to realize the danger that is present in the armed forces belief that they are being destroyed by the Liberals in favor of the Guardia Civil. This I shall keep clearly in mind in any conversations I have with the President and leading members of his party.

Above represents present analysis of situation; changes or refinements will be conveyed to Department as developing situation may require.

Burrows

143. Telegram 768 from Tegucigalpa, April 21¹

Tegucigalpa, April 21, 1961

President Villeda Morales announced tonight to cheering anti-Castro crowd, and over national hookup that he would lay before Council of Ministers his proposal to break relations with Cuba, and that Foreign Ministry would carry out action tomorrow, Saturday, April 22. President's oratory was strongly and outspokenly anti-Communist, stressed that his action was compliance will of people from whom he had sprung, cautioned that will to abandon extreme left implied equal responsibility to break with plotters of extreme right. Crowd had been warmed by two hours of oratory in main square before marching on Palace to ask for break, obviously with knowledge of authorities. Manifestation contrasted imposingly with failure several Castro-Communist attempts organize rallies. President's announcement was followed by shooting of fire-arms, a common practice at any celebration, but no disorder as yet.

Burrows

¹ President Villeda Morales proposal to break relations with Cuba on April 22. Unclassified. 1 p. DOS, CF, 715.00/4-2161.

144. Letter from Ambassador Burrows to Katherine W. Bracken, January 24¹

January 24, 1962

Dear Kay:

I realize that the questions concerning Honduras included in the OCI document 5757–61 are in fact not intended to be dealt with either by the Embassy itself or by the Army Attaché's office. The document is, however, circulated in the Embassy, and it is quite natural that these two offices should study the questions asked with respect to their own reporting. We feel that since the questions themselves appear to reveal a distorted view of the situation in Honduras, responsive answers would seem to involve in the first place a straightening out of the questions themselves.

To take them in order, the first question ends with what to me is a completely unintelligible phrase, when it refers to "the constant political instability now sapping Honduran strength in many areas". Honduras is, of course, a country with political problems, but, as a matter of fact, the present Honduran administration has endured for over four years and appears to be going forward to complete its full six years in office without any great difficulty. It has been stable enough and strong enough to counter several subversive attempts of the sort which have, historically, overthrown previous Honduran Governments. It has constantly supported United States objectives, both within the country and outside. While the Government is not, any more than our own government, the unanimous choice of all of the citizens of Honduras, there is nowhere in Honduras the hard, sworn-to-the-death opposition of the sort which is found in both Guatemala and Nicaragua. Earlier in the same question the implication is given that "Villeda's lack of control over the legislature" is an element of serious weakness. This is, or purports to be, a democratic administration. There are elements of opposition to Villeda in Congress, a fact which would appear to support the thought that it is a democratic administration. When the extreme left and the extreme right elements of opposition to the President are united, they can control legislation to the extent of defying the President. I believe this is a normal situation in any congressional republic, including our own. If the question were stripped down to its essential center "will significant economic and other reforms be effected soon enough to show results which are badly needed?", it would be a more meaningful question.

¹ Thoughts that OCI's reporting requirements reveal a distorted view of the situation in Honduras. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 715.00/1–2462.

The request for detailed and continuing reporting on the activities and contacts of ORELLANA Bueso reflects what may be a failure on the part of the Embassy [less than 1 line not declassified] to indicate the extent to which Orellana Bueso has removed himself from active contact and possibly also the extent to which his physical and mental health has deteriorated. The Embassy will be able to look into this in the near future.

Lt. Col. Hutchin is indignant about the third question because he can find no statement during the past year that there has been a "strong build-up of arms in the hands of Castroites".

These comments could be extended to the point of nit-picking, but I would rather not do so since I think that the above remarks indicate a very serious state of affairs in whatever office initiated the questions, and I would rather keep these comments on that level. Finally, the last or "Cloud 9" question as to the attitude of the left wing if Villeda attempts to retain power, is probably a record of some kind in the field of speculation. Any attempt on the part of Villeda to retain power would be so carefully cloaked behind a façade of one kind or another that the left wing would probably not know what was happening until the power was safely ensconced in Villeda's hands. The attitude of such individuals towards Villeda if he should attempt to retain power would probably be approximately the same as their attitude toward any other powerful politician who might be attempting to gain the power: they would weigh their chances of gain and determine their attitude accordingly. It would not be determined by ideological factors.

There are, of course, legitimate areas cited among the questions that will be continuing objects of study by the Embassy's Political Section as well as, I am sure, [less than 1 line not declassified] the Army Attaché. Our reporting on the cabinet speculations is well ahead of the seventh question. As for the eighth question which concerns presidential possibilities, the interesting new development, way ahead of the question, lies in the field of a possible coalition between the orthodox, or right-wing Liberals, and the Nationalist-Reformists.

This letter is intended simply to reflect the feeling of never-never-land that hit all of us here upon reading this list of priority reporting requirements furnished by the OCI.

With best regards,

Sincerely yours,

Charles R. Burrows

145. Telegram 64 from Tegucigalpa, August 13¹

Tegucigalpa, August 13, 1962

Reference: Department circular telegram 230.

Country team (CT) believes criticism and assumption described reference telegram in general too sweeping and may reflect an incomplete appreciation of the marked political evolution which has taken place in LA generally, and LA armed forces particularly in recent times.

Re criticism: 1) Honduran armed forces are characterized by respect for constitutional principles manifested by both words and actions: Close association American officers with armed forces supports and strengthens this attitude; 2) in performing the expressed function of support for constitutionally elected government, armed forces are supporting the non-Communist democratic elements in this country despite some civilian pressure to do otherwise. Armed forces prestige is based upon reputation for honesty, integrity, and support constitutional principles, not upon their power, as may be judged by fact that in Honduras the military establishment receives only seven per cent of annual budget; 3) military establishment of 4,000 men, military budget seven per cent of national budget, and arms acquisition of Honduran military cannot be considered too large; 4) MAP in Honduras severely restricted by small size of military establishment and its small budget as well as by careful consideration by CT of various proposals presented, (e.g., recent CT position concerning possible additional deliveries C-47s to Honduras). Equipment and training given Honduran military under MAP is addressed to internal defense defined in narrowest terms (e.g., police type assistance against insurgency and guerrilla action plus eventual ability police frontiers and coastline). Armed forces are engaged in wide range civic action activities without US assistance, and a road building project with US assistance.

With regard assumption listed in reference telegram as basis for above criticism: A) CT has reported in past that it views legitimate mission of armed forces as limited to internal defense against infiltration of armed groups and initiation guerilla activities which, under conditions of hemisphere struggle would certainly be one of most important fronts; B) recent history Honduras includes no successful military coups but on contrary two successful thwartings of attempted coups and complete discrediting of Caudillo Armando Velasquez their leader; C) while it is true that Honduran military are largely conservative and in that sense oriented toward the right, their civic action activities and their determined support of constitutional principles appear to negate, so far as Honduras is concerned, the stereotype of LA military referred to; D) resources of Honduran military are extremely limited but within these limitations armed forces are engaged in economic and social development and there is every indication that with further support in this direction they would undertake greater economic and social development activities; E) the MAP in Honduras has been carefully controlled with regard both to grants and sales by careful consideration in the CT to each specific request or suggestion whether received from armed forces themselves or from Washington, and this control has been effected bearing in mind primary role of armed forces in internal defense and civic action.

¹ Country Team response to criticism and assumption in circular telegram 230. Secret. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 715.5/8-1362.

Further limitation of this assistance would appear therefore to jeopardize security interests US in reducing ability armed forces to perform what will be essentially a very important role in case armed attack against hemisphere, namely that of defense against insurgency and guerilla activities (it is assumed Department's reference to policy-type assistance refers to policing against insurgency border infiltration and guerilla activities); F) it would be difficult if not impossible to reduce Honduras military expenditures which are already as low as would be possible without elimination armed forces capability altogether. There is no damage to US public image in Honduras through association US with armed forces since they do not have reputation for extravagance and irresponsibility.

In opinion this CT a still more restrictive grant and sales policy with respect Honduras would result in net US loss in terms our across-the-board foreign policy objectives here.

Burrows

146. Telegram 51 to Tegucigalpa, September 11¹

September 11, 1962

EMBTEL 118.

Seek meetings with President Villeda Morales and with Foreign Minister Alvarado Puerto at earliest possible time and state you are under instructions to convey following US expressions of concern over implications for foreign investment, public and private, in Honduras agricultural development as a result recently passed agrarian reform law.

1. Defining expropriation procedure as “administrative” and thus precluding judicial review creates uncertainty as to fields of application of law, particularly in view of experiences under unclear legislation under Castro. In normal administration of legislation as extensive as current law, cases of varying interpretation arise frequently. Foreign investors hold recourse to courts in such cases as important factor of “investor confidence”.

2. Compensation scheme contemplated would raise most serious issues under new section 620(e) of AID Act, which requires President to suspend assistance where country expropriates US citizens’ property and fails within reasonable time to take steps to discharge its obligations under international law including payment of fair compensation. In this instance, agrarian reform law apparently contemplates compensation which might not satisfy international legal standards in terms either of its promptness, its adequacy or its effectiveness, since bonds would be payable only in 20 years, standards of valuation not clear and bonds and interest obligations not denominated in dollars. AID act leave US President no repeat no discretion regarding aid suspension in these circumstances. FYI great care must be taken to avoid definitive interpretation agrarian law at this stage under AID act until reviewed AID/W and Legal Adviser end FYI.

3. View restricted finances GOH and weak organization Agrarian Reform Institute, new law effectively inhibits all credits for agricultural development and thereby obviates sound Honduran agricultural development which main point Alliance for Progress and AID programs.

We realize and understand political situation facing Villeda Morales in this election year. However, in view of detrimental effect law could have on ability US public and private sources assist Honduran development, as well as impact on current US congressional consideration of AID appropriations we suggest he veto measures as presented. As we interpret article 246 of constitution President may cite his opinion unconstitutional provisions or articles he deems in conflict with constitution and request Supreme Court decision. Honduran National Association of Industries study of June 1962 lists numerous conflicts which Villeda might note: Article 11 contravenes 156 of constitution; article 15 contravenes 242; 32, 40 and 41 contravene 67, 78 and 156; 48, 49, 50, 51, 52 and 164 contravene 78, 156 and 226; 211 and 212 contravene 66.

¹ Instructions for meeting with President and Foreign Minister to convey U.S. concern over implications for foreign investment, public and private, in Honduras agricultural development as result new agrarian reform law. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 815.16/9–1062.

If Villeda cannot veto or refer to Supreme Court, or measure has already been signed, it appears minimum he could do to restore balance to situation is announce publicly his intention seek early legislation amend certain portions in conflict or which require further clarification.

Rusk

147. Telegram 68 to Tegucigalpa, September 20¹

September 20, 1962

Deptel 51 Embtel 141.

For your background the following sets forth some considerations pertinent to US policy on assistance to American private interests abroad and problems arising from some anticipated provisions of Honduran agrarian reform law.

1. USG traditionally acts to support American private interest abroad or espouse private international claim when concrete case justifying it arises. Justification usually rests on fact of specific injury suffered by claimant for which he is unable obtain redress through usual means. Conversely USG normally refrains from actions on behalf specific private interest on basis hypothetical injury.

2. Foregoing is distinct from situations where USG may take position on measures considered undesirable on general policy grounds.

3. With particular reference to Honduran situation, it seems clear that provision in original draft agrarian law for compensation for expropriated land by 20-year bonds, deliverable on re-distribution of land, would at least raise the question of possible invocation of section 620(e). Foreign Assistance Act, not because of fact that payment to be made in bonds but because of particular arrangements surrounding transaction in this case. It is true that section has not yet been invoked with respect any country and that in any case it is impossible to determine in advance of legal study of facts in each separate concrete case whether section might or might not be considered to apply. Nevertheless, the possibility that compensation provision would bring to the fore in our relations with Honduras the question of application of section 620(e) was in itself sufficiently important to warrant action which was taken, namely to furnish GOH text of section and advise it of that possibility.

¹ Transmits considerations pertinent to U.S. policy on assistance to American private interests abroad and problems arising from provisions of Honduran agrarian reform law. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 815.16/9-1962.

4. If original draft law has in fact been changed to provide for prior cash compensation for expropriated land, we concur with your view that this would cause section 620(e) to recede from picture. There does remain the question of judicial review of the evaluation procedure, and possibly justification for expropriation because of lack of proper economic use. On basis of information available it would seem unreasonable to expect president's veto of an otherwise acceptable law on this point, if he announces his intention of asking for suitable amendment at an early opportunity. However on basis of what we know now such amendment would appear highly desirable and you should continue to press President to hold to promise he now appears ready to make. We would of course appreciate information soonest on any amendments recently made in draft law which would bear on method of determining amount of compensation to be given.

5. It is important in general in handling problems involving US investment abroad to avoid allowing defense of legitimate interests by USG to become distorted in ways which would convey to foreign peoples the mistaken impression that the US opposes sound land reform, which is a keystone of the Alliance.

Rusk

148. Memorandum of conversation, October 4, between Foreign Minister Alvarado and Edwin M. Martin¹

October 4, 1962

SUBJECT

Honduran Agrarian Reform; Request for Assistance

PARTICIPANTS

Honduran Foreign Minister Andrés ALVARADO Puerto
Honduran Ambassador to the U.S. and the OAS Celeo DÁVILA
Assistant Secretary Edwin M. Martin—ARA
OAP—Mr. John W. Fisher
OAP/H—Mr. Edward M. Rowell

SUMMARY:

Minister Alvarado said that Honduras is democratic and has had problems with its neighbors, but it meets its international obligations, and restrains exile plotters within its borders.

Honduras embraces the Alliance for Progress completely, and fully recognizes the primary role of private investment, foreign and domestic. The Agrarian Reform program will be administered with this in mind. The GOH has no intention of doing anything which would damage fruit company interests.

The Agrarian Reform law was enacted hastily and therefore requires some modification. Enactment was democratic, and even the President of the Congress, Rodas, who was against it, was unable to prevent passage.

Honduras strongly opposes international communism and Castroism, and supports U.S. initiatives in this field. Internally communism is best fought by making reforms and repressing reactionary elements, thus preempting the communists' normal fields of operations.

The adverse U.S. press and congressional reaction to the Honduran Agrarian Reform law came as a great surprise, and was unwarranted in view of the true GOH intent. The Minister was pleased that Secretary Rusk said the U.S. still supports just and good reforms.

Mr. Martin said that President Villeda's promise not to sign expropriation decrees until the Agrarian Reform law is amended, made public through the New York Times, greatly helped the situation. We await with interest the action at the November session of the Honduran Congress.

¹ Honduran agrarian reform; request for assistance. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 715.04/10-462.

Minister Alvarado and Ambassador Dávila said the law would be amended and asked the U.S. Government to furnish expert assistance in making appropriate changes in the law.

Mr. Martin said that the U.S. can supply purely technical advice on problems of Agrarian Reform, but Hondurans themselves will of course have to prepare changes in the law if it is to satisfy Honduras' own unique needs.

Minister Alvarado said that Honduras has a truly representative and democratic government which operates on a basis of consensus, and not by executive fiat. In contrast, some neighboring governments are much less democratic. They attempt to intervene in Honduran affairs occasionally to promote the establishment of a Honduran Government to their own liking. In the early days of Honduras' present administration, some local extremists intrigued against the country's neighbors, but the GOH halted these adventures as soon as they were discovered.

Minister Alvarado then said: Honduras is doing its best to accomplish the social and economic progress promised in the Alliance for Progress and espoused by the United States (Mr. Martin interjected the comment that these goals are enumerated in the Charter of Punta del Este, and Minister Alvarado agreed). The new Agrarian Reform law is part of the effort. The GOH intends to administer Agrarian Reform responsibly, and will not recklessly expropriate private property. Honduras fully recognizes the value and importance of such property, and the fundamental role of and need for private capital and foreign investment in its own development. Minister Alvarado emphasized very strongly that the Honduran Government never intended that the law be used to attack the American fruit companies or to drive them out of Honduras. On the contrary, Honduras wants the American companies to remain, and will work to keep the climates attractive to them.

The Minister recited the history of the enactment of the Agrarian Reform law, which he said in brief had aspects of hasty improvisation. The GOH some time ago established what it mistakenly thought was a technically qualified commission to study the problem and to draft a law. The commission was composed of OAS advisors, plus a Venezuelan advisor, plus a Mexican who was thought to be conservative but who turned out to be leftist. The draft finally was introduced in the Honduran Congress very late in the session, without review by any of the cabinet ministers, except the Minister of Natural Resources. Members of congress who should have demanded more thorough revision failed to familiarize themselves with it and acceded to it without serious objection. Under the circumstances, even the President of the Congress, Rodas Alvarado, who opposed the law, was unable to prevent its passage.

Minister Alvarado said he was shaken at the U.S. press reaction to the Honduran Agrarian Reform law. He had been completely unprepared for the severity of the attacks, and he was taken aback when Secretary Rusk discussed the matter with him on the evening of October 2. He felt reassured when the Secretary made plain the United States' continued support for good and just rural reform.

Mr. Martin reemphasized U.S. espousal of sound rural reform properly executed. He said President Villeda's statement to New York Times correspondent Paul P. Kennedy on October 4, 1962, seemed to resolve our immediate concern over Honduran Agrarian Reform. (In an article on page 9 of the October 4 issue of the New York Times, Kennedy reported that Villeda had said that "he would sign no expropriation decrees until the law had been amended".) Mr. Martin added that we would expect appropriate action at the next regular session of the Honduran Congress in November 1962.

Minister Alvarado and Ambassador Dávila said the Agrarian Reform law can and will be amended to avoid damage to anyone. They asked the United States to furnish some expert assistance in formulating amendments to the law. This way, Honduras could be sure the proposed changes would satisfy U.S. legal requirements and would be technically sound. He hastily added that he was not proposing U.S. intervention in Honduras, but merely seeking technical advice.

Mr. Martin replied that every country has its own unique political-cultural-economic system. Therefore, an Agrarian Reform law, to be good and just, will have to be unique to the country enacting it. Hence, the law must be written by Hondurans. The United States will do what it can to provide purely technical advice at an operating level, but formulation and amendment of the law must be done by Hondurans.

Mr. Martin, Ambassador Dávila and Minister Alvarado agreed that this topic should be kept confidential.

The Foreign Minister then sketched Honduras' relations with Cuba. His government severed diplomatic relations in April, 1961. President Villeda has repeatedly attacked the "cancer of Castroism". Honduras firmly supports U.S. initiatives on Cuba, and is pleased with the results of the informal meeting of American Foreign Ministers, October 2-3. (Ambassador Dávila interjected the thought that the final communiqué should have been stronger. Mr. Martin replied that he was satisfied to have obtained as much as we did.) However, the present Honduran approach to internal communism is best for the long run; that is, communism will be defeated by reform and economic and social progress.

149. Memorandum from Edwin M. Martin to Rusk, November 7¹

November 7, 1962

TO

The Secretary

THROUGH

S/S

FROM

ARA—Mr. Martin

SUBJECT

Visit of President José Ramon VILLEDIA Morales of Honduras to the United States

Discussion:

I recommend that an invitation be extended to President José Ramon VILLEDIA Morales, President of Honduras, to make an informal working visit to Washington on November 30, 1962. Ambassador Burrows at Tegucigalpa in urging the invitation states (Tab B) that President Villeda is greatly interested in accepting an invitation to attend a meeting of exiled Cuban medical men (he is a doctor himself) in Miami on December 2. President Villeda has accepted the Cuban exiles' invitation to Miami "in principle" and is being pressed by them to make it definite, but wishes first to consult with reference to our desires concerning a visit to this country.

I feel strongly that President Villeda should be made welcome to this country and that while here he be invited for a brief informal working visit to Washington. This will be the second time Villeda has traveled to the United States on his own while chief of state. In 1960 he visited Miami and New Orleans but was carefully kept out of Washington and received no formal recognition. A rebuff to Villeda in his desire to attend the Miami exiles' meeting or a repetition of the treatment given him in 1960 would adversely affect our excellent relations with him.

During the past three years Villeda has become one of the staunchest supporters of United States policies in the United Nations and the Organization of American States (Honduran Foreign Minister Alvarado gave a key speech supporting our position at Punta del Este in January 1962). He is a moderate liberal who identifies himself closely with President Betancourt of Venezuela. He broke relations with Cuba on April 21, 1961 at the end of the Bay of Pigs invasion. Domestically, his Government has progressed against the threat of Communist subversion, and is honestly trying to fulfill its Alliance for Progress commitments. He has worked hard for social and economic reforms including revision of income taxes, improved customs administration, education expansion, and enactment of legislation to promote private enterprise development of resources. Despite some personal political risk, he has heeded our representations on the recently passed controversial Agrarian Reform Law, a topic which drew intensive United States Congressional interest. He was in the forefront of our Latin American allies in rallying against the recent danger in Cuba.

¹ Visit of President Villeda Morales to the U.S. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 715.11/11-762.

Recognition of Villeda would demonstrate that we remember our stalwart friends, however small. It would buttress his prestige at home, making it easier for him to bring about a peaceful constitutional change of power at the end of his term late in 1963. And, in Ambassador Burrows' opinion, a Washington visit would be regarded by Villeda as the high point of his six-year administration.

U/PR estimates that the cost of this visit will be $1500, covering the cost of official entertainment in Washington.

Recommendation:

That you sign the attached Memorandum to the President (Tab A) which requests approval of the visit and extension of an invitation.

Concurrences:

W/PR—Mr. King G—Mr. Hackler CAP—Mr. Sause
H—Mr. Wexler A—Mr. Little AID—Mr. Martin

Attachments:

1. Tab A Memorandum to the President
2. Tab B Letter from Ambassador Burrows

150. Memorandum of conversation, November 30, between President Kennedy and President Villeda Morales and other U.S. and Honduran officials¹

Part II (of 7)

November 30, 1962

SUBJECT

The Alliance for Progress

PARTICIPANTS

President Kennedy
Ambassador Charles R. Burrows
Assistant Secretary of State Martin
Assistant Administrator of AID Moscoso
Mr. Ralph Dungan, The White House

President Villeda Morales of Honduras
Honduran Ambassador to the United States and the OAS Céleo Dávila
Honduran Foreign Minister Alvarado Puerto
Honduran Finance Minister Bueso Arias

President Villeda opened with the following comments concerning the Alliance for Progress:

Communism will be no threat in Central America if assistance is forthcoming under the Alliance for Progress. If Honduras receives what it is requesting, the country will be grateful to the Alliance, and the government will be able to convince the people that they should be patient because the Alliance will meet their aspirations.

Honduras has accomplished more in the past five years, than in all of the country's previous history. Education and health facilities have been constructed, mortality and illiteracy rates cut. Honduran money puts up a new school every two or three days. More bridges have been built in the last five years than in the previous 55.

President Villeda's administration now wants a few additional projects to cap its term. It wants to stimulate the growth of a pulp and paper industry. Oil offers great possibilities. And it wants to effect an agrarian reform program based on a recently passed law (see separate memorandum of conversation). These items will be discussed with Mr. Moscoso and Mr. Martin.

Unfortunately, totally undeveloped countries lack the means to meet the technical requirements of the Alliance for Progress, such as the feasibility studies required by American legislation. The United States can operate with a budget deficit, but a small country cannot. Plans and projects are important, but in a conflagration there is no time to wait for feasibility studies.

¹ Alliance for Progress. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Honduras, December 1962–September 1963.

Serious difficulties also arise when a country tries to reform its land, tax and income structures in the face of prejudices against such reforms. It often is more difficult to take necessary action in a democracy than in a dictatorship. President Villeda understands the difficulty the U.S. Government has in meeting the requirements levied on it by the U.S. Congress, but the Honduran Government has its problems, too.

Responding to President Villeda's initiative on this subject, and in the course of discussion President Kennedy made the following observations:

United States funds are limited, and the country has economic and military commitments all over the world. Most assistance to Latin America comes from the United States. The foreign aid program has created a serious balance of payments problem. The most expensive assistance is dollar aid, because this represents a net drain on the economy. Europe should share the burden.

Nonetheless, expectations regarding rapid progress are greater in Latin America than in Africa or Asia. The United States gives priority to its commitments to Latin America in order to help solve urgent social problems.

The United States is well aware of the need to speed Alliance programs. The President was gratified by President Villeda's recognition of a "mutual" need for such effort. The United States recognizes the difficulty inherent in land and tax reforms, but there are also difficulties present when funds are requested of the U.S. Congress.

President Kennedy suggested that President Villeda continue future discussions of this subject with Mr. Moscoso.

Mr. Moscoso stated that the United States now plans to help recipients of aid with required pre-investment and engineering studies. The incapacity of underdeveloped countries in this regard has been a serious concern. American legislation requires the submission of specific projects, and plans and projects go hand in hand. Therefore, the United States is interested in the sound preparation of projects.

Interpreters: Mr. Van Reigersberg and Mr. Hervas

151. Memorandum of conversation, November 30, between President Kennedy and President Villeda Morales and other U.S. and Honduran officials¹

Part III (of 7)

November 30, 1962

SUBJECT

Honduran Agrarian Reform and the United Fruit Company

PARTICIPANTS

President Kennedy
Ambassador Charles R. Burrows
Assistant Secretary of State Martin
Assistant Administrator of AID Moscoso
Mr. Ralph Dungan, The White House

President Villeda Morales of Honduras
Honduran Ambassador to the United States and the OAS Céleo Dávila
Honduran Foreign Minister Alvarado Puerto
Honduran Finance Minister Bueso Arias

In a brief reference to Honduras' controversial Agrarian Reform Law and difficulties with the United Fruit Company, President Villeda said he would meet with United Fruit Company representatives in Miami. He said he would promise the company that its investments in Honduras are secure.

President Villeda noted that agrarian reform cannot be conservative. However, it does keep certain groups from usurping the leadership of revolutionary change. He added that a basic element of agrarian reform is respect for private property. He assured President Kennedy that "as long as a civilized man is head of my country, there is no reason to fear".

Concluding the interview, President Kennedy said he was pleased that President Villeda planned to meet members of the United Fruit Company. President Kennedy observed that it is not in the interest of either country that United Fruit should withdraw from Honduras, since withdrawal could produce chaos. The company should carry out its responsibilities in Honduras. President Kennedy was sure a solution could be found with the United Fruit Company which would protect the company's interests.

Interpreters: Mr. Van Reigersberg and Mr. Hervas

¹ Honduran agrarian reform and United Fruit Company. Confidential. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Honduras, December 1962–September 1963.

152. Memorandum of conversation, November 30, between President Kennedy and President Villeda Morales and other U.S. and Honduran officials¹

Part VI (of 7)

November 30, 1962

SUBJECT

The Swan Islands

PARTICIPANTS

President Kennedy
Ambassador Charles R. Burrows
Assistant Secretary of State Martin
Assistant Administrator of AID Moscoso
Mr. Ralph Dungan, The White House

President Villeda Morales of Honduras
Honduran Ambassador to the United States and the OAS Céleo Dávila
Honduran Foreign Minister Alvarado Puerto
Honduran Finance Minister Bueso Arias

President Kennedy introduced the subject and made the following observations:

The Swan Islands are important to the United States because of the radio station and the weather station on them. The United States also is concerned about any implication that possible cession of United States sovereignty over the Swan Islands might have for United States ownership of certain other islands. Haiti is claiming one such island in the windward passage. The total number of islands affected must be determined. These United States interests must be safeguarded in any settlement of the dispute with Honduras.

Nonetheless, the United States seeks a solution to the problem. The United States is ready to go to the International Court of Justice (ICJ). This would be expensive, though costs probably would be about $50,000 rather than the $300,000 estimated by the Hondurans. If the case goes to the ICJ, the United States hopes it will be on a basis of equality so that both Honduras and the United States have the same amount of legal representation. This should be covered in any agreement submitting the case to the ICJ.

The possibility of arbitration (suggested by Honduran Foreign Minister Alvarado Puerto) will be considered, and an answer given later. A paragraph noting this discussion as suggested by Alvarado Puerto

¹ The Swan Islands. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Honduras, December 1962–September 1963.

(see below) was to be inserted in the formal communiqué issued by the two Presidents. The text of the communiqué was to be given to Villeda before he left Washington.

Future discussion of the Swan Island question should be with Mr. Martin.

Answering a question posed by President Kennedy, Assistant Secretary Martin said United States rights to the Swan Islands are based on a 100 year-old act of Congress. The whole matter must be submitted to the Department of State's Legal Advisor for consultation. A claim on Christmas Island also is affected.

President Villeda said he wanted to resolve this question which is a tool of agitation. He agreed with President Kennedy regarding legal representation. He added that realistic appraisal shows the islands have no value for Honduras, while they render a service to the United States. Unfortunately, Latins are romantic, not practical. Hence, he wanted the discussion on Swan Islands included in the final communiqué. He said it was important to Honduras, the United States and all Latin America to state clearly that a solution of the Swan Island question would not set a precedent regarding rights of sovereignty and ownership, and that the meeting between the two Presidents, including discussion of the Swan Islands, was most cordial and satisfactory.

Foreign Minister Alvarado Puerto reiterated President Villeda's points, adding that the Communists take advantage of the issue. He said that while a solution through legal channels, the ICJ, is possible, he would prefer arbitration within the confines of the Americas. This would be good for the whole Hemisphere as well as Honduras, and would test once more the spirit of fairness and justice of the United States. (Alvarado Puerto noted in passing that Honduran experience with the ICJ was good since the ICJ had favored Honduras over Nicaragua in a border dispute.)

Alvarado Puerto noted that Swan is not an island, but one of a number of keys about 60² miles off the coast of Honduras. He suggested that the following paragraph be inserted in the final communiqué:

"The two presidents, recognizing the strong friendship of the two countries, and recognizing the desire to reach a solution of the matter of Swan Island in harmony and justice, propose to undertake, in accordance with the principles of International Law and the Inter-American System and the principles of the Treaty for the Pacific Settlement of Disputes, the necessary steps for a rapid solution without taking the matter to an extra-continental tribunal."

² The Islands are actually 97 miles off the coast of Honduras.

(NOTE: The following paragraph was actually inserted in the communiqué after concurrence by Ambassador Dávila:

“The two Presidents agreed that their Governments should seek, on an urgent basis, a solution of the question of Swan Island, within the framework of the Inter-American System and taking full account of the rights and interests of both parties.”)

Interpreters: Mr. Van Reigersberg and Mr. Hervas

153. Memorandum of conversation, December 4, among Ambassador Burrows, Jasper Baker (United Fruit Company),
Edward M. Rowell, and John W. Fisher¹

December 4, 1962

SUBJECT

Honduran Agrarian Reform and the United Fruit Company

PARTICIPANTS

Charles R. Burrows, United States Ambassador to Honduras
Jasper Baker, United Fruit Company Vice President Resident in Washington
Edward M. Rowell, OIC, Honduran Affairs, Department of State
John W. Fisher, Acting Director, Office of Central American and Panamanian Affairs, Department of State (last few moments of conversation only)

Baker reported a conversation between Honduran and United Fruit Company officials which was held in Miami, Florida, on December 1, 1962, at 7:00 PM. The Hondurans were: President VILLEDA Morales, Finance Minister Jorge BUESO Arias, and Presidential Secretary Juan “Jack” AGURCIA Ewing. United Fruit was represented by: Victor C. FOLSOM, Vice President and General Counsel, Jasper BAKER, Vice President resident in Washington, Andrew HOLCOMB, Manager resident in Panamá, and Ben MILLER. The meeting was requested by the Honduran Government. President Villeda did most of the talking for the Hondurans, though toward the end Bueso spoke more frequently. Bueso interpreted for Baker.

According to Baker, Folsom opened the talk in Miami, emphasizing that frankness was essential. He asked Villeda if he thought he could amend the Agrarian Reform Law, reminding Villeda he only had a year left in office. Folsom handed Villeda a letter summarizing the law and suggesting general changes in many articles. Folsom made it plain that the company did not expect all the changes would be made, but some were absolutely essential. (Baker reiterated this last point to Ambassador Burrows.)

¹ Honduran agrarian reform and United Fruit Company. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, 715.04/12-462.

Reportedly, Villeda welcomed the frank conversation. Villeda said he is politically stronger now than he was two months ago. He promised to begin working immediately to amend the Agrarian Reform Law. However, the amendments would not be formally presented until the right moment, two or three months from now. Villeda was confident he could amend the law.

Villeda asked the size of United Fruit's replanting program for Honduras. Folsom said $15 million. Villeda asked if the company would withdraw from Honduras if the Agrarian Reform Law were not amended. He was told "no", but that there would be no new investment or replanting. Villeda asked if he could announce publicly on his return to Honduras that United Fruit would not withdraw from the country. Folsom said "yes".

After giving this report, Baker made the following observations:

He believes Villeda was sincere at the Miami meeting and that he will earnestly try to amend the Agrarian Reform Law. Folsom shares this view, though Holcomb does not. The meeting was most cordial. Villeda was not disturbed by the terms of the letter handed to him. However, he did not read it carefully. Thomas Sunderland, President of United Fruit, will accept absolutely Baker's and Folsom's favorable view of the meeting. (This last was in response to a question from Ambassador Burrows.)

While neither Baker nor Folsom question Villeda's sincerity, the composition of the government which will take office in December, 1963, is very much in doubt. Hence, so long as key articles of the agrarian law remain unchanged, future Honduran policy is uncertain, and United Fruit cannot reinvent. Amendment must provide due recourse to the courts for appeal of administrative actions. This change should be accomplished before the law becomes an election issue.

Replying to a question from Ambassador Burrows, Baker said no order of priority was shown in the amendments United Fruit suggested to Villeda. Baker thought Villeda would be able to perceive by himself which were most important to the company.

Noting the great power the law concentrates in the head of the Agrarian Reform Institute, Baker said the present antagonistic director, Miguel CUBERO da Costa, would have to be removed. He implied the company might not reinvest in Honduras so long as Cubero holds his present position, even if the law is amended satisfactorily. This was not discussed with Villeda in Miami.

Baker noted that in preparation and passage the Agrarian Reform Law "had gotten away" from Villeda. He cited the fact that none of the ministers of government were allowed to see the law before it was submitted to the Honduran congress.

Baker said he told Secretary Rusk at dinner on November 30 that the "Hondurans had not moved in on United Fruit". Answering a question, Baker said he understood that the Agrarian Reform Law seriously affects leased lands, and that United Fruit does have large leased holdings in Honduras. He added that he had no idea how much land these leases covered, though later he informally hazarded a guess that perhaps 50% of the land controlled by United Fruit in Honduras is leased.

Answering another question, Baker said he agreed that a public investigation of Honduran agrarian reform in relation to the Hickenlooper Amendment and United Fruit would not be very helpful at this time. He added that if there is no progress in amendment of the Agrarian Reform Law in two or three months he would want to review this position.

Baker said many are working to ease this problem in Honduras. Reportedly, Eugene Black, President of the World Bank, told Villeda at Blair House on December 1 that it is essential that Honduras maintain a favorable climate for private enterprise. Baker hoped the United States Government would continue to press the matter, and he asked Rowell to keep him (Baker) informed. When President Kennedy meets the Central American Presidents at San Jose in March or April 1963, Baker hopes Villeda will be able to report that the problem with United Fruit has been solved.

During the conversation Ambassador Burrows noted the following:

In view of Honduras' primitive judicial system, appeal to the courts is not very meaningful. While the Agrarian Reform Law was being passed and submitted to Villeda for signature no one knew what was in the law. Only a copy of the original draft was available. Burrows tried to have Villeda delay final Congressional action on the law until 1963, but this was not possible. The United Fruit Company took no strong action in Honduras regarding the law until it had been passed. Once passed, it was politically impossible for Villeda to veto it. Honduran politics have changed a great deal in the last 30 years.

154. Memorandum of conversation, September 30, between Cottrell, and Ambassador Dávila and Finance Minister Bueso¹

September 30, 1963

SUBJECT

Possible Coup in Honduras

PARTICIPANTS

U.S.A.

APA—Sterling J. Cottrell

OAP—V. Lansing Collins

OAP/H—Edward H. Powell

Honduras:

Ambassador Celeo Dávila

Finance Minister Jorge BUESO Arias

BUESO said that for several months disgruntled Honduran politicians associated with General Tibúrcio CARIAS Andino (ex-dictator, president, caudillo) have been pressing Honduran armed forces officers to overthrow the present Honduran Government and prevent elections, alleging as an excuse that (a) the government is riddled with communists, (b) a Rodas Alvarado election victory would lead the country into communism, (c) the elections will be fraudulent, (d) the armed forces will be deprived of their rightful constitutional position by Rodas. Communists in government (sic) were enumerated (several hundred) but not named. BUESO said OAS observers for election had been discredited by distortion of the Bonilla-Atiles statement that the prospects for a peaceful, honest election were very promising. The opposition press claimed that this statement proved that the OAS observers were under the control of the Villeda Morales government. Nonetheless, prospects for carrying out the election and subsequent constitutional transfer of power were good until the Dominican Coup in which Dominican Republic military leaders deposed Bosch on grounds similar to the charges being levied against Villeda Morales and Rodas Alvarado.

Bueso said the nervousness of opposition groups had been greatly increased by Rodas' uncompromising attacks against the opposition in campaign speeches. Bueso said Rodas had moderated this approach in his last three speeches.

(In passing Bueso said he had a pact with Rodas. If the Liberals win the election with more than 65% of the vote, Bueso will not comment on the kind of appointments Rodas makes; but if the Liberal vote is less than 65%—and Bueso believes it will follow the pattern of the last few elections in which the Liberals won 58%–60%—then Bueso will enter the Rodas government only on the condition that Rodas will appoint clearly qualified men to public office, including some Nationalists and others who are not necessarily Rodistas or Liberals. Bueso claimed Rodas agreed to this.)

¹ Possible coup in Honduras. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, POL 26 HOND.

Bueso then said about a week or ten days ago the Nationalist Party press had printed an editorial virtually inviting the Armed Forces to execute a coup, showing Lopez that his civilian backing had grown from a small group of Cariistas to most of the opposition.

Bueso commented that in personal terms Lopez' ambition was awakened by Carias' efforts in February 1963 to have Lopez made the Nationalist Party presidential candidate, and that this ambition is a contributing factor in the present situation.

Bueso then digressed into a recital of the Villeda Morales theory of controlling communism in the hemisphere, i.e., concentrate on social and economic progress and avoid giving the communists martyrdom and a popular cause through police repression. He claimed success for the system, referring to the recent expulsion of communists from leadership of the SITRASFRUCO union, and the inability of the Honduran Communist Party to organize demonstrations in Tegucigalpa against Operation Fraternidad in 1962. He noted that a military government in Honduras would mean a return to random jailings, police repression and the like, creating an ideal climate for communist agitation. He predicted strikes over a period of time and increased popular reaction against a military government.

In answer to a question Bueso doubted that a golpe would degenerate into a civil war.

Bueso noted that Lopez believes the U.S. Department of Defense holds views contrary to those of the State Department regarding military coups and government by armed force in Latin America. He thinks Lopez is sure the "Pentagon" would protect the interests of the Honduran Armed Forces after a coup, in spite of any "State Department policies to the contrary". Bueso believes the greatest single deterrent which can be brought to bear on Lopez now is a clear statement to Lopez from the U.S. Department of Defense urging Lopez not to engage in a coup. The statement must not smack of "State Department collusion". It was evident from his manner that Bueso had been discussing making a proposal to this effect with Ambassador Dávila during their drive to the State Department. Bueso also evidently had this proposal in mind when he left Honduras.

Bueso commented on the Villeda-Orlich efforts to have Schick (Nicaragua) and Rivera (El Salvador) issue a joint Declaration of Central America condemning the events in the Dominican Government, and striking out against unconstitutional changes of government. He said

Schick was willing to support Villeda and Orlich to the maximum on any statement except one supporting Bosch personally (because Bosch had personally attacked Schick earlier this year). The effort failed however, because Rivera and or his advisers refused to support Villeda and constitutional government in general, saying this would offend Col. PERALTA (Guatemala) whose government was born of a coup only this year.

Therefore the appeal for a U.S. Defense Department message is a last ditch effort by the Hondurans. Without it, Bueso believes a coup will occur before the October 13 election date—the coup is psychologically more justifiable before rather than after the election.

Bueso said Villeda recently met with Lopez but that the meeting was unproductive. He said conduct of the elections under the National Council of Elections, with both the Armed Forces and the Guardia Civil being controlled by the National Council of Elections on election day, (pattern of 1962 municipal elections) no longer seemed to be acceptable to Lopez. Bueso said a new meeting between Villeda and Lopez would take place October 1.

Dávila said there is no chance of any constructive and helpful action by the OAS. Only four countries (Honduras, Costa Rica, Venezuela and, maybe, Colombia) would support a Honduran request for further assistance.

155. Telegram 84 to Tegucigalpa, 134 to Guatemala City, 69 to Managua, 143 to Panama, 111 to San Jose, and 81 to San Salvador, September 30¹

September 30, 1963

INFO: POLAD CINCSO. POLAD CINCLANT.

Re rumors impending coup Honduras.

Department extremely concerned recent reports that Chief Honduran Armed Forces Lopez planning coup, and desires bring all feasible pressure on Lopez and civilians and military pushing him toward coup. If possible, neighboring countries especially Nicaragua and El Salvador should be persuaded disavow promise any support for Lopez. Though Guatemalan regime least likely disavow Lopez fact remains Peralta and his followers have recently given indication of wish return to some form of constitutionality and normal political activity. President Rivera should be aware that military coup in Honduras would not, repeat not, necessarily strengthen his hand in El Salvador. If report Managua 115 correct President Schick is prepared state publicly his support of constitutionally elected presidents. Presidents Villeda and Orlich have sent President Kennedy telegram expressing their concern regarding overthrow Bosch and their hope that upcoming declaration of Central America would strengthen support of constitutionally elected regimes. Reply is being prepared and effort will be made obtain permission Orlich and Villeda to publish exchange unless declaration, which Department understands not yet agreed to, comes out in meantime and provides suitable public peg for further press statements here in Washington.

¹ Rumors about impending coup in Honduras. Secret. 3 pp. DOS, CF, POL 26 HOND.

Department believes another key to situation is meeting, (Tegucigalpa's 145, September 26) of Villeda, Rodas, Lopez, OAS Electoral Commission and President Electoral Council which was scheduled but has been put off. Anything that can be done to get this meeting to take place would be useful. Such a meeting would, it seems, be more useful than meeting merely Villeda and Lopez. Coordinated use of army and Guardia Civil forces to guard elections as was done in 1962 municipal elections should be possible.

Another key to situation is to create doubt in Lopez' mind that typical easy, bloodless Latin American coup possible; doubt regarding his ability to win prolonged, bloody coup; doubt regarding his own future in such situation; similar doubts in minds those military and civilians pushing Lopez toward coup.

Department getting in touch with Jorge Bueso and after discussion with him may suggest he return immediately Honduras attempt intervene between Lopez and Rodistas.

Department does not believe any OAS action possible. Department could keep major US interests in Honduras such as United and Standard Fruit informed of its strong view of calamity we think would befall Honduras and these companies as well if coup were to occur. Can companies get to people who are pushing Lopez? Embassy Tegucigalpa comments requested. In its discretion Embassy Tegucigalpa should take action outlined and in addition impress on Villeda that his failure to control Lopez at this critical point could cause him lose respect of Betancourt, Orlich and other democratic forces in Central and South America as well as U.S. Government. Villeda close relationship with Lopez and hatred of Rodas being well known, Villeda must be persuaded to insist on constitutionality.

Embassies other Central American countries and Panama should, in their discretion, take steps outlined above.

Tegucigalpa wire soonest names those persons, especially civilians, pressing Lopez for coup. If coup occurs would any moderate nationalists be in government, or would civilian participation be limited mainly to PPP rpt PPP?

Ball

156. Memorandum from Read to McGeorge Bundy, October 1¹

October 1, 1963

SUBJECT

United States-Honduran Dispute Over The Swan Islands

On November 30, 1962, Presidents Kennedy and Villeda Morales agreed:

“to seek on an urgent basis a solution of the Swan Islands question within the framework of the Inter-American System.”

On March 20, 1963, in San José, President Villeda Morales said he would send a Commission to Washington in late September to discuss the problem. We recently suggested a delay. However, the Commission will arrive, though in October rather than September.

The Hondurans want recognition of the validity of their claim to sovereignty over the Swan Islands solely to satisfy national honor. They plan no physical use of the islands or surrounding waters. The United States maintains weather facilities and an aerial navigation beacon on Great Swan. The Joint Chiefs of Staff have taken the position that the islands are strategically located in an area of continuing military interest, and future United States use of them could best be assured under United States sovereignty. CIA also operates a radio station on Great Swan and has a continuing interest in the islands.

Apart from reference to the International Court of Justice, which we have offered to undertake but which Honduras has not accepted, all the alternative courses which could bring about a permanent solution require Congressional approval. Such approval would be hard to obtain at present, and probably would complicate our efforts for Congressional action on more important foreign policy measures.

¹ U.S.-Honduran dispute over the Swan Islands. Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, William H. Brubeck Series, Honduras, 1961–1964.

Ambassador Burrows has explained this problem to President Villeda and to Honduran Foreign Minister Perdomo who will head the Honduran Commission. They have agreed that for the present two half days of preliminary talks will be satisfactory.

We hope to be able to keep the dispute at the level of occasional diplomatic exchanges until circumstances favor proceeding into a permanent solution. If the Hondurans insist on a more positive response before we can prudently seek the necessary Congressional support for such a solution, we can consider offering a status quo agreement. The present lack of Honduran activity on the islands makes this difficult. However, we could provide safe landing, fresh water and drying racks on Little Swan (we only use Great Swan). This would enable the Hondurans to use the islands as a base for fishing outside the territorial waters of the islands.

The Department requests the President's approval to accept the Honduran presentation for further study, even though this does not completely satisfy the agreement of last November.

[illegible signature]
for

Benjamin H. Read
Executive Secretary

157. Telegram 74 to Managua and 86 to San Salvador, October 2¹

October 2, 1963

Re reports impending coup Honduras; declaration presidents Orlich, Schick, Rivera, Villeda issued 8:00 PM Sept. 30; Managua 118; and San Salvador CX-8.

To make Honduran Armed Forces Chief Lopez more uncertain regarding support he thinks Nicaraguan and Salvadoran Armed Forces might give him in a coup in Honduras, Embassies Managua and San

¹ Joint declaration by four American Republics presidents re impending coup. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 26 HOND.

Salvador in their discretion should again approach Schick and Rivera, respectively, and ask that:

(A) Nicaraguan and Salvadoran Ambassadors in Tegucigalpa be instructed emphasize to civilian Honduran contacts that joint declaration of four presidents issued night of September 30 is firm policy their governments, especially noting paragraphs 3, 4, 6 and 7;

(B) Nicaraguan and Salvadoran military attachés in Tegucigalpa make similar approach to Honduran military, especially Lopez, emphasizing Salvadoran and Nicaraguan military will not support coup in Honduras.

(C) Both Ambassadors and Military Attachés of Salvador and Nicaragua in Honduras should relay info in reftels to Hondurans.

Actions louder than words.

Ball

158. Memorandum of conversation between Foreign Minister Perdomo, Finance Minister Bueso, and Ambassador Dávila, and Cottrell and other U.S. officials¹

October 3, 1963

SUBJECT

Honduras

PARTICIPANTS

His Excellency Dr. Roberto Perdomo Paredes, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Honduras;

His Excellency Lic. Jorge Bueso Arias, Minister of Finance of Honduras;

His Excellency Lic. Céleo Dávila, Ambassador of Honduras to the United States; Deputy Assistant Secretary Sterling J. Cottrell;

Mr. Ward P. Allen, Director, Office of Inter-American Regional Political Affairs;

Mr. V. Lansing Collins, Director, Office of Central American and Panamanian Affairs;

Mr. Edward M. Rowell, Officer in Charge, Honduran Affairs.

At his request, the Honduran Ambassador in Washington called at the Department at 10:00 a.m. October 3 on instructions from President Villeda Morales, with whom he had been in telephone communication over the Inter-American system. The Ambassador reported on the situation in Tegucigalpa saying that the Presidential Palace was surrounded, there were 50 dead, many wounded, and that considerable fighting and a blood bath could follow.

¹ Request for U.S. assistance in holding back ongoing coup. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, POL 26 HOND.

Pointing out that the United States had, at least in the press, declared in connection with the Dominican Republic coup that military coups against constitutional governments were disastrous for the whole continent and that the United States backed constitutional and representative government, he hoped we could put pressure on Lopez to persuade him to stop the coup because Lopez probably believed that the State Department and the Pentagon had different policies. Mr. Collins pointed out to the Ambassador at this point that following our conversation several days ago several efforts had been made to make it clear to Lopez that there was no difference in United States policy. He said that the Army Attaché had called upon Lopez and delivered a message from the Pentagon and that yesterday General Bogart had flown up from the Canal Zone to talk to Lopez. We were forced to conclude that pressure on Lopez of this nature was not successful.

The Ambassador went on to note that there was an advantage in the Honduran situation that had not existed in the Dominican Republic, namely that Villeda Morales is still in the Palace, has not been given an ultimatum, has had no contact with Lopez, and is still President. The coup has not been completely consummated as yet. Asked for concrete suggestions, the Ambassador admitted that he had no instructions to work through the OAS. He said he had no confirmation of any interference by Nicaragua or Guatemala since Lopez had all the force that he needed. He said that since Villeda Morales was still President he hoped the United States could get out a declaration stressing our preoccupation with democracy and the tenets of Punta del Este, stating it would not recognize a military regime in Tegucigalpa if it were set up and that such a regime could not get any help from us of any kind. Reminded of the recent Central American Declaration the Foreign Minister pointed out that really all it meant was that the Governments agreed to consult each other before recognizing a regime established by military force. Mr. Cottrell told the Ambassador that it was very difficult to get a firm policy in a few minutes and that we planned to tell the press at noon only the facts of the take-over. He added we would consider this matter and be in touch with them later. The Hondurans then made two more points: 1. That further discussion regarding the Swan Islands scheduled for October 4 be postponed and 2. that since communication with Honduras through the Honduran Embassy might be cut off we keep the Honduran Embassy informed of events. Both points were agreed to.

The Ambassador and Foreign Minister then left but Jorge Bueso remained behind. He told Mr. Collins and Mr. Rowell that the President had made it very clear to him on the phone that he expected the Ambassador to go through the motions mentioned above but that what he was really counting on was action by the United States. The President had said that he could hold out in the Palace for two or three days awaiting such action but that if it was clear that nothing was going to be done he would try and make an arrangement with Lopez.

159. Telegram 94 to Tegucigalpa, October 4¹

October 4, 1963

For Ambassador Burrows.

Following for your present guidance:

Since Villeda Govt deposed, Embassy will, of course, cease all formal contacts with members of that Govt, unless constitutional succession followed. Until a govt is recognized by US, Embassy should scrupulously avoid any official contact (formal or written communications, public appearances together, etc.) with the military or civilians associated with the coup or likely to be named to the new governing body which could imply approval of coup or foreshadowing recognition of any govt.

Embassy may find need for unofficial, informal, personal contacts with both military and civilians falling within above categories for purposes information gathering or conveying this Govt's position on matters arising this period of transition. Extreme care should be exercised in such informal contacts to avoid action which may be interpreted as recognition.

Dept plans no action on recognition question in near future.

Ball

¹ Instructions re contact with members of former Villeda government and question of recognition. Confidential. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Honduras, 10/1–5/63.

160. Telegram 101 to Tegucigalpa, 96 to San Salvador, 80 to Managua, 123 to San Jose, October 4¹

October 4, 1963

Problem of eventual recognition Honduras and restoration of normal relations including military and economic aid tied to earliest possible establishment or restoration of Honduran constitutional government.

Study of Honduran constitution indicates following procedure might accomplish this.

1. Lopez, as head of government, would announce that the announced dissolution of the National Congress was voided and call for the Congress to convene within a certain number of days to select a Designate to serve out the unexpired portion of the current Presidential term. (Art. 201) (COMMENT: Department assumes the absence of the President is absolute as required by Art 201. It might be necessary arrange absolute absence of existing Vice Presidents as none seems suitable as designate.)

2. A quorum for a session of the National Congress would be QUOTE one more than half the number of members comprising Congress UNQUOTE (Art. 177), i.e., 30 members inasmuch as the current membership is 58. (COMMENT: Since 22 members of Congress are nationalists, it should be possible obtain 8 more from among orthodox liberals and others acceptable to Lopez without necessarily having all Congressmen in attendance.)

3. This Designate would serve until December 21, 1963, at which time the Council of Ministers would take over the executive functions (Art. 203). (COMMENT: Presumably the Ministers would be named by Designate with Lopez concurrence.)

4. The Council of Ministers would be required to call for presidential elections within 15 days (Art. 201) and, therefore, would issue such an announcement on or about Sunday, January 5, 1964.

5. Assuming that all interested parties would prefer that the full four months permitted by the Constitution, would be allowed to run before election day, election day would be on or about May 5, 1964. The winner of this presidential election would be declared and installed within 20 days, i.e., on or about May 25, 1964 (Art. 201).

¹ Eventual recognition of Honduran Government and restoration of normal relations. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, POL 15 HOND.

You are instructed as follows:

- (a) TEGUCIGALPA: Please indicate feasibility.
- (b) SALVADOR: Discuss above with Bueso without reference to comments making clear this not repeat not an official US position but merely a technical study which he may use without reference to US.
- (c) SAN JOSE: Discuss only with Oduber on same basis as (b) above.

Ball

161. Telegram 135 to San Jose, October 8¹

October 8, 1963

You are directed to deliver the following personal and confidential message from President Kennedy to Villeda Morales:

QUOTE I fully appreciate the very difficult situation created by the unfortunate military coup in your country. I assure you of the strong position of the United States in continuing a firm course of action. We have suspended diplomatic relations and are in the process of withdrawing in an orderly manner our military and economic aid personnel. Our Ambassador has returned to the United States and will remain here indefinitely. You may be sure that we will exercise our influence in seeing to it that other Inter-American and international agencies follow similar action. We will continue to keep Ambassador Telles fully informed on other steps which might be taken to hasten the return to constitutional and representative government in your country. UNQUOTE

Rusk

¹ Personal message from President Kennedy to Villeda Morales. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 15 HOND.

162. Telegram 126 to San Salvador, 106 to Managua, 159 to San Jose, October 17¹

October 17, 1963

As you are aware from exchanges of messages past few days, Hondurans in and around the Lopez regime have begun to talk about ways to get back to constitutionality, and are sending feelers in our direction on how to normalize relations. These appear to be signs of genuine concern among leaders in Honduras resulting from stance which we and most of neighboring countries have taken.

We believe that if the pressure is maintained, there is reasonable chance that the Hondurans will work themselves up to devising a solution soon. They themselves must figure out how Honduras can get back to constitutionality. Others cannot do this for them, but we and the Isthmian neighbors which have not recognized Lopez can and should continue to hold off in order to keep the pressure on the Hondurans to do so.

You should inform GOVT of foregoing and strongly urge it not to recognize GOH in present circumstances.

You may at your discretion tell GOVT in general way about Honduran group in Washington and about growing talk in Tegucigalpa of a coalition arrangement.

MANAGUA: We continue gratified by Schick's attitude and trust he will stand firm.

SAN SALVADOR: Inform Rivera we think that in this developing situation his suggestion to Lopez through his Ambassador in Tegucigalpa on desirability of early return to constitutionality would be particularly timely now, and that details are for Hondurans to work out.

SAN JOSE: Inform Orlich confidentially repeat confidentially we believe the various Honduran initiatives now under way toward devising a solution should be allowed to proceed further before we consider sending in 5-nation committee.

Rusk

¹ Return to civilian constitutional government in Honduras. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 15 HOND.

163. Telegram 159 to Tegucigalpa, October 26¹

October 26, 1963

SUBJ: Contacts with Lopez. REF: Embtels 250 and 252.

1. For your guidance, our objective in Honduras remains: early establishment of civilian constitutional government in which a reasonably broad spectrum of Honduran political forces can participate and which, therefore, may be considered generally acceptable to the populace as a whole. (Par. 1 of Deptel 115 to San Salvador).

2. Agree we should now rpt now solicit Honduran proposals in Honduras to accomplish this. In your contacts with Lopez regime (follow Deptel 152) you should engage in any amount of dialogue you think necessary to accomplish our objective.

3. You may find opportunity to exploit professed Duron position (Embtel 250) and New York Times article datelined Tegucigalpa Oct 24 in which Paul Kennedy quotes Lopez as saying only ambition is military career. FYI Kennedy also reported Lopez said (a) time needed to reform electoral law depends on electoral census and cannot be estimated; (b) Lopez will be chief of state until constitutional government restored. END FYI

4. Heartily concur with your effort maintain broad contact with Lopez regime, ascertain Lopez views over weekend.

Ball

¹ Contacts with Lopez. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 15 HOND.

164. Telegram 258 from Tegucigalpa, October 27¹

Tegucigalpa, October 27, 1963

CINSCO for POLAD. Reference: Embassy Telegram 256.

Following are conclusions from conversation with Lopez Oct 25:

(1) Lopez determined maintain military control govt in transition period prior to new elections. Obvious various proposals put forward thus far for replacement military regime—Villeda plan, and Rivera proposal for designation civilian provisional president—unacceptable to Lopez.

(2) Prospects for early development civilian cabinet with real influence on overall policies of regime remote. Low opinion expressed by Lopez some of its members suggests he might be willing reshuffle govt if more capable figures, especially among liberals, were willing accept posts.

(3) Lopez views on duration transition period not yet completely jelled. Judge his inclination be for minimum period at least of year prior new elections, but at moment trying maintain flexibility on this point to accommodate himself to circumstances, especially to possibilities US recognition.

(4) Lopez, despite assertions Kennedy interview, probably continues entertain ambitions achieving presidency for himself but again mind not made up as best means achieve this end. Believe Lopez present inclination is toward extended period military mandate as best means remold political milieu in manner favorable to Lopez candidacy.

(5) Lopez, although anxious achieve US recognition, seems reconciled probability this will not be immediately forthcoming. Appears believe regime can weather this problem for perhaps another month or two and perhaps enhance its prestige by appearance maintaining "national dignity" under US pressure.

(6) Lopez not yet greatly concerned by economic and military consequences withdrawal US assistance although obviously unhappy about implications for political acceptability his regime.

Certain events of recent days tend to reinforce some of above conclusions. Recent appointment Lopez wife as president Social Welfare Board, position previously occupied by Sra. Villeda, may indicate Lopez intending use board as device enhance Lopez political image as it was successfully used by Villeda. Appointment Oct 25 new political governors for 18 departments shows overwhelming preponderance military officers, indicating military determination assert supremacy over civilian authority in transition period and possibly indicating intent remain in power prolonged period. Furthermore, military appears be employing Health Ministry and its network politically useful rural health centers as means enhance military image. Major jobs in ministry staffed by army officers and Embassy has unverified report civilian directors health centers being replaced by army doctors.

¹ Conclusions from October 25 conversation with Lopez. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 15 HOND.

Suggested course of action based on foregoing and on recent conversations with prominent liberals and nationalist figures will follow in subsequent message.

Knox

165. Telegram 268 from Tegucigalpa, October 30¹

Tegucigalpa, October 30, 1963

Following message in three parts, based on general observation of developments since October 3 GOLPE, contacts with military and civilian officials present regime and with prominent political party leaders, presents Embassy's analysis of (1) position of military regime and outlook for return to constitutionality; (2) policy considerations confronting US in defining its course of action vis-à-vis regime; and (3) recommendations of Embassy regarding course of action.

I. Position of Present Regime. Military government resulting from October 3 GOLPE appears to be firmly established and in effective control of country. While opposition liberal leaders tend to stress restiveness of rank and file followers, no substantial overt resistance movement has yet developed, although small clandestine liberal group now operating in capital. While there are some reports communist attempts to rally opposition sentiment this activity does not appear effective at present time.

While intent military regime to return government to constitutionality at some future date appears clear, no great hurry to move in this direction. Although force US reaction in terms terminating aid and dismantling aid mission came as something of shock, military continue to feel US will come to some early accommodation re recognition which Lopez obviously anxious to secure. Impending recognition regime by UK and Germany, possibly followed by that of other Western European countries and some, if not most of LA countries may mitigate political needs recognition. However, pressure civilian ministers concerned with economic problems for government policies designed facilitate early return US economic aid, added to general desire military leaders to possess hallmark of respectability conferred by US recognition, will continue impel military leaders to consider accommodation with US on basis return to some type constitutionality.

¹ Analysis of position of military regime; policy considerations confront U.S.; Embassy course of action recommendations. Confidential. 7 pp. DOS, CF, POL 15 HOND.

Apparent, however, no possibility exists for adoption of solution to constitutional problem based on immediate application principles of 1957 Constitution. While liberals might eventually make appeal to Lopez on this basis, have little hope or chance of success.

The only uniform sentiment now current in Honduras (and this remains somewhat weak and certainly disorganized) is for a clear definition of the military regime's intention to return to constitutional government via free elections, etc. But there is no basic consensus on timetable. General position political parties appears as follows:

1. Liberal Party, which in principle opposed to GOLPE although some elements do not regret elimination of Rodas Alvarado, agreed on rapid return to constitutional government but some division exists as to tactics best suited to induce favorable attitude military regime. Some elements support clear public statement liberal policy opposing regime while others hope to avoid open stance which would prejudice opportunities influence Lopez behind scenes.

2. Nationalists who generally favor GOLPE divided on timing of return to constitutionality. Controlling group in Nationalist Party favor prolonged military regime probably with view to building up party strength, preserving jobs and other gains acquired through GOLPE. Galvistas remain on fringe of regime and distrustful of Lopez long-range intentions. Crucial, in final definition attitude of Nationalists, may be Gabriel Mejia who because of economic interests may be persuaded to adopt position favorable constitutionality in agreement with other political groups.

At present time there is some evidence of readiness on part certain Nationalist and Liberal Party leaders to collaborate in finding a solution to problem of return to constitutionality and maintenance of political stability in Honduras. These discussions generally involve so-called Colombian Plan and its variations, most recently enumerated in the Ramirez proposals (Embtel 266). No general agreement has yet emerged or even appear near, although there is considerable sentiment for a political solution embodying principle that minority party must share government positions either through Civil Service System or some constitutional formula for dividing bureaucratic spoils.

Military regime has not as yet expressed view on formula to return to constitutionality except for general statements re need to revise census and call for constituent assembly. From present indications military appear to be contemplating maintenance of power for one or two years, although concern over US recognition probably injects some degree flexibility in time-table for return to constitutionality. Objectives military regime in transition period still unclear. Strong possibility Lopez aspiring to election as President but this may not be unshakable ambition.

Attitudes toward US policy usually reflect attitudes toward coup itself. Some anger and some perplexity exists in military and nationalist circles. A few who favored coup understand what US is trying achieve and appear respect position while in disagreement. Liberals very pleased by US stance and perhaps somewhat surprised at US firmness. Public expressions of anti-Americanism have occurred but unless Nationalist and military leaders choose encourage anti-American campaign, unlikely that spontaneous mass anti-American feeling will develop.

II. US Policy Considerations. In formulating US approach to present Honduran situation, Embassy believes following points should be considered:

1. US actions should be consistent with cause, content and objectives of initial drastic reaction to October 3 GOLPE in cutting off economic and military aid and practically dismantling US aid mission with its attendant dislocations. Recognition of present Honduran regime without tangible and clear evidence of progress toward return to constitutionality at reasonably early date would obviously negate US objective of deterring future coups against constitutional and democratic governments in Honduras and other Latin American countries and would make drastic measures already taken appear bit ridiculous. In view particular circumstances Honduran coup—against a democratic regime which was within few months of fulfilling its constitutional term—serious consideration might be given to delaying recognition in any event until December 21 when Villeda Morales scheduled to leave office.

2. Action, however, must also be based on realities of situation, that is, existence of regime which is in firm control of country and which is unlikely to accept any return to constitutional government along lines laid down in 1957 Constitution. Hence restoration of constitutional government obviously must be result of fresh approach in which US should attempt to encourage participation all parties with view to finding solution not only to present situation but also to long-term problem of political stability in Honduras.

3. Existence of military regime should not at this stage be regarded as total disaster. If there is any follow-up to suggestions put forward by Minister of Public Works Bogran, possibility exists some benefits may be derived in terms tax reform, establishment of Civil Service, etc which have been difficult to achieve under democratic regime. Within limits posed by circumstances, US should give encouragement to any plans along this line, especially Civil Service which may contribute solution basic political tensions which have long disrupted national life.

4. While suspension economic aid necessary to achievement US policy objectives in present situation, assume US does not wish to see serious deterioration economic situation or cancellation of economic growth achieved thus far. Believe therefore, it to interest of US to commence restoration some economic aid concomitantly with extension recognition following acceptable steps by military regime toward restoration constitutional government.

Recommendations for course of action which follow made against background these considerations.

III. Recommendations

1. In view euphoria likely to be induced present military regime by impending recognition UK, Germany, etc and probable consequent expectation US recognition will not be long delayed, pressure should be maintained on regime by immediate implementation plans for reduction Embassy, military and air mission staffs.

2. Concomitantly further informal contacts with Lopez, Bogran and other influential members of government should be made to determine clearly objectives of government not only in relation to return to constitutionality but also in regard to "legislative" program such as tax revision, establishment of Civil Service which conceivably might have some bearing on speed with which regime willing to reestablish constitutional system.

3. Lopez should be induced to establish time-table for return to constitutionality via free elections, preferably within period of six months but with some flexibility up to perhaps an additional three months depending on value US attaches to any "legislative" program that might be undertaken by regime. In event latter justifies more extended period prior to elections, US should press for establishment transitional coalition government to include representative members all parties.

4. Embassy should continue to encourage leading Nationalists, liberals and others to collaborate on proposals for reestablishment constitutional government with view to presenting Lopez agreed solution.

5. US recognition should result from establishment of acceptable time table for elections including definitive date for this and other steps process return to constitution. Resumption of economic aid would be gradual and linked to achievement of definite stages of time table.

Knox

166. Telegram 171 to Tegucigalpa, October 31¹

October 31, 1963

SUBJECT: Policy re Lopez. REF: Tegucigalpa 268.

1. Your analysis excellent. Your recommendations approved as general basis for continuing dialogue with Lopez and other Hondurans, with the understanding specific solutions which might develop will be referred to Department.

2. Following specific comments pertain:

a. For time being your recommendations are minimal U.S. objectives. Anything additional that might be accomplished (e.g. naming provisional civilian president or junta pending establishment new constitutional government) is desirable.

b. Your recommendation five seems to be logical final step after action completed on recommendations one through four. Believe six to nine months timetable for establishment conciliatory civilian constitutional government reasonable. However, our position not repeat not absolutely rigid. Consult with Department on any Lopez proposal on timing. Of course make no commitments as to Washington action on recognition, no matter what Hondurans may propose.

c. Expect to follow course action outlined last sentence recommendation five, but need not repeat not ponder specific relationships between levels aid and stages of timetable at this time.

Ball

¹ Approval of recommendations in telegram 268 from Tegucigalpa with specific comments. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 15 HOND.

167. Memorandum for Bromley Smith, November 1¹

November 1, 1963

SUBJECT

Presidential Meeting on Honduras and DR—November 1—5:00 p.m.

PARTICIPANTS

The President

AID—Mr. David Bell, Mr. Reuben Sternfeld

Defense—Dr. Mountain

CIA—Mr. Richard Helms, Col. J.C. King

State—Mr. Edwin M. Martin

White House—Mr. McGeorge Bundy, Mr. Ralph Dungan

The current situation in the Dominican Republic and Honduras was discussed.

With respect to Honduras, it was observed that the conversations with regard to the return to constitutionality are still going on in the country, that an orderly withdrawal of U.S. personnel is underway, that there is no imminent threat of counter-coup or insurgent activity, and therefore our posture for the moment should be to stand pat.

With regard to the DR, it was decided (1) to dispatch Colonel Simmons and the President approved a general instruction for his mission, (2) the President requested a memorandum to be drafted for use in our Latin American embassies in the event that we recognize the new regime in Saigon, and (3) the President directed that the Chargé in Santo Domingo be brought back to the U.S. for consultation early next week.

Ralph A. Dungan

¹ Meeting among President Kennedy and other government officials on the current situation in Honduras and the Dominican Republic. Confidential. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Dominican Republic, 10/18–11/23/63.

168. Telegram 194 to Tegucigalpa, November 18¹

November 18, 1963

Subject: Lopez regime in Honduras. Reference: TEGUCIGALPA 295, 296, 297 and 298.

You should inform Lopez that Dept takes position that while mode of return to constitutionality described to you in recent conversation unobjectionable, timing appears to be all out of proportion to requirements of situation and views which Lopez and Zuniga had expressed previously, and unless abbreviated considerably would pose serious difficulties for early normalization US relations. (As one example of way to compress schedule Constituent Assembly should be able to meet within a few days of its election. At your discretion, you may remind Lopez that on several occasions he spoke favorably to Amb Burrows of "highly successful" 1956–1957 Junta, attributing its success directly to fact it lasted only one year. He said it would not have been so useful had it tried to extend its life beyond one year.)

You should say that Dept's consideration will be helped by including in decree definite date for holding of elections to National Constituent Assembly; and that final decision of US will be affected by timing called for by the terms of the decree, and by taking of initial measures set forth in decree to set up electoral commission composed of representative Honduran parties and other elements private sector showing effective intent to carry out objectives described.

You should inform Lopez that upon publication his regime's plans for return to constitutionality, USG will as customary consult with OARs. Nature of our consultation will depend on actual terms of announcement. We hope there will be a satisfactory solution soonest in order avoid unnecessary complications at planned MFM.

You should impress on Lopez extreme seriousness with which USG views the OAS recommendations to its members to submit to COAS on a continuing basis evidence of subversive Castro communist activity in their respective countries. This recommendation reaffirmed by Central American countries and Panama in Resolution 8 of Managua Security Conference April 3–4, 1963. It would be highly desirable for him to submit captured documents and correspondence at forthcoming Salvador meeting.

¹ Return to civilian constitutional government. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, POL 15 HOND.

As member of OAS we are most anxious that COAS have prompt access to documentary proofs of grave Castro communist penetration of Honduras described by Lopez.

Rusk

Jamaica

169. Memorandum from Rusk to President Kennedy, April 3¹

April 3, 1961

SUBJECT

Visit of Premier of Jamaica

Norman Manley, Premier of Jamaica will be in Washington from April 17 to April 21. He is coming at his initiative primarily to discuss various matters of specific US-Jamaican interest such as housing, civil aviation, contract labor, sugar, and bauxite. We are arranging for him to be briefed on Cuba, and on inter-American defense arrangements. We plan also to discuss the political and economic future of The West Indies with him.

Mr. Manley is the outstanding West Indian statesman and is likely to be the first Prime Minister of the Federation after its independence in 1962. He will be meeting with other West Indian leaders on May 2 in Trinidad to determine finally the shape of the new West Indies nation. On May 31 these leaders will meet with the UK in London to set a firm date for West Indian independence.

The United States has substantial interests in this area. The Air Force has bases scattered through the Islands on which instrumentation for the Atlantic Missile Range is located. The Navy conducts anti-submarine operations from installations there, and the Naval Station at Chaguarmas guards the southern approaches by sea to the Panama Canal. In addition to its tourist attractions, the area is economically important for its bauxite resources and petroleum refining facilities.

Mr. Manley's prestige and leadership will be crucial at the Trinidad and London meetings. Jamaica's adherence to the Federation depends on his political strength within the Island. If he becomes Prime Minister, the early years of West Indian independence will be shaped by his concepts of international relations. During the recent successful base negotiations, he publicly declared his opposition to neutralism and his devotion to the principles of democracy. We understand he favors membership by The West Indies in the Commonwealth, the UN, the OAS, and the Rio Pact. He has influence in Africa.

¹ Upcoming visit of Premier Manley of Jamaica. Secret. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Jamaica, 1961-62.

For the above reasons, I believe it would be in the interests of the United States for you to receive him for about an hour any time between April 17 and April 21. If you approve, Mr. Ivan White, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State, will accompany him.

Dean Rusk

170. Memorandum of conversation, April 19, between President Kennedy and Premier Manley¹

April 19, 1961

SUBJECT

Conversation Between The President and Premier Manley of Jamaica

PARTICIPANTS

The President

Norman Manley, Premier of Jamaica

Ivan B. White, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs

The President received Premier Manley at 3:40 p.m. April 19. He told Mr. Manley that the United States was greatly interested in the development of the West Indian Federation and its future and inquired as to the progress being made. Mr. Manley in reply said that the present schedule called for a constitutional convention in Port of Spain in May to be followed by a conference in London commencing May 31. At the latter it was expected that remaining differences would be ironed out and that the date for independence would be established, probably for April next year. At some date following the London conference Jamaica would hold a referendum to decide whether it would stay in the Federation or get out. He had promised such a referendum because the opposition party, after many years of a bipartisan approach to matters, had declared itself in opposition to federation. Mr. Manley said he was unsure as to how the referendum would turn out. He could have won the referendum two months ago but due to two blunders by Federation authorities the issue was in doubt. However, he, Manley, was going to exert every personal effort to include Jamaica in the Federation. He was convinced that over the long term a strong Federation would be an element of stability in the Caribbean area. Furthermore, a Federation was in the United States' interest because the alternative was fragmentation into ten small and weak states.

¹ West Indian Federation; U.S. assistance; bauxite, immigration, and aviation; sugar quotas. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Jamaica, 1961-62.

When the President inquired as to what the United States Government could do to be helpful in this matter, Premier Manley said he had considered this question and had decided that there was one helpful measure which the President himself could take. It would be most helpful if after the London conference, the President could issue a statement pointing to United States interest in the development of a strong Federation, to the community of interests between Americans and West Indians, and making a clear explanation of the intention of the United States Government to participate actively in the economic and social development of the West Indies along the lines of the program evolved for Latin America. Mr. White informed the President that he had discussed this matter briefly with Richard Goodwin of the White House staff and that there were possibilities of working out something through recasting the President's message to Congress on the Latin American program in terms specifically directed to the Federation of the West Indies. The President instructed Mr. White to follow up on this matter with Mr. Goodwin.

Mr. Manley then said that he and his colleagues had studied with great interest the President's message to Congress of March 13, 1961, and that they accept the challenge contained therein. Jamaica accepted the criteria set forth, including all aspects of self-help, in the field of economic and social progress. In return he was looking to the United States for assistance in meeting two highest priority problems; namely, low cost housing and water supply. Jamaica was not asking for grants, but rather needed long term loans at low interest rates. In reply to a question from the President Mr. Manley said that Jamaica was financially sound, was the first of the British colonies to borrow on the New York market, and was capable of servicing additional loans. Trinidad likewise was in good financial condition and had a per capita income 50% higher than Jamaica. Although the smaller islands in the Federation were in a deficit position, there was no reason why they could not be brought to the point of self support in 4 or 5 years.

When the President referred to their mutual acquaintanceship with John Pringle, Mr. Manley said that Pringle had evolved a proposal for financing such areas as the West Indies in which the American people had an interest. This would provide for a fund in which those interested could invest, with repayment guaranteed by the United States Government. The funds would be used for capital development in the West Indies. The President replied that the availability of capital appeared to be the big problem.

The President then took the initiative to say that he understood that Premier Manley was interested in questions concerning bauxite, immigration and aviation. The President had told Mr. Macmillan what he proposed to do in regard to the immigration quota and assumed that the Prime Minister had informed Mr. Manley. Mr. Manley replied in the affirmative. He said that in the case of bauxite, arrangements for stockpiling had been very useful to Jamaica, but that it would be helpful in planning production ahead if barter arrangements could be worked out covering a two or three year period rather than the single year system currently in effect. As regards aviation the British and the U.S. at the Barbados conference last year had reached agreement on a package covering additional air routes between the U.S. and West Indies which was satisfactory to both parties. Unfortunately this package had been held up by global issues between the U.S. and U.K., such as Hong Kong, which had nothing to do with the Caribbean. The Federation of the West Indies and Jamaica were heavily dependent on the tourist trade and these additional air routes would be most helpful. He greatly hoped that the U.S. and U.K. could resolve this matter by June. The President instructed Mr. White to follow up this matter with Mr. Feldman to see what could be done.

Mr. Manley then raised the question of sugar quotas. He said that the sugar industry was vital to the West Indies; that our Ambassador (Whitney) at London and throughout the West Indies had laid great stress on economic cooperation between the U.S. and the West Indies; and that the West Indies was greatly disappointed at the small quota of 65,000 tons which had recently been announced as its share in the recent allocation. In closing, Mr. Manley said that he had promised to raise one additional question with the President and this referred to the six or seven thousand migratory workers who customarily come into the U.S. each season to work in agriculture. He understood that there was some opposition to permitting these workers into the U.S. and expressed the strong hope that this working arrangement would continue. It was most important to Jamaica because it provided a livelihood for workers, permitted them to send remittances to their families in Jamaica and, finally, it was excellent training in agriculture which permitted the workers to return eventually to Jamaica and establish their own farms. The President informed Mr. Manley that Mr. White and Mr. Goodwin would pursue actively all of the problems raised by the Premier.

171. Memorandum from Rusk to President Kennedy, May 28¹

May 28, 1962

SUBJECT

Visit of Premier of Jamaica

Sir Alexander Bustamante, Premier of Jamaica, will be in Washington from June 26 to 28. It is recommended that you receive him sometime during this period. He is coming at his initiative to discuss various matters of special U.S.-Jamaican interest. We are arranging for him to have talks with appropriate officials regarding the aid program for Jamaica, the Alliance for Progress, sugar, and bauxite. We are also arranging for him to be briefed on the Inter-American defense arrangement in view of his public statement favoring a defense relationship with the United States.

Sir Alexander is an aging, colorful politician who has been associated with the trade union movement and the drive for independence in Jamaica for almost half of his 78 years. In the recent general election of April 10, he defeated his cousin and traditional rival Norman Manley to become Premier of Jamaica and the man who will lead Jamaica into independence as a Commonwealth member on August 6 of this year.

The U.S. will be concerned to see that Jamaica follows a progressive, democratic course after independence. Of the British colonies in the Caribbean, Jamaica seems to be the best prepared in terms of leadership to play a responsible role in the affairs of the Western Hemisphere after independence. The future will not be without problems, however, and it is essential that the U.S. at an early stage establish a strong, friendly relationship with this new American nation.

You will recall that last year you received Norman Manley for an hour's interview. For the reasons specified above, it now seems in the best interests of the U.S. that you receive Sir Alexander Bustamante for a similar interview. His view of foreign policy does not differ in any substantial degree from that of his predecessor and there is every reason to hope that under his leadership a firm U.S.-Jamaican relationship can be established.

William C. Burdett, Acting Deputy Assistant Secretary of State, will be present at this interview and will be available for any preliminary briefing you may desire.

Dean Rusk

¹ Visit of Premier Bustamante of Jamaica. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Jamaica, 1961–62.

172. Jamaican Scope Paper, undated¹

undated

JAMAICAN SCOPE PAPER*Objectives*

1. We should acknowledge Sir Alexander Bustamante's publicly stated desire to establish close and friendly ties with the U.S. and express our sincere gratitude for these overtures.

2. We should encourage Sir Alexander to continue his resolute anti-communism, and his intent to align Jamaica on the side of the Free World.

3. We should imply to Sir Alexander our hope that an independent Jamaica by the maturity of its leaders will provide an example of responsible government in the area, thus adding an element of stability to the Caribbean.

4. We should encourage Jamaica to continue to participate in Caribbean inter-area arrangements. The proposed West Indies Federation, though now dead, included various cooperative enterprises of a non-governmental sort (University of the West Indies) which should be continued.

Discussion

On August 6, 1962, Jamaica will receive its independence from the United Kingdom and thus become the first newly independent nation in the Western Hemisphere in almost 60 years.

The U.K. is gradually withdrawing from the Caribbean. Its influence, however, will remain a factor in post-independent Jamaica for some time to come. Nevertheless, its unwillingness to assume substantial economic or military commitments in the area will soon become apparent to Jamaica which we expect will look increasingly to the United States. The Premier of Jamaica, Sir Alexander Bustamante, has already asked for a Defense Agreement with the U.S. We have replied that the island's security could be preserved best by membership in the OAS and that as an OAS member Jamaica could participate in the activities of the Inter-American Defense Board. Further, Sir Alexander has been informed that after independence the U.S. would be prepared to extend oral assurances similar to those given several OAS members in the Caribbean to come to its aid if it is a victim of direct attack and to take steps to assist it to deal with indirect communist aggression.

¹ Independence; OAS membership; defense treaty; U.S. aid; sugar; bauxite; immigration. Secret. 6 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Jamaica, 1961-62.

It is our intention to establish a firm and friendly relationship with an independent Jamaica. We desire that Jamaica perform a useful role in the Inter-American system. Sir Alexander has expressed his intention to apply for membership in the OAS. Jamaica has already announced that the post-independent government will be a firm ally of the U.S. and has no desire to play the neutral game of seeking aid from East and West. Sir Alexander has taken a firmly anti-communist position in his public speeches.

U.S. economic aid will be required, but the Jamaicans have indicated that they do not wish to assume the posture of a passive recipient. They seem sincerely interested in contributing within their limitations and see their future relationship with the U.S. as a partnership built on mutual respect.

Formerly destined to be a part of the proposed West Indian Federation, Jamaica, in a September 1961 referendum, chose to withdraw from the proposed grouping and seek separate independent status. Jamaicans feared that their comparatively prosperous island would be expected to bear a large part of the tax burden required to support the Federation government and the smaller non-viable islands. Sir Alexander's Jamaican Labor Party, the "out" party at the time of the referendum, equated federation with the ambitions of then Premier Norman Manley, leader of the People's National Party. While there are no prospects for the revival of a Federation in the near term, it is desirable to encourage cooperation between the islands in the hope that in time some form of regional association contribution to stability will evolve.

Representatives of the Jamaican Government, the opposition, and British colonial officials met in London in February 1962, agreed to a constitution, and set a time-table for the granting of independence. This Jamaican independence conference was held in an atmosphere of cordiality and cooperation. From it emerged a thoughtful and careful draft constitution, well endowed with heavily entrenched safeguards to protect personal and property rights. It was accepted without serious reservation by all participants at the conference.

On April 10, a general election was held. The hotly contested campaign pitted Premier Norman Manley against his cousin and ancient rival, Sir Alexander Bustamante. In a close contest which saw the two major parties separated by 1% of the total popular vote, Sir Alexander returned to power after 7 years of eclipse, with a seven-vote majority in the Assembly. Between them the two major parties accounted for almost 99% of the total vote. The remainder was spread among various independents and a racist third party which failed to attract either adherents or serious attention.

Politically Jamaica approaches independence with the basis of a two-party system firmly laid. However, each of the two major parties is the personal vehicle of a colorful, aging political figure. A struggle for succession within each party is expected on the passing of its leader. During such a struggle, it is possible that both the Jamaican Labor Party of 78 year-old Sir Alexander Bustamante, and the People's National Party of 68 year-old Norman Manley, could fragment.

As it approaches independence Jamaica has certain assets in its favor: a well-trained Civil Service; experience in self-government; a comparatively prosperous economy; and a determination to succeed. Against these must be ranged certain deficiencies. Economically Jamaica depends heavily on commodities and tourism; the latter is a fickle source of income which can be seriously damaged by political instability. Jamaica's commodities, on the other hand, have previously entered the protected U.K. market and will surely be affected if Britain enters the Common Market. Jamaicans recognize the tenuous aspect of the island's economy and are determined to buttress it by diversification and investment incentives.

Defense concerns, both internal and external, trouble the Jamaicans. On the one hand, the government fortunately is reluctant to expend large sums for the support of a defense force, and yet, with the withdrawal of British troops, the Jamaican authorities realize that a force of some sort will be required.

Internal disturbances are not anticipated and yet can not be discounted because of the possibility of subversive activity by communists or racists. Externally, the threat posed by Cuba is the main preoccupation. Traditionally the Jamaicans have worked in the cane and tobacco fields of Cuba, and nationals in the number of 40 to 50 thousand are at present employed there. Their presence confronts the new government with a dilemma and will almost surely require the maintenance of consular relations between the two countries to ensure the provision of citizenship and protective services. Despite press reports and stories by returning visitors, we do not believe there is a significant communist movement on the island at this time.

Premier Bustamante's great interest is in politics, and he tends to disdain detail. His call will not in all likelihood be devoted to any exhaustive bilateral exchanges. At his present stage in life he experiences periodically difficulty in concentration. He has asked that his three ministers, who are accompanying him, be included in this call. Because one of them will almost surely succeed Bustamante should he, as has been widely rumored, abandon the Premiership soon after independence to become Governor General of Jamaica, it is considered advisable to include them.

The following bilateral problems may be touched on:

Organization of American States

Jamaica has announced its intention to apply for admission in the OAS immediately after independence. We favor Jamaica's candidacy and will support it, although we feel it inappropriate to appear to sponsor Jamaica for admission.

Defense Treaty with the United States

Should Sir Alexander raise again his request for a defense treaty with the U.S., we should restate our belief that the island's security could be best preserved by membership in the OAS and adherence to the Rio Treaty. As an OAS member, Jamaica could also participate in hemispheric collective security planning, e.g., the Inter-American Defense Board. He should also be reminded that after independence, the U.S. would be prepared to extend oral assurances similar to those given several OAS members in the Caribbean to come to its aid if it is a victim of direct attack and to take steps to assist it to deal with indirect communist aggression.

Aid Levels

The Premier may request an indication of progress on present aid proposals and an idea of post-independence U.S. aid. In addition to a program of technical assistance, the U.S. is now preparing to finance a rural water supply loan and a low-cost housing loan. The water loan is awaiting final U.S. approval and should be ready for signing within a few days. Final action on the housing loan is expected within four to six weeks. As to the future, once Jamaica joins the OAS, it will be eligible to participate fully in the Alliance for Progress. We are prepared to assist Jamaica's efforts within the concept of the Alliance. Upon becoming a member of the OAS we suggest Jamaica as the first step ask the panel of experts of the OAS to study its development plan. We would look favorably on I.D.B. financing and will consider other requests for assistance within the Alliance framework. We stand ready to continue to assist the Government of Jamaica to develop projects so that it can seek funds from various lending agencies. (Because of our balance of payments difficulties and other heavy demands on AID funds, we should be careful not to create excessive expectations.)

Sugar

Jamaica has benefited from the reallocation of the former Cuban quota. Under the terms of the bill reported out of the House Agriculture Committee, Jamaica, as a member of the West Indies Sugar Association, would benefit from a permanent quota of 100,000 tons per year, plus a temporary quota of 150,000 tons drawn from the Cuban quota reallocation assigned to the Association. Bustamante may press for a separate Jamaican quota, offering to withdraw from the West Indies Sugar Association. The House bill, as reported, is at variance with the Administration's proposals. It should be pointed out to Bustamante that the West Indies would fare quite well under the terms of the House bill, that final legislation, however, is as yet undecided, and that the establishment of a separate Jamaican quota at this time would seem inopportune.

Bauxite

Jamaica has been supplying the U.S. with bauxite for stockpiling purposes under the barter program. Sir Alexander may press for a continuation of these purchases, citing as a reason the impact of their suspension on the economy of newly-independent Jamaica. It is suggested that Sir Alexander be informed that the entire stockpiling program is now under critical review by the U.S. and that until this has been concluded and a policy established, it will not be possible to make any commitments as to future barter possibilities.

Immigration

On attaining independence, Jamaica will become the only country in the Western Hemisphere not assigned non-quota status. Its quota will be 100 per year. Already this has become a domestic political issue, ex-Premier Manley having raised the question of a "double standard" in the Assembly.

We have recognized the importance from a foreign policy point of view of placing Jamaica and all other independent areas within the Western Hemisphere on an equal footing.

We are seeking the Attorney General's concurrence in a legislative proposal to be submitted to the 88th Congress which would eliminate quantitative controls on their immigration to the U.S. They would, as all other immigrants, remain subject to qualitative controls.

Concurrences:

ARA—Mr. Day
 Mr. Spencer
 AID —Mr. Martin
 SCA —Mr. Clattenberg
 E —Mr. Callanan
 Mr. Gabbert

173. Memorandum of conversation between President Kennedy and Premier Bustamante, and other U.S. and Jamaican officials, June 27¹

June 27, 1962

SUBJECT

Call of the Premier of Jamaica on the President

PARTICIPANTS

United States

The President

U. Alexis Johnson, Deputy Under Secretary for Political Affairs

William C. Burdett, Acting Deputy Assistant Secretary for European Affairs

John R. Burke, Desk Officer, Jamaican Affairs, BNA

Jamaica

Sir Alexander Bustamante, Premier

Donald B. Sangster, Minister of Finance

Robert C. Lightbourne, Minister of Trade and Industry

Edward P. Seaga, Minister of Development and Welfare

The President opened the discussion by welcoming Premier Bustamante and his ministers to Washington. In response, Sir Alexander indicated that he was not a stranger to the United States, that he had lived for several years in Boston, and that he had left the U.S. in 1932.

The President initiated the substantive portion of the discussion by asking a series of questions concerning unemployment in Jamaica, emmigration, and the effect of the Common Market. In response to these inquiries, Sir Alexander informed the President that unfortunately, 18% of the available labor force was unemployed. This figure had been fairly consistent for the last few years. He noted that emmigration was related to unemployment, and that several thousand Jamaicans had been migrating each year to the United Kingdom. Regarding the Common Market, the Premier stated he did not know the effect it would have in Jamaica but that he “feared it”. Probing on the effect of the Common Market, the President asked about the future of Jamaican commodities, such as sugar and coffee. Mr. Sangster observed that it might in the long run prove an aid for Jamaican commodities if Jamaica were accorded the same preference within the Common Market as had been given former African colonies of France. However, he, too, agreed with the Premier, and was backed by Mr. Lightbourne, that prognostications on this subject were chancey.

¹ Economic situation in Jamaica; future of the Caribbean; West Indies; independence; emigration; migratory workers; sugar; tobacco production; AID project. Secret. 6 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Jamaica, 1961–62.

The President then inquired of the Premier his views regarding the future of the Caribbean. Sir Alexander stated that Trinidad would, after independence, become a viable unit and would survive. He felt that the "eight" would become a political unit, perhaps achieve independence, but would "forever" be in need of assistance from the U.K. Mr. Lightbourne predicted that one day a form of federation would probably evolve which might include Trinidad and the "little eight".

Under Secretary Johnson interjected a question regarding British Guiana, to which the Premier replied that "Cheddi is a law unto himself". The President then observed that there was a heavy percentage of people of East Indian origin in Trinidad. He wondered if this percentage might one day gain political control in Trinidad and what effect this might have on British Guiana's future relations with Trinidad and the "little eight".

The discussion turned to future links between Jamaica and the other islands of the West Indies. Sir Alexander stated that they would naturally share services, such as an airline, shipping companies, etc. However, he emphasized with some vigor his belief that Jamaica's natural affinity was not toward the other islands of the Caribbean, but rather to Canada and the United States. "After all", he stated, "Trinidad is 1200 miles from Jamaica." The President remarked that California was over 2,000 miles from the east coast of the United States. Sangster interjected that this was, however, a land separation as opposed to a sea separation, in response to which the President mused that often-times seas tended to unite political units rather than separate them, and the ease of transport they provided was superior to that which land could afford.

The President asked about the importance of tourism to the economy of Jamaica. Sir Alexander replied that it meant 11.5 million pounds annually to the island, and Mr. Sangster noted that this was approximately 15% of Jamaica's income. As to its future, Mr. Lightbourne reported that in recent years, though the number of tourists had gone up, the income derived had remained at approximately the same level.

Mr. Lightbourne then launched on a lengthy litany of Jamaica's problems on the eve of independence. Sir Alexander interrupted and provided by way of preface the remark, "But, Mr. President, you are tired of hearing about other people's problems." Mr. Lightbourne continued his résumé, dealing first of all in some detail with the subject of sugar, pointing out that the fluctuation in this one commodity had an important effect in Jamaica in view of the fact that 40% of the money realized from its sale actually reached the cane field workers in the form of wages (some 100,000 Jamaicans are employed in sugar production). He also alluded to the problems which would be raised if U.S. purchases of bauxite in Jamaica were suspended. The President remarked that upon joining the Organization of American States, participation in the Alliance for Progress would be available to Jamaica and that this might provide an avenue to work out the resolution of these problems. Sir Alexander expressed the fear that the OAS might not admit Jamaica. He noted that Guatemala seemed to have reservations about Jamaica's candidacy. The President thereupon asked Mr. Johnson what machinery existed for the admission of new members into the OAS. Mr. Johnson informed the President that no machinery existed, and that as a matter of fact this question was now being discussed within the Council of the OAS. Sir Alexander interposed at this point the statement that Jamaica had made an irrevocable decision to commit itself to the side of the West, implying that this decision would not be affected even if Jamaica did not become a member.

Minister Seaga then began a brief review of the ten-year plan which the Jamaican Government hoped to follow in the decade after independence. He described it as a modest plan, based on their statistics for the past ten years. A growth rate of 7% per annum had been projected (4½% real rate after population growth had been taken into account). He pointed out that no sugar acreage increase was being programmed. However, allowance was being made for a 1% increase to be realized from technological progress. (Mr. Seaga digressed to restate the Jamaican case on the importance of the sugar industry to the island, emphasizing the point that a significant fraction of the income reached directly to the lowest strata of farm worker.) Continuing with his exposé of the ten-year plan, Mr. Seaga referred to the question of bauxite, explaining that few workers were involved in this extractive industry and that its importance for Jamaica was as a government revenue resource.

Mr. Seaga stated that immigration also would be an important factor in the ten-year plan. He noted that in the past an average of 22,000 Jamaicans had gone to the United Kingdom each year. This had eased the unemployment problem and had provided remittances which helped the balance of payments. Now, however, the recently enacted Commonwealth immigration bill would seriously hamper any future immigration flow to the U.K. Jamaica had nevertheless allowed in its ten-year plan for an annual outflow of 10,000 people. This could only be realized if the United States were to relax its immigration laws vis-à-vis an independent Jamaica and accorded the island non-quota status. He wished to draw this to the President's attention, pointing out that under existing U.S. law Jamaica would have a quota of only 100 after independence and would not enjoy equal status with other independent Western Hemispheric countries.

In reply, the President pointed out that the immigration problem was a complex one and involved Congressional action. The President promised that the Administration would think about this problem.

Ministers Sangster and Seaga then raised the question of migratory workers. Mr. Seaga referred briefly to the existing arrangement whereby several thousand Jamaicans came annually to the U.S. (mainly to Florida and the other states on the eastern seaboard) to work as migrant laborers. This arrangement had worked quite well in the past and had furnished a source of income for the island in the form of remittances. There was now a fear, however, that the recently enacted Mexican law which limited the period a migrant worker could be employed continuously in the United States to 210 days, would be invoked against Jamaica's laborers. This would cause many problems, particularly in view of the fact that it was more costly for a Jamaican laborer to travel to and from the U.S., thus making it only marginally profitable to him if he were forced to reside and work for a period of less than 210 days. Mr. Johnson informed the President that this subject was being taken up with Secretary of Labor Goldberg at a later appointment, and the President said that he would like a memorandum on the matter.

The Premier reverted once again to the question of sugar. He pointed out that the free market price for sugar at approximately £22 per ton was an economic impossibility for Jamaica where production costs dictated a price of almost £32 per ton. It was absolutely essential therefore that Jamaica enter restricted markets at preferred prices or the entire sugar industry, which meant so much to the island's economy and its workers, would be seriously shaken. He outlined to the President the importance of the Bustamante Industrial Trades Union which he headed and which was the political base for his party. Its nucleus was made up of the sugar workers and he knew from personal experience that a disruption of the sugar industry would have profound political implications for Jamaica.

The President then brought up the subject of tobacco production in Jamaica and inquired as to whether Jamaica could duplicate the Havana cigar. Mr. Lightbourne stated that not only could Jamaica duplicate it, but could produce a cigar of superior quality to those made in Cuba. A discussion of types of tobacco leaf then ensued which was concluded with an expression of interest on the part of the Jamaican delegation in exploring the possibility of an American market for quality Jamaican cigars.

Next, the Premier gave expression to a fear he had regarding a Russian effort to block Jamaica's entry into the United Nations. This move would be in retaliation to Jamaica's reaction to a recent visit by Russian trawlers to Kingston. On their arrival the Premier had refused the crews permission to land because on a previous visit crew members had taken numerous pictures of the island. He ordered that supplies be given the vessels, but that contact with Jamaicans be limited to the minimum required to complete the supply operation. This, he emphasized, was part of his feeling on the general question of communism and his decision to commit his Government to the side of the West.

Minister Lightbourne mentioned a project which would, in his view, be of benefit to the Jamaican economy. He asked U.S. consideration for the establishment of a USDA inspection station in Jamaica so that truck farm produce could be shipped to the U.S. He noted that Cuba had in the past enjoyed a fairly lively trade of this type and it was Jamaica's hope to capture some of the market now left vacant. It was noted by the President that the Jamaican group would be having discussions with the Department of Agriculture on this point and he asked that a memorandum be prepared for him.

Mr. Lightbourne then embarked on a strong plea for an AID project in connection with the development of Jamaica's harbor. He pointed out the inadequacies of existing facilities, the potential of the harbor, and the existence of a detailed 1954 survey which could be brought up to date with very little additional work. He also pointed out that Jamaica had a very obvious strategic importance which could grow within the next few years. It was important, he stated, that after independence the people be given the idea that Jamaica was moving ahead. They would, he stated be willing to make sacrifices, but they must be presented with tangible goals and the hope of their achievement. He asked for U.S. assistance on this project.

Mr. Johnson suggested that funds for this development might be obtained from various international lending agencies, such as the IDB, but Ministers Sangster and Lightbourne indicated that prospects were not bright because of fears in the money marts regarding the future of Jamaica. The President inquired whether British assistance would be available; the Premier and his ministers were quite pessimistic on this point, fearing that British assistance would be negligible after independence. Mr. Lightbourne observed that many ill-timed problems were plaguing Jamaica on the eve of independence: the unsettled sugar market; bauxite and the stockpiling investigations; Britain's balance of payment ills. The President expressed sympathy for Jamaica's problems and he suggested that they bring these matters up in their talks with Mr. Moscoso and his assistants at the Agency for International Development. However, he pointed out that America's commitment was a global one and that resources were already spread thin. Nevertheless he assured the Jamaicans that the U.S. would do what it could in so far as commitments and resources would permit.

Sir Alexander told the President in strong terms that if the United States should ever desire to reactivate its air base in Jamaica, it was there for the nation's use. Minister Sangster underlined this offer. Minister Sangster went on to thank the President for the dispatch of a Peace Corps contingent to Jamaica and informed the President that the Corpsmen had arrived, were on station, and that it was anticipated that excellent results would accrue from their presence.

The interview concluded with the President thanking the Premier and his ministers for their call and with mutual expressions of good will.

174. Memorandum from Moscoso to McGeorge Bundy, July 12¹

July 12, 1962

SUBJECT

Aid Program in Jamaica

In response to the President's request for information concerning our aid program in Jamaica, I submit the following:

1. The U.S. program, initiated in 1955, has been largely limited to technical cooperation in the fields of agriculture, health and education, and the average annual U.S. contribution approximated $300,000 through 1961.

The FY 1962 program included $2.2 million for a water supply loan, $2.2 million for a low cost housing loan, and $1.0 million grant for the continuation of technical assistance in agriculture, education and industrial development.

2. The FY 1963 Congressional presentation contains $1.0 million for grants to Jamaica to cover the continuing costs of the general technical cooperation effort.

3. The first indication of GOJ's desire for a loan for Kingston port development arose with the recent visit of the Jamaican Premier and his delegation, and was mentioned by Minister Lightbourne in the meeting with Mr. Hamilton on June 26. Minister Lightbourne gave the port a higher priority than was accorded by the other members of the group. No loan application has been submitted by the GOJ. I presented Mr. Lightbourne with a brochure on port development in Puerto Rico, hoping that this would be helpful in analyzing his problem. I mentioned on one occasion the possibility of the creation of a port authority as well as financing by floating bonds in the open market. I also informed Mr. Lightbourne that I was willing to have my engineers examine his port plan made some years ago.

¹ Aid program in Jamaica. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Jamaica, 1961-62.

We stressed that A.I.D. resources were limited and that Jamaica would of necessity have to approach other lending sources for development needs, explaining that A.I.D. was the bank of last resort. When the question was raised as to whether the U.S. could provide general financing for the new development plan, still in preliminary form, I urged that Jamaica, desiring to join the O.A.S., while here meet with the O.A.S. and present a copy of their plan for informal examination by the Nine Wise Men. As a result, the financial members of the delegation met with Dr. Saar and left their plan for informal examination.

The Delegation was informed that the water supply loan had received full consideration and was about to be approved, with the documentation of the housing loan to be completed within the next several weeks.

I informed the visitors that they were in many ways much further advanced from the standpoint of planning, as well as economic progress, than many of the Latin American countries and that with their relative prosperity it seemed likely that their potential for borrowing from international agencies and other sources was greater than many Latin American countries now competing for A.I.D. assistance.

Teodoro Moscoso

175. Memorandum from Rusk to President Kennedy, July 19¹

July 19, 1962

SUBJECT

Establishment of an Embassy at Kingston, Jamaica

Jamaica will become an independent nation within the British Commonwealth on August 6, 1962. It will be a Monarchy with Queen Elizabeth as the Sovereign.

Jamaica is to be the first newly independent nation in the Western Hemisphere in almost 60 years. The original concept of a West Indies Federation envisaged Jamaica an important element. However, in September 1961 the Jamaican people, by referendum, withdrew, preferring separate, independent nationhood instead.

¹ Establishment of an Embassy at Kingston, Jamaica. No classification marking. 1 p. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Jamaica, 1961–62.

Jamaica is attaining independence without rancor or strife and is expected to continue its cultural orientation toward the United Kingdom. However, since the United Kingdom has made it clear that only limited financial, political and military support can be granted it is obvious that the new country will look increasingly toward the United States as its ties weaken with the Mother Country.

I recommend that the United States recognize Jamaica and that we elevate our Consulate General at Kingston to the rank of Embassy on August 6, 1962. This has been our practice in recent years in our relationships with other friendly countries as they have become independent. Upon your approval of the establishment of an Embassy at Kingston, the Department will take the action required to insure it is open on the date of independence.

Dean Rusk

176. Strategy Statement for Jamaica, February 15¹

February 15, 1963

1961 and 1962 were poor years for Jamaica. Economic growth levelled off as the heavy investment of earlier years declined. Remittances abroad from the bauxite industries increased. Other major opportunity areas for investment have not appeared. When identified, heavy GOJ investment to make them feasible may be required.

At least part of the difficulty is of Jamaica's own making. For instance, the lagging construction industry was further demoralized by the Allen Award, a large pay raise to construction workers made retroactive for six months. It is symptomatic of the pressure on the labor government.

Somewhat less vulnerable to criticism is Jamaica's understandable lack of experience in dealing with international lending agencies. The essential justification for project credits has apparently not been sufficient. There is reason to believe some international agencies would give favorable consideration to good projects.

Today, the GOJ faces an expanding population which no longer has easy access to Great Britain as restrictions on Commonwealth migration come into effect. The economy of the country is narrowly based. The people are clamoring for a better living. The government faces difficult decisions on the use of its limited resources and like any other country, cannot always apply them for economic purposes. Opportunities for investment are both less obvious and less appealing. The government has no choice but to increase infrastructure and other forms of capital investment if it hopes to achieve again higher rates of growth and satisfy the demands of the electorate.

¹ Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Jamaica, 1962-63.

Despite its problems, Jamaica has accomplished much. It is a working democracy. Taxes are progressive. Government standards are high. Education is relatively widespread. Communist influence has been held to a minimum. It has just become a member of the U.N., I.B.R.D., and I.M.F.

C. Strategy

Current U.S. strategy for the transition period as Jamaica moves from colonial status into full self reliant independence is to help Jamaica attain economic viability and to improve social conditions. Also, it is to move her into full participation in the inter-American system through the O.A.S. These efforts on the part of the U.S. should help restore outside confidence in the future of Jamaica. The recently concluded investment guaranties agreement should help to attract U.S. investment.

A.I.D. will attempt to counsel the GOJ on establishing a modern monetary system, and on the best methods to secure funds abroad. To this end, A.I.D. will assist in the preparation of documentation necessary to favorable consideration of loans from outside sources. A.I.D. will also help finance feasibility studies which might lead to new investment.

Rural areas of Jamaica, in which half the population lives, are relatively depressed. A.I.D. will apply resources to the agricultural sector, provided the loan now under consideration is not negotiated in FY 1963. The aim is to increase food production for domestic consumption. A.I.D. will continue the rural water program if alternative financing is not available. This program is designed to provide an easy and safe supply of water to the rural people for the first time. Development lending assistance in the future will be provided on hard terms.

In addition, A.I.D. will continue its efforts to help increase the productivity of small industries and attract private capital to industry through the Investment Guaranty Program.

D. Goals

Proposed funding range: Development Grants $675,000, Development Loans, $4,000,000.

1. Support GOJ efforts to increase domestic food production in certain lines by 50% in five years.

2. Support GOJ efforts towards industrial development with the aim of a 5% annual increase in industrial product.

This statement may be used, until further notice, as the basis for preparing the Congressional Presentation. Further revisions may be necessary before its issuance as Agency guidance.

D.E. Bell
Administrator

177. Plan of Action for Jamaica beginning June 1¹

June 1, 1963

JAMAICA

Plan of Action for the Period Beginning June 1, 1963

(Approved by Latin American Policy Committee
May 29, 1963)

A. Basic Approach

Jamaica, although newly independent, has impressive political assets: stable democratic government based on a two party system, responsible political leadership, an impartial even-handed judicial system backed by a traditional respect for law and order, and, a capable professional civil service. The outlook for continued political stability is clouded, however, by a decline in the rate of economic growth accompanied by high unemployment resulting from a rapid increase in the population and reductions in emigration opportunities.

Externally, the country has openly aligned itself with the West and, although a member of the British Commonwealth, has tended increasingly to look to the United States rather than the United Kingdom for protection and assistance.

Basic factors conditioning United States policy towards Jamaica are (1) the island's strategic location, (2) its position as the world's largest bauxite producer, and (3) the desirability of supporting and strengthening the country's present political stability and pro-Western orientation especially during the critical early years of independence.

¹ Secret. 11 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Jamaica, 1962-63.

B. The Present Situation

1. Political

Following the advent of universal suffrage in 1944, Jamaica's political life has polarized around two major parties—the incumbent Jamaica Labor Party (JLP) and the Peoples National Party (PNP). They have much in common: each has controlled the Government, each is dominated by a strong-willed leader (Sir Alexander Bustamante of the JLP and Norman Manley of the PNP) and each is based on a nation-wide trade union organization.

Other political groups reflecting special interests or extremist views have so far attracted little support and have no representation in the legislature. There is no Communist party and front organizations are relatively weak.

The major problem confronting the government at present is a disturbingly high level of unemployment estimated at between 15 and 20 per cent of the labor force. The rate is even higher among urban youth where one-quarter to one-third cannot find jobs. The frustration and bitterness arising from unemployment are augmented by uneven economic development and the visibly unequal distribution of wealth.

Dissident elements are at present poorly organized. The main group is the Rastafarians consisting of several loosely joined sects—estimated to number about 12,000—dedicated to Negro superiority and professing the idea of returning to Africa. They form a potentially explosive group vulnerable to exploitation by any elements which might wish to precipitate violence against the government.

Other dissident organizations are the Socialist Party of Jamaica and the Unemployed Workers Council—Communist front organizations with a small membership of less than 200 each. The UWC, however, probably could attract the support of substantial numbers of jobless workers.

The Bustamante government since it assumed power in April 1962 has made little progress in restoring the nation's economic momentum or in alleviating the social and political pressures arising from unemployment. The broad outlines of the JLP program have only recently been announced; and, the government's revised national economic development plan which will specify how the program is to be achieved will not be ready for cabinet consideration until later this summer.

At the same time, the opposition PNP has confined itself to the role of political critic and obstructionist and done little to spur the government into action by recommending specific policy lines.

2. Economic

With 1.7 million inhabitants in an area of 4410 square miles Jamaica is one of the more densely populated nations in the Western Hemisphere. Until recently it has also recorded one of the highest rates of economic growth. During the period 1953–57 real gross national product rose by an average of almost 10 per cent per annum with the average annual per capita increase ranging around eight per cent. Since 1957, however, the rate of growth has dropped sharply averaging slightly over three per cent annually during 1958–61. With the population increasing almost two per cent per annum the average yearly rise in per capita GNP during this period was only a little more than one per cent. Provisional figures for 1962 reflect an increase in GNP at current prices of only about 2.4 per cent.

Much of the impetus to Jamaica's extremely rapid development prior to 1957 came from large American and Canadian investments in the bauxite industry combined with both foreign and local investment in hotels and other facilities for the booming tourist trade. These developments were accompanied by notable changes in the structure of the island's economy.

The mining sector was insignificant prior to 1953. Due to heavy investment in bauxite industry during the mid-1950's, however, mining since 1957 has accounted for nine per cent of the nation's gross domestic product. Bauxite and alumina together now provide 50 per cent of Jamaica's total export values, 20 per cent of the government's tax receipts and well paid employment for about 5,000 persons. The industry still continues to grow but at a much slower pace.

At the same time that the mining sector expanded, the share of total domestic output contributed by agriculture declined from 21 per cent in 1953 to 13 per cent in the period since 1957. Agriculture is more important than these figures suggest, however, since nearly one million persons out of the total population of 1.7 million live on farms. The agricultural sector also accounts for about 40 per cent of total exports.

The product of the banking, insurance, and real estate sector almost doubled during the 1953–57 period from less than three per cent to five per cent of the total in response to a higher level of economic activity and the expanding tourist industry. Tourism now provides employment for an estimated 11,000 persons and foreign exchange earnings of 34–38 million. For the past two years, however, tourism has tended to decline. In 1962 the number of visitors was almost eight per cent less than in 1961.

Manufacturing, based largely on processing of agricultural raw materials, has accounted for 13–14 per cent of Jamaica's gross domestic product throughout the 1953–61 period. There is some small manufacturing or assembling for the local market in such fields as clothing, footwear, and building materials. Under industrial incentive laws Jamaica since 1952 has managed to encourage establishment of firms which at the end of 1961 gave employment to about 5,000 workers. A majority of these workers were in American owned firms producing cotton textiles for the United States market.

During 1957–61 Jamaica has incurred a substantial current account deficit in its balance of payments, the cumulative total amounting to $152 million or an average of $30 million per year. The deficit dropped from 33 million in 1960 to $12 million in 1961 due mainly to a decline in the normally adverse trade balance. Preliminary figures for 1962, however, reflect an increase in the deficit to $17 million as a result of lower earnings from tourism and some deterioration in visible trade. These deficits have been financed through direct private investment, government borrowing, and an inflow of short-term money through banks and consumer credit companies.

At the end of 1962 Jamaica's foreign exchange assets totalled roughly $95 million compared to $87 million in 1961. These figures, however, are not a direct measure of the country's capacity to finance balance of payments deficits due to the operation of the sterling exchange standard under which commercial banks look primarily to their head offices in other countries rather than the Bank of Jamaica for liquidity in sterling.

Jamaica's record of self-help is good. Developmental planning and budgeting are long-established techniques. Jamaican business invests in Jamaica and the government has done well in mobilizing domestic capital through bond issues and an effective tax system. Both political parties have cooperated in maintaining an attractive climate for foreign investment and a reputation for fiscal responsibility.

3. Foreign Policy

Prime Minister Bustamante, who is also Minister of External Affairs, has defined Jamaica's foreign policy as anti-Communist and pro-Western. He has not elaborated on this simple formula.

Jamaica has not exchanged diplomatic missions with any Communist bloc country although it does permit a Cuban consulate, established prior to independence, to continue to operate in Kingston primarily because of concern over the welfare of the roughly 20,000 Jamaicans living in Cuba.

Aware that the United Kingdom is no longer willing to assure major economic or military commitments in the Caribbean, Jamaica has tended increasingly to turn to the United States. During the Cuban crisis, Prime Minister Bustamante publicly endorsed the steps announced by the President to force removal of Soviet offensive weapons. At the same time, he granted permission for United States ships and aircraft to utilize Jamaican ports and air fields. Bustamante has also cooperated by rejecting requests for air travel to or from Cuba via Jamaica. The United States in turn has given unpublicized oral assurances that it will come to Jamaica's aid in the event of enemy attack and has also agreed to provide a one-time package of military equipment to increase the Jamaican Defense Force's capability for surveillance of the island's coast, 90 miles from Cuba.

Independent for less than one year, Jamaica is attempting to establish its position in the international community and at the same time cope with difficult problems of economic development. As a result, Jamaican government officials tend to be jittery if not panicky. Unfortunately, the United States has added to their sense of unease during recent months through the following negative actions:

(a) Equivocal replies to the Jamaican Government's request for amendment of the United States immigration laws to accord Jamaica (and Trinidad) the same nonquota status enjoyed by all of the other independent nations of the Western Hemisphere;

(b) Imposition of restraints on three categories of Jamaican cotton textile exports to the United States and a request for restraints on two additional categories;

(c) Inability so far to respond to Jamaica's request for continuation of the program under which the United States has bartered agricultural surpluses for bauxite since 1955;

(d) Denial of a request from the Prime Minister for a $25 million loan for development projects which the Jamaican Government considered essential to the country's reasonable progress;

(e) Refusal to grant a waiver of United States procurement to permit the pipe required for an AID financed water resource project to be purchased in Mexico at a saving of about 40 per cent;

(f) Denial of an application for an agricultural credit loan; and

(g) Slow progress in efforts to secure Jamaica's admission in the Organization of American States.

In addition, confidential portions of the Clay report recommend that AID assistance be phased out completely in Jamaica (as well as Trinidad) while continuing it in Latin America.

Taken as a whole, these events indicate a trend which if unchecked could have an unhealthy impact on the present good political relations between the two countries. To the Jamaicans it would appear that despite their open alignment with the United States and the West and despite their excellent record of self-help and responsible government the United States proposed to deny them both aid and trade.

C. Objectives

1. Retention under favorable conditions of the right of United States military vessels and aircraft to utilize Jamaican ports and air fields.

2. Maintenance of politically stable democratic government friendly to the United States.

3. Integration of Jamaica into the political and economic institutions of the Western Hemisphere and meanwhile cooperation in matters connected with Cuba.

4. [illegible in the original]

5. [illegible in the original] in maintaining an adequate rate of economic growth as a basis for [illegible in the original] social progress and political stability.

6. [illegible in the original] of the Jamaican Defense Force to remain a pro-Western oriented, apolitical [illegible in the original] in support of the democratic constitutional government.

D. Lines of Action

[illegible in the original]

1. Take all possible steps within the Organization of American States to establish proceedings for the submission of new members which will permit Jamaica to join a [illegible in the original]. (Action: State)

2. Participation in the Alliance for Progress

[illegible in the original] without delay Jamaica's full participation in the Alliance for Progress as soon as it becomes a member of the OAS, including access to all [illegible in the original] financing under the terms and conditions that are applied to [illegible in the original] countries of the Hemisphere. In the meantime, apply Alliance criteria to the greatest extent practicable in United States bilateral relations with Jamaica. (Action: AID, State, USIA)

3. Amendment of U.S. Immigration Laws

[illegible in the original] for amendment of the U.S. Immigration and Nationality Act to accord Jamaica (as well as Trinidad and Tobago) the same nonquota status that is enjoyed by the other independent nations of the Western Hemisphere. (Action: State)

4. Military

(a) Expedite delivery of the military equipment requested by Jamaica to strengthen its coastal surveillance capability. (Action: Defense, AID, State)

(b) Maintain liaison with the officials of the Jamaican Defense Force and provide advice and assistance as may be requested and appropriate. (Action: Defense, State, AID)

5. Foreign Policy

[illegible in the original] into the OAS and consistent with our security requirements and diplomatic practice insofar as possible treat the Government of Jamaica as if it were a member of the OAS and consult Jamaica in advance of all United States policy developments affecting Latin America and the Caribbean. Insofar as possible, accord Jamaica the same treatment we accord Latin American countries with respect to matters pending before the United Nations.

6. Bauxite-Barter Program

In view of (a) Jamaica's serious unemployment problem; (b) the importance of bauxite in the Jamaican economy; and (c) the fact that the barter program has been in effect since 1955 and that it therefore would be particularly inappropriate to terminate it abruptly during Jamaica's first year of independence, recommend to the responsible United States authorities that the program be continued for an additional year and that at the same time the Jamaicans be notified that no further extensions can be expected unless justified on the basis of United States stockpile requirements. (Action: State, AID)

7. Restraints on Jamaican Cotton Textile Exports

Recommend to the Inter-Agency Textile Advisory Committee that restraints imposed on Jamaica's cotton textile exports be set at as high a level as possible, taking into account the necessity of maintaining a reasonable degree of consistency with restraint actions requested in the case of other countries. (Action: State, AID)

8. Internal Security

Continue the close relationships maintained with Jamaican security officials [4½ lines not declassified]. (Action: [less than 1 line not declassified] State)

9. Economic Development Planning

Encourage the Jamaican Government to accelerate formulation of its long-term development plan and to include national goals that are compatible with Alliance for Progress criteria. Further, encourage the Government to submit the plan when completed to the IBRD for review. (Action: AID, State, Country Team)

10. Technical Assistance

Give sympathetic consideration to Jamaican requests for technical assistance in such key fields as education, agricultural and industrial development, transportation and labor relations. Offer to assist the Government of Jamaica in the preparation of feasibility studies for economic development projects. (Action: AID, State, Country Team)

11. Private Investment

Support the Government's efforts to attract foreign private investment. Protect [illegible in the original] where appropriate joint ventures involving United States and Jamaican capital for investment in productive industrial or agricultural enterprise. (Action: AID, Commerce, State)

12. Public Affairs

Encourage the Government of Jamaica and the people of this newly independent nation to continue a policy of alignment with the West, strengthening their support for and belief in the democratic free enterprise system as the most logical base for economic progress and social justice. (Action: USIA, State, Defense, AID, Country Team)

13. Relations with the United Kingdom

Encourage the United Kingdom to continue its interest in Jamaica, including the economic or financial fields, and Jamaica to turn to the United Kingdom for private and public financing to the maximum extent possible. (Action: AID, State)

14. Labor Programs

Through such techniques as leader grants, technical assistance and worker education programs assist the leadership of the Jamaican labor movement to better understand labor economics and the legitimate rights and obligations of a free labor movement. (Action: AID, State, USIA, Country Team)

178. Memorandum of conversation, June 14, between Prime Minister Bustamante and President Kennedy and other U.S. and Jamaican officials¹

June 14, 1963

SUBJECT

Jamaica

PARTICIPANTS

Sir Alexander Bustamante—Prime Minister of Jamaica
Donald Sangster—Deputy Prime Minister and Finance Minister of Jamaica
Sir Neville Ashenheim—Ambassador of Jamaica

The President
Ambassador Doherty
Edwin M. Martin—Assistant Secretary, ARA

There was a preliminary exchange of pleasantries in which the Prime Minister emphasized how extensively Ambassador Doherty had gotten around among the people of all types in Jamaica and had become well-acquainted everywhere. He paid quite a tribute to him in this respect.

The President handed Bustamante the letter indicating the executive branch's endorsement of legislation to change the Jamaican quota. The Prime Minister expressed great appreciation for the letter. There was a brief discussion of how many people might come to the United States if the bars were lifted. The Prime Minister did not think the figures would be too large.

At the Prime Minister's request, Deputy Prime Minister Sangster outlined the new Jamaican development plan. He stressed that it would require about 100 million pounds of external resources over a five year period of which the Jamaicans thought they could secure 75 million pounds on relatively hard terms from various private and public sources. However, this left a gap of 25 million pounds which was needed on a soft basis with a low interest rate and with long terms and for which they must look to the United States.

The Prime Minister intervened to stress the importance of this and his concern that Ambassador Moscoso had expressed to him the opinion some time ago that Jamaica should be able to finance its development on essentially hard terms. The Prime Minister felt that with their unemployment problem and other difficulties this was just not a reasonable position.

¹ Jamaican quota; Jamaican development plan; Cuban refugees. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Jamaica, 1962-63.

The President asked Assistant Secretary Martin to comment. He said that the Prime Minister had seen Mr. Bell but that he did not know what Mr. Bell's thinking on this matter was. It was true, as he had said to the Prime Minister on a recent visit to Jamaica, that almost no other country in Latin America was able to borrow on private money markets of London and New York as Jamaica with its fine financial record was able to do and, with a general shortage of resources, this was a difference of which one had to take some account.

The President said that he hoped the Prime Minister would see Mr. Moscoso and discuss this difference of view with him. It was pointed out that they would be having lunch together and would do so.

The President went on to say that he would speak to Mr. Bell and send the Prime Minister a letter on what our situation was with respect to this request.

The President asked the Prime Minister whether they had any trouble with Cubans. The Prime Minister said they had a few refugees who had come there and whom they had not been able to pass along but that they stood firm on using Jamaica as a transit point. He said they had no use for Cubans and this was no problem for him. Ambassador Doherty reaffirmed the anti-Castro and pro-United States sentiment he felt everywhere in Jamaica and particularly in the Prime Minister's government.

Mexico

179. Letter from Edward G. Cale to Thomas C. Mann, February 14¹

February 14, 1961

Dear Tom:

We have been giving some careful thought to what the best method may be of handling our relations with Mexico in the present context of the change of Administration. As indicated in our cable 2048, we do not think that an early Presidential visit would be recommendable. Even though high level decisions may have already been reached, I think you should have the basis of our recommendation, as promised in the cable, and it is set forth in the attached memorandum.

I hope that our thinking here will be understood as aimed at constructive steps and that whatever final action results, we will be able to bring to the attention of yourself and your advisers the basis of the Embassy's thinking. Sending these thoughts in the form of a memorandum, rather than despatch, is intended to limit distribution and to avoid any controversial interpretation.

Sincerely yours,

Edward G. Cale
Chargé d'Affaires ad interim

Attachment

THE TACTICAL HANDLING OF RELATIONS WITH MEXICO

PROBLEM

What are the tactics most likely to produce more effective results in obtaining Mexico's acceptance and support of United States positions in 1961?

BACKGROUND

Relations between the United States and Mexico in the twentieth century have been, on the whole, unsatisfactory from the American point of view. This is due principally to the effects of the Mexican Revolution (1910–17), with its anti-foreign, nationalistic and socialistic objectives bound to clash with many legitimate American interests. The conflicts and quarrels which marred relations almost continuously until 1940 were considerably alleviated under the extraordinary circumstances of the war years 1941–46. A sustained and conscientious effort on the part of the United States, in the period 1947–60, brought some further improvement and closer understanding, without, however, removing many of the principal points of disagreement and divergence. In net result, the United States cannot count on Mexico's support in facing the major problems posed by Soviet-Communist expansion; in its bilateral relations, the over-all score does not amount to an accord mutually acceptable and satisfying.

¹ Transmits paper entitled "The Tactical Handling of Relations With Mexico." Secret. 7 pp. DOS, CF, 611.12/2-1461.

The United States effort to win Mexican friendship and support has been evidenced from the top levels of Government. Presidential visits are an outstanding example: President Miguel Alemán was invited to Washington in 1947, and his visit was reciprocated by President Truman in 1948; President Ruiz Cortines was the guest of President Eisenhower at the Falcon Dam in 1953, White Sulphur Springs in March, 1956, and the Panama Presidential Conference in July 1956. One week before his inauguration, President-elect López Mateos was visited by Senate Majority Leader Lyndon Johnson, in November, 1958, and President Eisenhower visited President Adolfo López Mateos at Acapulco in February, 1959 (less than three months after the Mexican President's inauguration) and was honored by the Mexican President's visit to the United States in October of the same year. Then, as a final gesture of friendship, President Eisenhower visited President López Mateos at the site of the new Amistad Dam on the Rio Grande, late in October, 1960.

Throughout this 13 year period, Mexico's economic needs have received most considerate attention from the United States Government. The record of loans and credits from United States Government agencies has left Mexico with no complaint, with the exception of the single area of petroleum development through the nationalized oil company PEMEX. Even in the latter instance, substantial private credits to specific PEMEX operations have contributed to the continued expansion of the Government's oil monopoly.

Mexico's complaints on United States trade policies, such as restrictions on minerals imports, have been dealt with most courteously and carefully, and special endeavors made to accommodate Mexico's needs, even at some sacrifice of our own. Mexico has been consulted on sales of U.S. surplus agricultural commodities, particularly cotton, in order not to disturb the rate of Mexico's own export sales. The benefits of the GATT have been extended to Mexico, even though Mexico is not a member, and by its own action terminated the bilateral trade agreement with the U.S. in 1949. American tourist trade to Mexico has received positive U.S. Government encouragement; Mexican history and culture, the advantages of investment, attractions of travel and residence in Mexico have been generously reported in the United States, with the direct cooperation and approval of our Government. Mexico's modest military requirements have been given maximum accommodation by our Department of Defense in terms of acquisitions and credits. A U.S. technical assistance program has been maintained in Mexico, its moderate size being influenced mainly by the wishes of the Mexican Government.

In international organizations, Mexico has been given special attention by the United States Delegations, in a general effort to gain for Mexico the recognition greatly desired. As typical examples, Ambassador Luis Padilla Nervo has had the backing of the United States for the various U.N. positions obtained by him, such as Chairman of the Disarmament Commission; Ambassador Sanchez Gavito has been elected President of the Council of the Organization of American States.

A ROUGH CHECK-LIST OF RECIPROCITY

Under specific areas of relations, the following must be noted:

(1) High Level Contacts: Deliberately and frequently sought by the United States, these have been treated with coyness by Mexico, usually deferred or delayed, and finally entered upon with a lack of spontaneity indicative of the absence of genuine interest. While creating a better public climate for official relations, their tangible results are very limited. The record of four direct meetings with President López Mateos (one with Senator Lyndon Johnson, three with President Eisenhower) proves conclusively that the Mexican Chief Executive is noncommittal (at times to the point of silence) and unresponsive in discussions of substantive matters of prime importance to the United States in its foreign relations. In his speech to the Nation on return from the United States in October, 1959, he made no reference to President Eisenhower, assured that no secret agreements had been reached, and proudly proclaimed he returned home with the Presidential sash covering his breast "unstained."

(2) Defense and Security Areas: The United States has offered the whole gamut of military cooperation to Mexico, which in response has only purchased relatively minor amounts of arms and military equipment. There are no United States military training missions of any kind in Mexico; no military assistance agreement; very limited (however, increasing) training of Mexican officers in the United States; and a complete absence of mutual defense arrangements. Even an Air Defense Intercept Zone (ADIZ) over a contiguous strip of Mexican territory, to protect our SAC bases and vital industrial areas in the south and southwest, has been effectively refused since 1954. Thus, while the United States spends billions for the complex series of defense bases and warning systems around the globe, its own “soft underbelly” lies completely exposed by the absence of any mutual defense arrangements in Mexico. The capabilities of the Mexican armed forces to play a responsible role in continental defense, under plans of the Inter-American Defense Board, are highly questionable. The Joint United States-Mexican Defense Commission is dormant, having held no working meeting for three years.

(3) Economic Cooperation: United States accommodation of Mexico’s credit requirements has indeed been reciprocated by an excellent repayment record on Mexico’s part; likewise, Mexican requests have been regarded as reasonable; Mexico in turn has handled its finances on a basis which has helped to stabilize its currency and resist the world-wide trend to inflation. But the fact that we have not generally linked our aid to our over-all objectives, surprises the astute Mexicans and gains us neither friendship nor respect.

At the same time, based chiefly on developments and political statements in Mexico in the latter half of 1960, there is growing concern among United States investors regarding the security of their position and there has been a certain slow-down in new credits and investments. Government acquisition of the electric power and movie industries has widened previous Government ownership in transportation, petroleum and other enterprises. Extra-legal pressures are being brought to bear on many new American companies to provide for Mexican control of the companies.

Problems faced by the principal American automobile companies, long established in Mexico, has raised with their managers doubts over their position in Mexico. A strongly nationalistic mining law, just published, requires Mexican control of mining companies if they are to receive much-needed reduction of taxes. Some Mexican businessmen who are friendly to the United States complain that our loans to state enterprises and our private credits which are used to finance the nationalization of Mexican industry are helping to undermine all private industry in Mexico. Top Government circles appear recently to have become aware of the reaction abroad (adversely affecting the attractive rating which Mexico enjoyed in international investment circles for more than a decade), to its policies and actions, referred to above, in the latter part of 1960. As a counteraction, the Administration within the last month has declared itself as recognizing the importance of, and its friendliness toward, private business. Nevertheless, the outlook is clouded and actions rather than words are needed if Mexico is to demonstrate its friendliness to private enterprise.

(4) International Relations: In spite of its extraordinary efforts to win Mexico’s confidence and support, the United States can count on neither in international organizations. In August, 1960, Mexico's Foreign Minister so worked against the United States at the two Meetings of Foreign Ministers of the American Republics at San José, Costa Rica, that Secretary Herter felt obliged to make vocal mention of Mexico's opposition to our objectives in handling the Cuban problem.

Barely perceptible is any change in Mexico's stubborn view of Castro as "a U.S.-Cuban quarrel;" the facts of Communist penetration, and Sino-Soviet threat to the Hemisphere, have been blindly ignored. Mexico keeps a pro-Castro leftist as its Ambassador in Habana, where great stock is made of Mexican support. Only in December, 1960, in a widely publicized ceremony, the Mexican Government made a gift of a complete school to Castro's regime; at the same time, school rooms are lacking for almost 40% of Mexico's own children, and funds for school maintenance are so lacking that the Government has to appeal to private organizations to undertake repairs. Castro's Communist Ambassador to Mexico is cordially received by the Government, and President López Mateos himself went out of his way to converse very cordially with him and the Soviet Ambassador at the New Year's Reception to the Diplomatic Corps, an attention extended to no other Chief of Mission.

In the United Nations, Mexico continues to adhere to an independent course of cool indifference to the position of the United States, frequently abstaining on vital questions, and standing out in the Latin American group as one of the few nations on which no reliance can be placed by the United States Delegation. In certain specific problems, such as the Law of the Sea, it may be recalled that Mexico worked arduously against the United States at the 1958 and 1960 Geneva Conferences, killing by a one-vote margin the U.S. endeavor to obtain a genuine compromise solution of the thorny question of the breadth of the territorial sea.

(5) Soviet-Communist Expansion: Mexico has given no visible cognizance to the problem of Soviet activities in the Western Hemisphere. The Soviet Embassy still operates with its bloated staff of 58 working members, in contrast to the total of five Mexicans in the Embassy in Moscow. Mexico as a base for Soviet operations in the area is as secure as ever, and provided the Soviets with a great advantage in renewing relations with Cuba in 1960. Mikoyan was able to take full advantage of his Mexican visit; the Soviet industrial exposition was given a good reception at the end of 1959.

Communist propaganda is imported or printed in Mexico, literally by the ton, without let or hindrance of the Mexican authorities, then widely distributed within the country to the most susceptible elements of the population, and shipped out to Caribbean and Central American countries. Domestically, the Communist parties suffer no restrictions, while intellectual Marxism continues to flourish in the universities, pedagogical institutions, the Ministry of Education, and in many organs of economic policy and of public opinion.

The Presidential policy of flirting with Communists is continued in the close contact maintained with Vicente Lombardo Toledano (whose diplomatic passport was recently renewed) and in opening Mexico's doors to a Latin American conference sponsored by the Communist-front World Peace Council, scheduled for March, 1961. The influence of General Lazaro Cardenas remains strong, and apparently uncombated, within Government circles and such basic organizations as the farm workers.

It is, of course, true that several Communist labor leaders, such as Demetrio Vallejo, are in jail, as is also the prominent Communist party leader, the painter David Alfaro Siqueiros. In these cases, however, the reason for imprisonment has nothing to do with Communist ideology. Labor leaders who happened to be Communists forcibly challenged the authority of the Government, in connection with the strike on the national railways system in 1959, and are suffering the penalty provided in the Mexican law for this violation.

(6) Some Miscellaneous Bilateral Stalemates: There is no willingness by Mexico even to discuss the long-standing claim to El Chamizal, on the border adjacent to El Paso. Cooperation in atomic development is still declined by Mexico, which prefers international organization assistance to direct U.S. aid. Many small United States agrarian claims, assiduously documented and presented, lie dormant in the archives of the Ministry of Foreign Relations. The dispute over Mexico's assertion of a 9-mile limit in the Gulf of Mexico remains as it has been for almost 20 years, and the related though not dependent problem of a shrimp fisheries conservation agreement gains no Mexican interest at this time. Our requests for action under the Extradition Treaty meet little response; Mexicans accused of crimes committed in the United States remain totally immune to punishment, even in their own country; American criminals in Mexico can generally count on Mexican cooperation to avoid extradition. An effective anti-narcotics program never gets beyond the discussion stage, leaving Mexico as one of the chief sources of dangerous drugs entering the U.S., to the peril of neighboring areas in Texas and California.

(7) Some Miscellaneous Bilateral Successes: The complex and delicate Bracero Agreement continues to be renewed at regular intervals, and the program of Mexican migratory farm labor in the United States continues to be carried out on an orderly and fairly satisfactory basis. Good treatment of American visitors and residents in Mexico by the police and immigration authorities helps greatly the protection functions of our Consulates. The bilateral aviation agreement is a practical benefit to both countries. Collaboration with American scientists and governmental agencies is at a new high in Mexico's participation in Project Mercury. In the routine handling of inter-governmental business, the attitude of Mexican officials in dealing with United States Government representatives is uniformly courteous and frequently effective; but manners apart, the list of substantial accomplishments is not long.

(8) Mexican Reaction to the United States: It appears to be a considered and established Mexican position that Mexico has most to gain from her powerful northern neighbor, by a policy of opposition or non-cooperation. Modifications of this policy, when analyzed, will be found invariably to be dictated by Mexico's own interest, e.g., in the Bracero and Aviation Agreements, Project Mercury, and good treatment for the dollar-laden tourist. By remaining cool to the United States responsibilities in the prolonged crisis of the Cold War, Mexico feels pride in its sovereign independence. Aware that the United States itself believes "we cannot afford bad relations with our southern neighbor," Mexico has the confidence born of experience that, by simply playing the role of the coy or at least indifferent Señorita, she can bring the Yankee suitor rushing to her door.

THE PROBLEM OF TACTICS

Having used every device of ardent wooing which might be imagined in the past fifteen years, the United States should now strike a cool balance of the results and reconsider its tactics. Certainly the goal of Mexico's cooperation is worth the extreme endeavors made to win it during this critical period, but when such approaches do not produce the desired results, they should be most carefully re-adapted.

At the present time, Mexico is watching every move of the new U.S. Administration, not in a worried sense but in the expectancy that Uncle Sam will soon show how much he is thinking about her. The United States, by deliberately delaying any move in Mexico's direction, has a unique opportunity to cause Mexico to ponder, and to raise before Mexico's own eyes the variety of reasons the United States may have to weigh its Mexican relations. On the other hand, a quick and unmerited gesture of solicitude for Mexico will serve only to convince her that nothing is changed, all is the same as before, and Uncle Sam's favors will continue to be had without cost.

In specific terms, a re-examination of our tactics would mean to pass over Mexico as of no immediate concern in our Latin American relations at this time. Indirectly, "with the left hand," it should be made known that this attitude is derived from Mexico's record in the past few years. Simultaneously, a demonstration of genuine interest in the problems of certain other Latin American governments, which have given effective support on the major problems which confront us (e.g. Argentina, Colombia, Peru, or some one of the smaller countries such as Costa Rica) would be realistically understood by Mexico as a sign of United States strength and purposefulness in this Hemisphere. It might even prompt Mexico to consider a more positive response to her northern neighbor. It is well worth trying.

180. Memorandum from Coerr to Ball, April 11¹

April 11, 1961

THROUGH

S/S

FROM

ARA—Kymberly Delf. Coerr

SUBJECT

Mexican Oil Import Problem

Discussion

As Mr. Martin pointed out to you in his memorandum of April 7, we are experiencing great difficulty with the Department of the Interior regarding our commitment to Mexico for the import of asphaltic crude and residual oil overland to Brownsville, Texas.

1. Interior claims the Brownsville arrangement is an absurd procedure that can be indefinitely expanded and could be used by non-contiguous countries to circumvent the objectives of the import quota system.

Admittedly, the system is based upon a technicality, and Mexico is perfectly willing to construct a pipeline from its oil fields to Brownsville, but Interior does not wish to give any assurance that it will permit the pipeline operation long enough to amortise the $6 million or so that the pipeline will cost, nor will it permit the present arrangement on an interim basis at its present level. Mexico is willing to limit its truck imports to 30,000 barrels per day but not to cut them back by half.

¹ Mexican oil import problem. Secret. 3 pp. WNRC, RG 59, TFLA Subject and Chron Files: Lot 61 D 298, Box 9.

2. Interior argues that when the Brownsville arrangement was under consideration Mexico's immediate concern was finding an outlet for 15,000 barrels of residual oil. Therefore, the arrangement should be limited to 15,000 barrels of residual oil and United States consumers of the Mexican product should use it exclusively for fuel, not process it for any other purpose.

Mexico has always exported residual oil and asphaltic crude, making no distinction between the two in considering its surplus problem, because its exported crude is so heavy (over 95% residual content) that it is residual oil for all practical purposes. However, this crude is peculiarly suited to the manufacture of asphalt roofing material and since there is virtually an evaporable domestic crude, it is readily salable in the United States. If Interior's concern is to protect our domestic industry, one would expect it to attack Mexico's residual exports, not its asphaltic crude. At any rate our present regulations do not distinguish between crude and residual imports to overland transportation nor do they permit us to dictate to domestic importers the use they make of the product they import.

With regard to Interior's desire to impose a quantitative limitation, we should be guided by the CCDH's security justification on which the entire import quota system is based. This does not encompass protection for domestic producers in the narrow commercial sense for which escape clause action is available. National security is also the basis for the overland exemption to Canada and Mexico because pipeline oil from contiguous countries is the equivalent of domestic production from the security point of view.

Historically, Mexico has exported more than 30,000 barrels of its heavy oils to our northeastern states and bought refined products from California. When import quotas were imposed, this arrangement continued until Mexico's major customer, the Paragon Oil Company, was bought out by the Texas Oil Company so that Texas Oil could use the Paragon import quota to buy Trinidad oil. This left Mexico with an unexportable surplus of heavy oils which overflowed its storage facilities and was forcing it to dump 15,000 barrels of residual per day, much of it in open holes in the ground. When Cuba offered to buy Mexico's surplus heavy oils, Mexico asked us to modify our regulations to permit ex-quota imports of Mexican oil. We countered with the Brownsville arrangement but did not, and legally could not, unilaterally place a quantitative limitation on Mexico's overland imports, any more than we did on Canada's.

Surely we should not be required to treat Mexico less favorably than Canada. Historically Canada exported about 118,000 barrels per day to the United States. When the overland exemption was granted, it was understood that Canada would increase its exports by about 30,000 to 40,000 barrels, largely in the Puget Sound area. Recently this Administration made no objection to a Canadian announcement of its intention to increase its exports from some 130,000 barrels in 1961 to 225,000 barrels by 1963. Considering the volume of Canadian oil we import and the total United States consumption of 113,000,000 barrels of residual and crude, Interior's preoccupation with Mexico's 30,000 barrels is difficult to understand.

Of course, neither Canada nor Mexico should use the overland exemption to flood our market. We favor a bilateral agreement with Mexico that would permit it to amortize the construction of a pipeline and establish a reasonable limitation on its imports.

Based upon our Canadian experience, a fair level of overland imports from Mexico would be about 40,000 barrels per day, allowing a reasonable increase over the present rate to cover a part of Mexico's growing production and to make construction of a pipeline economically attractive. This level could be modified by mutual agreement as conditions warrant.

A fair trade policy with Mexico is essential to satisfactory relations with that country, already hit by our restrictions on its exports of lead and zinc, the recent two-cent increase in our cotton subsidy and the impending limitation on tourist imports—all this despite a bilateral trade account already two to one in our favor. Our unilateral abrogation of the Brownsville commitment would be considered the last straw.

International relations aside, it is in the national interest to come to an agreement with Mexico to establish pipeline imports under fair limitations that can be maintained for a reasonable period of time in full recognition that we need Mexico's residual and asphaltic crude as long as our domestic refineries find it more profitable to turn out lighter products.

Recommendation

That you again attempt to obtain Interior's acquiescence to (a) continuance of the present Brownsville arrangement at the 30,000 barrel level until a pipeline is constructed, and (b) a written agreement with Mexico permitting pipeline operations at the 10,000 barrel level until the cost of the line can be amortized.

Approved _____

Disapproved _____

Concurrences: FSD

181. Memorandum from Melville E. Osborne to Coerr, May 6¹

May 6, 1961

TO

ARA—Mr. Coerr

THROUGH

CMA—Mr. Vallon

FROM

CMA—Melville B. Osborne

SUBJECT

Mexico and the Castro Problem

Mexico presently threatens to become a more serious problem to us than it has been since the late 1930's when General Lázaro Cárdenas was President of that country. The latent fear, jealousy and animosity towards the United States that is always a complicating factor in Mexico was largely offset in the 1940's by our joint efforts during World War II and by Mexico's phenomenal growth (supported by United States credits and investment) in the post war period. But by 1958 internal stresses in Mexico had become so acute that the country ceased to have goals which are universally accepted and great optimism in the future declined. A description of these stresses follows:

1. Evident and growing disparities in wealth and income that undermine confidence in the validity of Mexican policies. Industrialization did create an entrepreneurial class and raised the living standards of skilled, organized labor, but the high cost of the domestic industrial product and exuberant protectionism placed most industrial products further and further from the reach of those whose incomes were not much raised by the growing economy of the country, well over one-half of the population.

2. The evident failure of Mexico's agrarian reform. The Mexican Revolution of 1910 destroyed the landed aristocracy without creating a large class of small, independent and prosperous farmers, for the land was redistributed to communal entities subject to political and financial manipulation while those who tilled the soil still lacked title to their land. The plots allocated to the landless under this system were from the beginning too small to permit prosperity and the population explosion in the country exacerbated the acute land problem beyond all bounds. Real incomes of poor farmers have undoubtedly declined under this agrarian system, while those few large farms that were left and converted into factory farms have become so enormously efficient and prosperous that statistically Mexico's overall agricultural productivity has increased at least as rapidly as that of its industry. Unfortunately, these efficient factory farms produce crops largely for export (cotton, cattle, fruits and vegetables, etc.) and the benefits of this efficiency are not passed on to the less prosperous of Mexico. In an effort to hold down the cost of living for Mexico's urban, industrial poor, the prices of Mexico's agricultural production for internal consumption have been rigidly controlled making it even more difficult for poor farmers to earn a decent living and discouraging efficient Mexican factory farms from producing for the domestic market. As a result, Mexico imports corn, its basic food crop, while it is plagued with surpluses of cotton and exportable vegetables. Under these conditions the rural poor grow poorer while the rural wealthy grow richer, and this despite Mexico's agrarian reform laws. The large number of Mexican farmers who work on prosperous United States farms each year as migratory laborers serves further to demonstrate the inadequacies of Mexico's agrarian policies.

¹ Mexico and the Castro problem. Confidential. 4 pp. WNRC, RG 59, TFLA Subject and Chron Files: Lot 61 D 298, Box 9.

3. The corruption and insensitivity of Mexico's ruling classes. Industrialization has been profitable not only to skilled labor and management but to politicians as well. Industrialists expect to pay 20 percent or more of their profits and a larger percentage of the value of the government contracts they receive to Mexican politicians. Government-owned corporations pay salaries of $10,000 or more per year to favored Mexican officials on their boards of directors whose sole corporate duties are to meet briefly one or two times a year. Shakedowns of one sort or another are common among lesser officials. State and local officials and Federal civilian and military officials share handsomely in the profits of vice, the illicit narcotics traffic and smuggling, the latter becoming highly profitable under Mexico's blatant protectionism. Corruption has always been a problem in Mexico but industrial prosperity has made politicians more greedy than ever and the Mexican people have come to expect that members of the ruling party, which includes labor, farm and industrial leaders, will always sacrifice the public interest in favor of personal profit. Opposition groups including Communist organizations are considered to be honest if only because they do not have access to the public till.

4. Weak and incompetent leadership. The internal stresses of Mexico are reflected in the nomination system of the ruling party and nomination, which insures election, is granted either to those non-entities who have made few enemies or to extremists who might be converted into loyal subordinates by access to the extra legal sources of wealth. Cárdenas was the last strong President of Mexico. López Mateos is undoubtedly one of the weakest, but since he appears to be firmly in control of the Mexican political apparatus, he is probably better able to stand up to Cárdenas than he is willing to believe. The real crisis in Mexico will arise in 1963 when the growing influence of Cárdenas and extreme leftists in Mexican politics might well dictate the nomination and therefore the 1964 election of a Communist oriented Mexican politician.

5. The failure to progress significantly towards political democracy. In a Mexican political situation torn by economic stress and dominated by corrupt officials, concessions to genuinely democratic processes are likely to encourage the politically frustrated to commit excesses and threaten the country's political stability which the great, though probably declining, majority of Mexicans highly value after the years of violent instability that prevailed in Mexico from its independence to the 1940's. Since the comfortable alliance between politicians, industrialists and racketeers would be jeopardized by democratic progress, the ruling classes cannot be expected to be enthusiastic democrats. American investors also benefit from this alliance and probably do not wish to see it threatened though it is now apparent that the ruling clique is quite prepared to throw foreign investors to the nationalist wolves to steer reform away from itself.

6. The advent of Castro. In its doctrinaire tradition Mexico was so hostile to the Batista dictatorship that it gave support to the Castro movement without thought of the possible consequences to itself. Castro trained his forces on Mexican territory and sailed from Mexico in his successful invasion attempt [1 line not declassified]. We know now Mexico's tolerance of Communists made it easy for the 26th of July movement to be Communist infiltrated before it left for Cuba. Rather than admit error, Mexican officials have been willing to go to absurd lengths to justify the Castro regime and even now are unwilling publicly to admit that he represents a threat to their own country. Cárdenas, the great mystic of Mexican political life, has obviously fallen under the complete domination of the Communists around him [less than 1 line not declassified]. While the Mexican Government was caught trying to justify Castro against its own interests, Cárdenas was able to step in with open support for Castro and even to threaten a Castro-type revolution for Mexico. Given the internal stresses of the country and the 25-year infiltration of the entire Mexican educational system by known Communists, the Cárdenas threat has become serious. [2 lines not declassified] It should be noted that President López Mateos is himself a product of and greatly influenced by the Marxist educated intelligentsia of Mexico and probably suffers serious inner conflicts whenever he has to take a position on the vital political problems he faces. This would explain his evident reluctance to take any stand at all. Since last summer at least, he has let us know that he is worried about Communism in Mexico and the Castro situation generally and that he hopes we can find an effective means of eliminating Cuban Communism. At the same time he has indicated that his Government, for domestic political and historical reasons, must remain opposed to foreign intervention in Cuba, direct or indirect, multilateral or bilateral. [1½ lines not declassified]

Mexico and Efforts to Achieve a Unified Latin American Front Towards Castro.

In deciding whether to apply any pressure on Mexico to take a public stand against Castro, we must be certain that we will not lose more in Mexico than we gain in Cuba or the rest of the hemisphere. If the contemplated pressure pushes Mexico significantly further along the road of concessions to Marxists, either immediately or during the next presidential nominations, such pressure would be highly detrimental to United States interests. If the pressure can be accomplished in a manner that would discredit both Castro and the Mexican Communists, and at the same time stiffen the spine of the Mexican Government against the Communist threat, a real feat will have been achieved. This may require some patient negotiations with some exasperating Mexicans but it will be worth that price.

I believe that Mexico is now more in the balance than we realise and recognition of this should be a part of every decision taken on the Castro problem.

182. Memorandum from Edwin E. Vallon to Jamison, June 6¹

June 6, 1961

SUBJECT

Mexican Request for Minesweepers

The Mexican Naval Attaché has discussed with the Navy the acquisition of 10 minesweepers on an “as is where is” basis. Your office asked for our comments and we in turn asked for recommendations from Ambassador Mann. He has replied that he perceives no objection to the possible sale.

¹ Mexican request for 10 minesweepers. Confidential. 1 p. DOS, CF, 712.5621/6–661.

The Mexicans state that they desire to use the ships for patrol duty. The acquisition of these ships may enhance Mexico's ability to seize American flag shrimp vessels fishing illegally but I do not consider the possible use of these minesweepers against American flag shrimp boats a sufficient basis for disapproving the Mexican request.

The vessels would probably also be used to enforce Mexican revenue laws and prevent smuggling. In addition, the ships might be useful in surveillance type activity contemplated in the Caribbean security arrangements. I am not hopeful at all that Mexico would enter into any bilateral arrangements with the United States toward that end, but Mexico might on its own increase its surveillance activities.

I would suggest, however, that your office explore with Defense and Navy whether these vessels are needed in connection with the proposed Caribbean security arrangements. If so, countries willing to participate in such arrangements should receive first consideration. It may also be that South American countries which have shown a greater disposition to cooperate with the United States in defense arrangements are in need of this type vessel.

If there are no higher priority requirements elsewhere, then I have no objection to the sale of ten minesweepers to Mexico.

183. Memorandum from Vallon to Braddock, July 26¹

July 26, 1961

SUBJECT

Mexican Request for Purchase of Naval Vessels

Problem Should the Department approve the sale to Mexico of twenty (20) minesweepers for use as patrol vessels.

Discussion The Department of the Navy has for disposal forty (40) World War II 150' steel hull minesweepers for about $15,000 each. The Mexican Government is seeking to purchase 20 of these ships for patrol duty. As a party to the Rio Treaty, Mexico is eligible to purchase these ships. The United States and Mexico also maintain a Joint Defense Commission established during World War II which continues to exist but otherwise does not perform too useful a function. No other defense arrangements exist with Mexico.

¹ Mexican request for purchase of navel vessels (20 minesweepers). Confidential.
2 pp. DOS, CF, 712.5621/7-2661.

Mexico has some 30 patrol craft, but Mexico is not now capable of performing surveillance activities along her coasts to prevent clandestine activities, e.g., by Cuba. It is unlikely that Mexico would enter into any bilateral agreement with the United States for patrol activity off the Mexican coast. If Mexico had the capability, however, it might undertake more effective surveillance in its own interest and could take care of its own harbor defense. (See attached New York Times article of January 22, 1961). Mexico could also use these vessels to prevent smuggling and other activities in violation of its revenue laws.

U/FW feels strongly that Mexico will use the vessels to enforce Mexico's claim to a nine-mile territorial sea. In the dispute between the United States and Mexico over the width of the territorial sea, Mexico has seized and fined a number of United States flag fishing boats. (See U/FW memorandum attached). Our Embassy points out, however, that the number of US fishing vessels arrested by Mexico is small in comparison with the total number fishing within the nine mile limit claimed by Mexico and that Mexico has the capability of considerably greater harassment if it wanted to exercise it. The Embassy suggests that Mexico would react to a turn down of its request by stepping up seizures of fishing vessels.

Mexico would strongly resent a negative response to its request to purchase these vessels and it would undoubtedly worsen our relations at a time when we are seeking by every means to improve them and wean Mexico away from its present policy which has the effect of supporting Cuba. The Embassy points out that a refusal would not help our friends in Mexico, e.g., the Mexican Navy, who favor the adoption by Mexico of policies which would support our objectives, but would be used by those who are not disposed to be cooperative or who are even anti-American or pro-communist to support their arguments that the only interest of the United States in a narrow territorial sea is a commercial one. Further, we have recently made naval vessels available to other countries, e.g., Peru, Ecuador and Chile, which have even more extreme claims to territorial sea and have also seized and fined United States flag tuna boats. These three countries, however, have not enforced their claims with the same vigor as Mexico.

Ambassador Mann has been consulted and recommends the sale of the vessels to Mexico. (See telegram attached).

Recommendation That you discuss the foregoing with Mr. Taylor and that you inform him that we feel we must approve the Mexican request for overriding political reasons.

Attachment:

Memorandum of June 20, 1961 from U/FW.

Clipping from New York Times.

184. Memorandum from Robert F. Woodward to U. Alexis Johnson, July 31¹

July 31, 1961

TO

The Deputy Under Secretary for Political Affairs

THROUGH

S/S

FROM

ARA—Robert F. Woodward

SUBJECT

Politico-Economic Discussions With Mexico

Discussion

Mexico is following a basically neutralist course. Its actions and attitude on the Cuba problem within the OAS and UN have had the effect of supporting Cuba despite Mexico's commitments under the OAS Charter and Rio Treaty. The Mexican attitude is prejudicial to our own foreign policy objectives. Internally, Mexico is following policies which are discouraging to foreign investment. At the same time, Mexico has been receiving substantial financial assistance from the US, primarily through the Eximbank, but needs and is seeking more to maintain its high rate of economic development. It professes to want foreign investment and desires increased tourism to Mexico and more favorable treatment of its exports.

Ambassador Mann has requested (see telegram No. 136 attached) (Tab B) that he be authorized to discuss with the Mexicans their policies with respect to communism and private foreign investment, to explore with them their development plans, and to indicate that we want to be as helpful as possible in assisting Mexico to find resources for its economic development.

¹ Politico-economic discussions with Mexico. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 611.12/7-3161.

Ambassador Mann suggests we be flexible, but proposes that a basis for a cooperative effort might include action by Mexico (1) to repudiate Communist intervention, (2) to participate in hemisphere defense, (3) to establish and maintain a clear and consistent policy on foreign investment, and (4) to consider a program of tax reform based on ability to pay. Cooperation with us at the Montevideo meeting and support of the Colombian initiative on the Cuban problem offer excellent opportunities for Mexico to demonstrate a new cooperative spirit within the OAS framework.

For our part he suggests we be willing to consider (1) financial assistance on as substantial a scale as possible, consistent with resources of US lending institutions and support of Mexican request to international lending institutions, (2) encouraging private investment provided Mexico develops and maintains a reasonable policy on such investments, (3) encouraging private investors to give due regard to Mexico's financial situation in making remittances, (4) acceptance of an "independent" foreign policy by Mexico so long as it is consistent with Mexico's OAS Charter and Rio Treaty commitments (this excludes neutralism), (5) consultation with Mexico on any actions by the United States Government which would hurt Mexico's economy, e.g., termination of "commuter" employment in border cities, reduction or elimination of bracero program, and (6) settlement of all outstanding claims.

He suggests that making cooperation a two-way street is more urgent for Mexico than the United States. If Mexico is not receptive, we would withdraw from the discussions in a friendly manner and put a "slow man" on Mexico's requests.

Ambassador Mann has included in his list of items we might be willing to consider:

(A) Possible exception for Mexico on reduction of duty free import privileges for American tourists and,

(B) Coffee stabilization fund for Central America which would help Central America market its coffee in an orderly manner and avoid upsetting the market for Mexico which produces the same type of coffee.

We cannot agree to (A) because an exception for Mexico would be inconsistent with our GATT commitments. On (B), we are now considering the possibility of a world coffee agreement and until we know how that works out we would not want to undertake a separate arrangement with Central America. Further, Brazil strongly opposes such a measure. Brazil finances its own coffee marketing and feels Central America and Mexico could arrange private financing if they tried.

Recommendation

That you approve the attached telegram (Tab A) authorizing Ambassador Mann to undertake the exploratory discussions he proposes, with the exception of items (A) and (B) above.

Concurrences

E—Mr. Kerr B/FAC—Mr. Bell

Attachments

Tab A—Telegram to Ambassador Mann.

Tab B—Telegram No. 136 from Mexico City.

185. Memorandum of conversation, October 19, between Foreign Minister Tello and Under Secretary Bowles¹

October 19, 1961

SUBJECT

International Developments

PARTICIPANTS

Foreign Minister Tello
Under Secretary Bowles
Ambassador Mann

The Under Secretary commenced the conversation by expressing his interest in Mexico's plans for the development of low-cost housing as explained by Luis Quintanilla and made some complimentary remarks about Mexico's economic growth and its efforts to better distribute the national product. He told the Foreign Minister that he expected to make a speech on the Alliance for Progress at the Bi-National Center and offered to send him an advance copy of it. The Foreign Minister expressed his thanks.

The Under Secretary then spoke in general terms concerning the Berlin question making two principal points: (a) The Russians had internal difficulties of their own; had substantially failed to accomplish their objectives in the less developed countries of Africa and Asia and faced problems with Red China which could possibly become more acute with time and (b) The apparent Soviet intention was to frighten the U.S. and its NATO allies by bellicose speeches and nuclear testing. The Under Secretary said that the U.S. people firmly supported President Kennedy's policy of firmness and said that the U.S. was always willing to negotiate for a settlement on a fair and equitable basis.

¹ Berlin question; Troika (UN). Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 611.12/10-1961.

Minister Tello expressed interest in the Under Secretary's statements, referred to two letters which President Lopez Mateos had recently addressed to the Soviet Union on the subjects of Berlin and Troika. He said that in the case of Berlin, Mexican policy was based on the principles of self-determination and non-intervention and in respect to Troika, on the principle that the U.N. could not function effectively without a Secretary General who had the authority to appoint his own staff.

186. Telegram 1744 from Mexico City, December 17¹

Mexico City, December 17, 1961

I had a secret, frank and friendly hour long talk with President Lopez Mateos at his home this morning summary of which follows:

1. I commenced conversation by saying that I recognized Mexican policy must be based on Mexico's own estimate of its self-interest. On other hand, I was sure he would understand vote in OAS plus projected visit created problem for US which would be compounded if another negative vote cast at MFM. I wished principally to get his advice on visit, but was also at his service discuss substantive problem if he wished.

2. Lopez Mateos said Mexico could not abandon its "position". (He did not say "vote") I inquired whether he had personally had occasion recently read text article 6 Rio treaty. He replied in the affirmative. I then asked whether the interpretation of article 6 was the important thing or whether real basis Mexican position was its doctrine absolute non-intervention based on Mexican historical experience. He replied latter was the case and said his regime was transitory and could not assume responsibility for reversing historical Mexican position on non-intervention. (I interpret this to mean Mexican opposition to OAS multilateral action of any kind directed against any American state for any reason.)

¹ Report on discussion with President Lopez Mateos. Secret. 6 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Mexico, January 1961–May 1962.

3. Lopez Mateos emphasized this did not mean Mexican sympathy for Castro or Communist doctrine. He referred in this connection to various measures which Mexico had unilaterally taken against Castro including refusing to sell Mexican petroleum products, cooperation in preventing transshipment US goods to Cuba and an assertion new to me that Mexican policy was to prevent shipments of Mexican foodstuffs to Cuba.

4. I said foregoing left my President difficult choice since I was certain he wished friendship with Lopez Mateos, but on other hand had to consider US public opinion and interpretation which would be given abroad to visit which followed closely on the heels of Mexican negative vote in MFM. It seemed to me principal question was one of timing. President Kennedy has, as he knew, preferred visit later in year. Perhaps best solution would be delay "fixing time for visit" (I did not use word "postpone") until after MFM. He said this would be satisfactory, but wished make clear Mexico willing give President Kennedy warm reception now. I expressed appreciation, but pointed out difficulty any other solution since short time between conclusion of MFM and January 27 would be inadequate make security and other preparations but no mention was made of a new date.

5. I suggested it would be desirable consider possibility some kind official statement in view of press speculation about visit in January. He agreed and said he would instruct Tello talk with me about this and attempt work out something. Will telegraph when I have additional information this point.

6. I then said that as we understood absolute character Mexican doctrine non-intervention, I hoped he would understand importance US gives doctrine democracy also in OAS charter. We sincerely believe we are on side of angels when we support right of people all countries chose their own government and when we say there is parallelism between peace and democracy. As applied to Castro, our principle means that Cuban people have right to chose their own destiny, a right which currently is being denied to them. I said that in addition I hoped he would understand US attaches greater importance than Mexico to the security and even military implications of a Communist beach-head in hemisphere and our deep concern that Communism could spread to other American republics. He acknowledged understanding US views on security but said he thought it was difficult in practice to achieve real democracy. I acknowledged difficulty, but pointed to great progress which has been made in this direction in recent decades, something which is not possible under Communist control.

7. President then repeated Tello rationale that as practical matter it is preferable Castro be allowed fall of his own weight. I said I could agree with this in abstract, but entrenched strength of Communist apparatus in Cuba made obsolete yardsticks usually applied measure stability of regimes which depended on support of at least significant segment of people. I expressed opinion it would be imprudent expect Cuban people alone to oust Castro and argued from this premise that conclusion logically followed multilateral steps should be taken which worked toward ultimate isolation of Castro regime and reduction its subversive capabilities. I used as example Mexican intelligence of undoubted reliability that Cuban Ambassador recently summoned Mexican students to Cuban Embassy and lectured them on failure agitate effectively so as to earn monies given them by Cuban Embassy. I expressed opinion Cuban Embassy and all Communist activity was directed not only against US, but against PRI party and Mexico itself and noted Marxist doctrine called for elimination of liberal as well as conservative opposition, both potential and existing. To this President replied with familiar Mexican argument that only effective way deal with Communist danger is improve standards of living of people under Alliance for Progress.

8. I then inquired whether he had taken into account effect of negative vote or votes on a further weakening of confidence which is essential to Mexican economic growth. He deplored this but implied that need to follow traditional foreign policy overriding.

9. At this point, he suggested Tello and I attempt between now and January 10 to reconcile US and Mexican points of view on MFM. I said I would gladly attempt to do so. Lopez Mateos stressed that much depended on precise issue on which Mexico would be required to cast its vote. Any instruction which Department wishes to give me in this regard would be appreciated.

(On basis Lopez Mateos statements alone there is little room for optimism even recognizing he left door slightly open by suggesting talks with Tello. On other hand, Lopez Mateos appeared understand vote by Mexico would accomplish no practical purpose since decision two-thirds majority binding on all. Also we should not disregard fact dissatisfaction with Mexican position on Cuban issue widespread except in far left. Finally, we also note Aleman, Rodriguez, Ortiz Mena, Diaz Ordaz and others are concerned and are allegedly working to find face-saving formula. Possibility of Mexican abstention should not therefore be entirely discounted.)

10. There was also inconclusive discussion of need of both UN and OAS demonstrate they are not only debating societies but capable dealing with problems our time. I suggested failure of OAS to function might ultimately have consequences which would not serve best interests of LA.

11. In light of foregoing my recommendations to questions posed in DEPTTEL 1697 are:

A. We should delay until after MFM any further discussion regarding specific date for meeting. We will then be in better position determine best timing from standpoint our interests. Suggest Department take particular care avoid implying January 27 date was agreed upon, even tentatively so as to help Mexico save face. In regard to face, it is not impossible that Mexicans will rationalize that since Lopez Mateos "stood up" to US on issue of visit Mexico has more freedom change negative vote to abstention.

B. We should await discussions with Tello on possible public announcement which should give us outline of rationale Moyt acceptable to Mexico. Department will understand rationale is much more important to Mexico than to US. Lopez Mateos acquiescence in postponement should not be interpreted as equivalent of no displeasure. On contrary, President is almost certain to have hoped US would bail him out again.

C. After MPM, it would probably be preferable continue discussions re visit through this Embassy. But suggest definitive decision on this point be reserved.

D. Best chance of inducing change in Mexico's attitude is maintenance firm but friendly attitude until such time as light begins to dawn on Mexico that cooperation has to be a two-way street, and that Mexico needs US more than we need Mexico. It is important that in weeks ahead each statement by a US official and each action on loan applications be carefully considered in light of probable effect on Mexican decisions. Former Foreign Minister Ezequiel Padilla and other Mexican friends have urged in talks with me that US avoid any statement or action which would lead Mexico believe we attach no importance their attitude on Cuba.

Mann

187. Memorandum of conversation, February 16, between Rusk and Ambassador Carrillo¹

February 16, 1962

SUBJECT

Geneva Disarmament Conference and Salinity of Colorado River Water

PARTICIPANTS

The Secretary
 Ambassador Antonio Carrillo Flores, of Mexico
 Mr. Sayre—CMA
 Mr. Baker—ACDA

COPIES TO:

S	INR/D	Dept of Interior—3
U	ARA—Mr. Woodward	ACDA
H	IBWC—Colonel Hewitt—2
G	Amembassy MEXICO CITY
S/S	Amconsulate MEXICALI
S/P	CMA—2

The Mexican Ambassador called on the Secretary at the former's request. He informed the Secretary that the Mexican Government agreed with the position of the United States (as outlined to the Mexican and Brazilian Ambassadors by the Secretary on February 12), on the Soviet proposal to have the heads of government open the March 18 Geneva Conference on Disarmament. The Ambassador asked for clarification of the US-UK proposal that the Foreign Ministers of the US, UK and USSR meet at Geneva prior to convening the conference and that the conference be attended by Foreign Ministers. The Secretary explained that it had been originally agreed that the conference be attended by the Permanent Representatives. The United States and the United Kingdom proposed that it be attended by Foreign Ministers. The Soviet Union responded by suggesting that the heads of government open the meeting. The United States hoped that the Soviet Union would agree to our proposal that it be a Foreign Ministers meeting and that as many Foreign Ministers as possible, in addition to those of the US, UK and USSR, would attend. The Mexican Ambassador said that Mexico desired to be represented at the conference by its Permanent Representative PADILLA Nervo and that the Mexican Foreign Minister did not plan to attend.

¹ Geneva Disarmament Conference and salinity of Colorado River water. Confidential. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 397.5611-GE/2-1662.

The Mexican Ambassador then discussed with the Secretary Mexico's serious preoccupation with the quality of Colorado River waters being delivered to Mexico under the terms of the 1944 Water Treaty. He said that the Mexican Government viewed the situation with grave concern. He recalled that the Mexican Foreign Minister had discussed the problem with the Secretary at Punta del Este. He showed the Secretary the February 13 issue of Excelsior which he described as a conservative, pro-American newspaper. The newspaper headline and lead story were to the effect that the Mexicali Valley faced a catastrophe because of the salt water problem. He said that he realized it was a complex problem and that the International Boundary and Water Commission is urgently considering it. He wanted to suggest that the immediate problem be separated from the long range solution and that action be taken within the next week or two to provide good quality water for the February irrigation of the wheat crop in the Mexicali Valley. He asked whether the United States could agree during the next two or three months to deliver water to Mexico from storage through the All American Canal. The drainage water in the Colorado River would be permitted to waste to the Gulf except to the extent that it might be diverted by Mexico and mixed with the high quality water. Mexico would reserve its position on whether the water wasted would be counted as part of the Treaty allotment.

Mr. Sayre explained that the Treaty allots Mexico 1,500,000 acre feet of water. He noted that delivery to Mexico of any quantity above that amount would create a serious internal domestic political situation because of the strong feelings of the 14 Colorado Basin State Senators and others on the division of Colorado River water. He said that the source of the drainage apparently responsible for the high salt content of the water is the Wellton-Mohawk irrigation district in Arizona. The water Mexico is receiving from the River has a salt content of some 2,500 parts per million of salt, whereas deliveries to Mexico before this year had a salt content of about 1,500 p.p.m. He noted that US irrigation experts had advised us that the water now being delivered is usable for irrigation of wheat.

The Mexican Ambassador discussed briefly the salt water situation on the Rio Grande River which the United States complained about to Mexico in 1960 but on which no action has been taken. He said that the United States had asked on December 2, 1961, that the water behind Anzalduas Dam be wasted because of its high salt content and that Mexico had agreed within 24 hours. He hoped that the US could agree as promptly to the Mexican request. (The Mexican Ambassador had made this same point to Mr. Sayre before his conversation with the Secretary, at which time Mr. Sayre noted that the lower Rio Grande farmers had wanted to irrigate seedling vegetable plants which required water of a low salt content. If wheat had been involved the water would have been used. The US counted the released water as part of its Treaty allotment. The quantity of water was negligible in contrast to the thousands of acre-feet involved on the Colorado River.)

Mr. Sayre noted that the quality of Colorado River waters was discussed during the negotiation of the 1944 Water Treaty and that it was realized at the time that the salt content of the water would increase. He said that in return for a higher quantity of water than that to which the United States considered Mexico entitled, Mexico had accepted provisions in the Treaty which required Mexico to take and count drainage water as part of its allotment. The Mexican Ambassador interposed that this was the point on which Mexico had reserved its legal position because it disagreed with the United States. He said that the only record of which he was aware that this had been discussed was in the hearings before the United States Senate.

The Secretary inquired what might be done to meet the Mexican request. Mr. Sayre said that we had received a similar proposal from the Mexican Commissioner but that we had understood the Mexican Commissioner, in effect, to suggest it as a long term solution. We had already prepared a reply to the Mexican Commissioner. He said the Mexican Ambassador's proposal was for emergency action and that he would take it up immediately with the Department of the Interior. The Secretary said that he would call the Secretary of the Interior and promised the Mexican Ambassador a prompt reply.

Note: The Ambassador's proposal was discussed with the Department of the Interior and an instruction was sent on February 15 to the United States Commissioner that he could accept the proposal if Mexico (1) understood the United States would count all waters delivered whether in the River or through the Canal as part of its allotment under the Treaty, (2) understood that the United States could not guarantee deliveries through the Canal at a level higher than provided in the Treaty because the capacity of the Canal is only sufficient to handle the requirements of US users plus the amount specified in the Treaty for Mexico and (3) paid the cost of delivery through the Canal in accordance with the formula worked out in 1950 when emergency deliveries were made through the Canal.

188. Memorandum from McGhee to Woodward, March 7¹

March 7, 1962

TO

ARA—Mr. Woodward

THROUGH

S/S

FROM

M—George C. McGhee

The attached memorandum, "The Salt Water Problem of the Mexicali and San Luis Valleys," describes a problem which has arisen in connection with our border treaty with Mexico of February 1944. I would appreciate it if you would advise me whether or not the problem of undue salinity of the water delivered has been called to the attention of the Department and has been considered by the United States Government. If not, would you take appropriate steps to consider whether or not this issue should be raised with the appropriate U.S. authorities.

AttachmentMemorandum"The Salt Water Problem of the Mexicali and San Luis Valleys"*

Under the Water Treaty between Mexico and the U.S. of February 1944, Mexico is guaranteed annually 1½ million acre-feet of Colorado River water—from all sources. In the past, the dissolved salt content of the water delivered to Mexico has averaged about 750 ppm (parts per million), and Mexicali and San Luis Valley farmers have built up their farming practices and procedures based on water of this quality.

The Water Treaty does not provide for a guarantee of water quality, but "custom and usage," plus that of treaty administration in the "spirit of good will and friendly cooperation," morally demand that water of usable quality be delivered, if it is available, and this has been done until fairly recently.

Recently, however, a sudden and abrupt change was made in the quality of the water delivered to Mexico, this change having been brought about by the pumping of drainage water or “waste” from the Wellton-Mohawk Area of Arizona into the Gila River. This drainage water, with 6,400 ppm or more of dissolved salts, flows down the Gila to the Colorado, commingles with Colorado River water and then flows on to Mexico. Please note the attached map showing location of the Wellton-Mohawk Area and its nearness to the Colorado River and to Mexico.

¹ Transmits memorandum entitled "The Salt Water Problem of the Mexicali and San Luis Valleys." No classification marking. 4 pp. DOS, CF, 611.12322/3-762.

As a result of the above, Mexico is now receiving extremely poor quality water (with 3,500 ppm or more of dissolved salts)—water that is unsuitable for use on the “tight” soils of the Mexicali and San Luis Valleys.

In a 1953 report issued by the Arizona Underground Water Commission, an extract of same being attached, Nicholas A. Rose of Houston, William Guyton of Austin and R. J. Tipton of Denver, nationally known, reputable ground-water geologists forecast the cause and the source of the difficulty resulting in the delivery of poor quality water to Mexico and, at the same time, they also forecast the solution to the difficulty.

The first forecast made by Messrs. Rose, Guyton and Tipton has now been proven to be fully correct (the necessity of drainage pumping in the Wellton-Mohawk Area), and it is reasonable to assume that their second forecast is both sound and logical—that drainage water pumped from drainage wells will improve, because of dilution with good quality Colorado River water used in the Wellton-Mohawk Area, until it becomes entirely suitable for irrigation purposes. When this second forecast comes about, as it undoubtedly will, the Mexicali-San Luis difficulty will come to an end.

In the meantime, however, some 400,000 acres or more of Mexicali-San Luis farmland is being injured and a very large number of owners unnecessarily penalized for the benefit of a limited number of owners of some 75,000 acres in the Wellton-Mohawk Area.

The Bureau of Reclamation of the U.S. Department of Interior, the agency responsible for the Wellton-Mohawk drainage pumping, may be within its legal rights in pumping drainage waste into the bed of the Gila River even if it knows that such “waste” will end up on Mexican farmland; however, it is morally wrong and it is not being a good neighbor by throwing its waste over its fence onto its neighbor’s property.

The Bureau of Reclamation had ample notice and warning of the forthcoming necessity of drainage pumping in the Wellton-Mohawk Area, and had it commenced the solution to this particular reclamation project some years ago, it could have been easily worked out to the best interests of all concerned. A reclamation problem is not solved by merely moving it from one location to another.

If there is an urge and desire to do so, this problem and difficulty can still be solved without serious damage or injury to either party.

J.M.J.

189. DOS Policy Directive PD/ARA-3.1, March 15¹

March 15, 1962

SUBJECT

Mexico—Mexico's Protest on Salinity of Colorado River Water

References: None.

Objective:

To develop through the International Boundary and Water Commission (IBWC) complementary programs for the United States and Mexico, so that the most beneficial use will be made of the water delivered to Mexico under the Treaty of 1944, and as little of the water lost as possible.

Plan of Action:

1. The Commission should complete its review of every feasible means of solution and recommend the measures the two Governments should take to remove the problem. This is being done.

2. The Departments of State and Interior should consult with appropriate Congressional leaders, and should decide soonest whether it is better tactically and legally to present an appropriations request for the US portion of the program in the budget of the Department of the Interior or the IBWC. The program should then be presented to the Bureau of the Budget and the Congress as soon as possible for the necessary appropriations.

3. Any construction required of the United States should be commenced at once, and Mexico should be urged to execute its complementary program at a similar rate.

¹ Mexico's protest on salinity of Colorado River water. Official Use Only. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Department and Agencies Series, DOS Policy Directives.

4. If Mexico seems to proceed in good faith with its own program, the United States should make every practical effort to minimize losses to Mexico pending completion of the complementary programs.

Action by:

US Section, International Boundary and Water Commission
B1, with assistance and guidance from Interior and Department Departments of Interior and State
B2 and B3, with assistance of US Section, IBWC
US Section, IBWC, Departments of State and Interior
B4

Addressees:

Department Distribution:

ARA US-IBW
H AID
O
L

Embassies:

Mexico City

Consulates:

Mexicali
Tijuana

Other Agencies:

White House
Bureau of the Budget
Interior
HEW
USIA

Authority:

ARA—Assistant Secretary Woodward

Concurrences:

Interior: Mr. Langley (in substance)
IBWC: Colonel Hewitt

190. Despatch 1347 from Mexico City, April 27, transmitting April 26 memorandum of conversation between Foreign Minister Tello and Ambassador Mann¹

Mexico City, April 27, 1962

SUBJECT:

Mexican Proposals re Chamizal and Ojinaga Dispute

On April 26, 1962, Ambassador Mann was called to the Foreign Office regarding the Chamizal and Ojinaga questions. These two areas are tracts in dispute on the U.S.-Mexican frontier.

Attached as Enclosure No. 1 is a memorandum of conversation. The map and memorandum referred to are being forwarded to the Department under separate cover.

For the Ambassador:

Eugene V. McAuliffe
First Secretary of Embassy

Department: Please pouch IBWC/Mr. Friedkin, El Paso.

Enclosure

MEMORANDUM OF CONVERSATION

SUBJECTS

Chamizal and Ojinaga

PARTICIPANTS

Foreign Minister Manuel Tello
Ambassador Thomas C. Mann
Mr. Frank V. Ortiz, Second Secretary of Embassy

During the course of Ambassador Mann's call on the Foreign Minister on April 26, the Minister referred to the suggestion which he had made previously in proposing an agenda, that the visit of President Kennedy to Mexico be used as an opportunity to resolve the long-standing Chamizal dispute (a disputed tract on the U.S.-Mexican boundary at El Paso, Texas). The Minister said that purely as a provisional, personal and non-official suggestion he was giving the Ambassador a map and a memorandum which he thought could serve as a basis for resolving this problem. After studying the map, Ambassador Mann told the Minister that although engineering requirements might dictate some modifications of the Minister's proposal he now believed that there was a basis for exploration with the appropriate U.S. officials. The Ambassador said that at the earliest opportunity he would discuss the Foreign Minister's proposal with the appropriate U.S. officials. Ambassador Mann made it clear to the Minister that in his view it was necessary for both governments to decide precisely on the details of the settlement of the Chamizal dispute before any public announcement could be made.

¹ Mexican proposals re Chamizal and Ojinaga dispute. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 611.1232/4-2762.

The Minister then turned to the Ojinaga problem which also relates to a disputed area on the U.S.-Mexican border. The Minister hoped it would be possible for the Presidents to agree to a settlement of this question. He acknowledged that the Ojinaga dispute had been sent to the International Boundary and Water Commission for resolution twice previously and that the Commissioners were unable to reach agreement. He, therefore, thought it might be possible for the two Governments to give the IBWC guidance toward a solution. The Minister asked the Ambassador for an unofficial and provisional map showing a line in the Ojinaga area upon which the United States would be willing to negotiate. The Ambassador told the Minister he would attempt to do so but would have to rely on the experts for this. The Minister agreed with the Ambassador that if the Ojinaga dispute was settled, the Boundary Commissioners would be instructed to determine an equitable settlement of other areas along the Rio Grande that are in dispute.

191. Memorandum from Ambassador Mann to Edwin M. Martin, May 19¹

May 19, 1962

SUBJECT

Salinity of Colorado River Water

I. Problem The Wellton Mohawk irrigation district in Arizona, which was rehabilitated in 1952, installed a drainage system which began discharging to the Gila River and thence the Colorado River in September 1961 underground water which contains an amount of salts four times greater than the amount taken into the district in Colorado River water. Its present drainage system consists of some 70 pumps which draw water from a depth of about 100 feet and discharge the water into a lined conveyance channel on the project. Water brought into the project from the Colorado River is used to replace the water pumped out. As a result of this operation, the salinity of the water delivered to Mexico jumped from less than 1,000 p.p.m. in the winter of 1960 to around 2,500–2,800 p.p.m. in the winter of 1961. The Mexican Government has protested vigorously and threatens to take the matter to the International Court of Justice. In substance, the Mexican Government is insisting that the the United States must maintain a “salt balance” in the Wellton-Mohawk district.

II. Present Status of Problem A joint group of US and Mexican scientists was appointed, at the request of the Presidents of the US and Mexico, to study the problem and recommend a solution within 45 days. We expected a final joint report on May 15, but it has not been received because the Mexican Government doubts that the solution proposed by the US scientists would give adequate relief during an interim period of some 10 to 15 years before Wellton-Mohawk achieves “salt balance”. Mexico agrees that over the long run the proposal of the US scientists would solve the problem.

The US scientists are proposing major modifications in the drainage system of the Wellton-Mohawk district. The major features of this proposal are: (a) installation of more pumps which will permit more pumping in summer to compensate for reduced or no pumping in winter and the tapping of areas where better quality water is present in the 90,000 acre district, (b) a by-pass lined drainage canal to permit dumping below Mexico’s diversion point drainage water with a salinity index of more than 4,000 p.p.m. and (c) a new drainage canal which would be used to deliver to the river water with a salinity of less than 4,000 p.p.m. (The scientists chose a breaking point of 4,000 p.p.m. because this was the lowest that they calculated they could go and still obtain the quantity of water needed as return flow.)

¹ Salinity of Colorado River water. Confidential. 6 pp. DOS, CF, 611.12323/5–1962.

The US scientists considered over a dozen proposals and settled on this one because it comes closest to satisfying the desires of both Mexico and the Wellton-Mohawk irrigation district. It would cost in the neighborhood of $20 million. Because Wellton-Mohawk has a closed underground basin, the US scientists suggested that the basin be used for river regulation. During the winter months Mexico is required to take only 900 second feet of water but actually receives an average of 1340 second feet. If some system were available to store the difference of 440 second feet and deliver it in the summer months, the US would get full credit. The scientists propose to store it in the underground basin at Wellton-Mohawk after the basin is cleaned out. This would save an estimated 75,000 acre feet of water annually which the Chairman of the US scientific group estimates to be worth $7,500,000. (It might be noted that the US gets no credit for Wellton-Mohawk drainage water now because it is all in excess of Mexico's order in the winter and it could therefore be wasted in winter without any loss to the US.)

The only other alternative which the US scientists considered as a serious possibility was a complete system of tile drains. This would provide drainage water with a salinity index of 3,000 ppm. In the interim period of 10 to 15 years this would be a preferable solution for Mexico. However, in the long run, the highly saline waters under Wellton-Mohawk would percolate up and pass out through the drains raising the salinity of the water possibly to a point where it would be unusable in the winter. The cost of tile drains was estimated at $45 million. Such a system was absolutely unacceptable to Wellton-Mohawk because it would have denied the district an underground reservoir. Further, the topography and other conditions in the Wellton-Mohawk indicate that a tile system would not be particularly satisfactory.

Based on discussions with the Bureau of Reclamation and Senator Hayden, I gather that the Bureau intends to look for some other solution which would give the Wellton-Mohawk irrigation district a full reservoir. Senator Hayden indicated, however, that if the Bureau would indorse the proposal of the US scientists he would accept it. The Bureau of Reclamation is seeking funds on a supplemental basis to study the feasibility of the proposal of the US scientists and also other possibilities. Based on my discussions, it appears that Reclamation believes that a solution involving more pumping in summer and less in winter would work. It is considering asking for $2.5 million to install an additional 25 wells in Wellton-Mohawk. Presumably these pumps would be in operation in the summer of 1963 and permit the district to discharge about 50% more water. It would then pump 50% less in the winter of 1963–64. The US scientists considered this scheme and rejected it as unacceptable to Mexico. It would not do anything to help achieve salt balance in the next 10 to 15 years. The Director of the US Salinity Laboratory considers this the issue. Although he considers that Mexico will have to improve its drainage system, he does not believe this is of practical importance in solving the present problem. Considering all circumstances, he does not consider that it would be feasible to install a drainage system in the Mexicali Valley which could handle water with a salinity index of 2,500–2,800 p.p.m. especially because the water has such a high sodium content. The Imperial Valley of California, with comparable soils, receives water with 900 p.p.m. and is having difficulties.

III. Issue. The issue is whether the President should (i) require the Bureau of Reclamation to modify the drainage practices of the Wellton-Mohawk district along the lines suggested by the US scientists or (ii) let the International Court of Justice decide the matter. (Because acceptance of the alternative that the Bureau of Reclamation seems to have in mind of pumping more in summer and less in winter would lead to ICJ action by Mexico, it is not considered a possible choice for the President.)

A. Consequences of alternative (i)

1. Domestically

a. The Colorado Basin states, except Arizona, have indicated acquiescence in the proposal of the US scientists. They would, however, prefer to do nothing.

b. Arizona has not agreed because it considers the proposal does not give Wellton-Mohawk all it wants. The real resistance is from Wellton-Mohawk. Senator Hayden has indicated he would accept the proposal if recommended to him by the Bureau of Reclamation. (If Wellton-Mohawk is required to pay the cost of the proposal, then it is possible that all of the Basin States would oppose.)

2. With Mexico

Mexico accepts the proposal as providing a solution over the long run. Mexico questions the increase in salinity it would have to accept in the interim. The US scientists consider that the water in the interim will have a salinity around 1,500 p.p.m. and that Mexico should be able to use this water without difficulty if it puts in the drainage system it is planning. It is doubted Mexico would take the matter to the ICJ, but if it did we would be in a good posture.

B. Consequences of alternative (ii)

1. Domestically

The Basin States want to do nothing and they also want to avoid a court case. Arizona would seek through the Congress to prevent the President from allowing the US to accept ICJ jurisdiction. Because the issue involved concerns the interpretation of a Treaty and the obligations of the US under international law, the Legal Adviser of the Department considers that the ICJ would have jurisdiction and that the Connelly Amendment would not apply. The Basin States seem to feel that the US would win, but they could lose much more from an adverse ICJ decision (as explained below) than from a decision by the President.

2. Internationally

a. Unless the President can give the Mexican President some assurance on how we plan to proceed in carrying out the recommendations of the US scientists, it will probably have an adverse effect on the President's visit. The Mexicans will probably consider the key to our attitude whether we act promptly to build a bypass channel to keep the highly saline waters out of the river.

b. Relations between the US and Mexico would become severely strained and we could expect only limited cooperation from Mexico. Mexico could be expected to assert that our action made a mockery of the Alliance for Progress and Mexico's attitude would hurt the program.

c. We know that Mexico will take the case to the ICJ. It might take several years to get a decision. It is likely that the US would be required to modify its irrigation practices to take into account the interests of Mexico. This decision might take the form of requiring the US to maintain a "salt balance" at Wellton-Mohawk. The ICJ might alternatively say that the US is required to treat equally all riparian users lower than Wellton-Mohawk. At present Mexico receives all return flows. The US might be required to divide them equitably. While the case is pending, Mexico might have to forego all production in the winter to avoid ruining its soils permanently. Winter production in the Mexicali Valley is valued at $30 million and this would be part of the damages.

d. Mexico would probably take the issue to the OAS. Mexico would probably get the support of all the Latin American countries because existing resolutions of the OAS support Mexico on the issue.

e. Mexico would also take the matter to the UN where documents and resolutions of the International Law Commission support Mexico's position. The US could expect little support for its position that it can deliver any water it wants to Mexico.

f. Mexico would probably cease to restrain the popular outcry against the US in Mexico.

g. Mexico would get strong support from the Soviet Bloc in international bodies and in Bloc propaganda output.

This memorandum has not discussed the alternative that the US might win in the ICJ, because I do not consider this a serious possibility. The Wellton-Mohawk district, the seven Basin States, and the Department of the Interior, base their position on the interpretation of the Treaty in the hearings before the US Senate. In that hearing the witnesses for the Treaty said that the US could deliver return flows to Mexico regardless of salt content which were the result of normal agricultural development in the US. These witnesses expected gradually increased salinity over the years as the Colorado Basin developed. One Reclamation witness testified that this might reach 2,700 ppm at ultimate development. Mr. Tipton, one of the principal negotiators of the Treaty for the US, indicated that he did not consider it possible that the salinity of the water would ever get so high that it could not be beneficially used by Mexico. If it did, however, he thought Mexico would have to accept it as part of the Treaty water. I am inclined to believe that the interpretation of the witnesses was correct. At least we would have a strong case in court. But I think it is a distinct possibility that the court would hold that the US had to distribute equitably among all users the return flows and could not deliver all of them to Mexico.

Whatever the interpretation, I think it has little to do with the case before us. The facts are that the United States suddenly, and without notice to Mexico, began emptying an underground lake of saline water in the Wellton-Mohawk district and dumping this salty water into the river for delivery to Mexico. Wellton-Mohawk contends that when Mexico agreed to accept waters from the Colorado River "from any and all sources" it agreed to accept the underground salt water from Wellton-Mohawk. The hearings before the Mexican Senate clearly show that Mexico did not understand the Treaty that way and indicate that there was no meeting of the minds on this point. Sound irrigation and drainage practice requires the maintenance of a salt balance and irrigation in the Colorado River basin is based on this concept. No irrigation district in the US has a guarantee as to quality but is expected to accept water which is the result of salt balance. The master's report in the case of Arizona v. California would go a long way toward making this law by providing that no irrigation district could get credit for return flows that cannot be beneficially used by the lower riparian. Mexico is asking that the US show the same solicitude for Mexico that it shows for US irrigation districts. No one has brought to my attention a single US or international law case that would support the contention of the Wellton-Mohawk district. On the contrary, all US law and such international law as there is on the subject would forbid the drainage practices of the Wellton-Mohawk district. The general rules of US law and international law require that persons act reasonably when their acts would affect others. No court could hold that Wellton-Mohawk may dump salt into the river with impunity because if it did it would set a precedent on water rights of riparians that would sanction anarchy and be ruinous to irrigated agriculture.

192. Memorandum from Roger Hilsman to Edwin M. Martin, June 13¹

June 13, 1962

SUBJECT

Mexico and the Alliance for Progress

The following study on Mexico has been prepared in connection with the meeting of the Latin American Policy Committee to be held June 14.

Background

The Mexican Revolution of 1910 broke down old barriers of caste and race and gave the government an important role as provider of basic economic and social services. The government has also long functioned as arbiter between labor and capital, giving benefits to each group as needed to assure political stability. Important commercial and industrial groups, commercial farmers in the northern states, and much of urban labor, especially privileged union groups such as the petroleum workers, have been fundamentally satisfied with moderate course pursued by the government in recent decades. Becoming increasingly restive are those groups which have not benefited economically from the revolution. These include particularly the communal farmers and peasants of the central plateau area where the pressure of burgeoning population on small, uneconomic plots of land is reducing levels of living, breeding unrest, and leading to troublesome urbanization of unskilled labor.

Political situation

Mexico is ruled by the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI), which maintains virtually absolute control over the political life of the country. Nearly 40 years in office, the PRI governs in the name of the continuing Mexican Revolution and is the only channel through which political advancement can be obtained. The party embraces heterogeneous groups of political elements ranging from the extreme left to the conservative right and has had remarkable success in accommodating and reconciling the divergent interests and ambitions of its members. President López Mateos, in keeping with his own views, has followed a left-of-center course on occasion radical enough to satisfy even the extreme left, but has stopped short of actions which would alienate the more conservative elements within the PRI.

¹ Mexico and the Alliance for Progress. Confidential. 6 pp. DOS, CF, 712.00/6-1362.

The political climate became openly unsettled during 1961 when left-wing extremists, including some elements within the government party, PRI, made a bold effort to increase their influence, claiming that Castro-like policies were necessary to halt what they depicted as a drift from the original aims of the Mexican Revolution. A large role was played by left-leaning former President Cárdenas, who still commands the affection and loyalty of numbers of Mexicans, especially among the peasants and small communal farmers (ejidatarios). Despite his leftist leanings, however, Cárdenas has remained within the PRI.

The intensification of leftwing activities shook the business community and other moderate elements, which responded with a vigorous anti-Communist campaign. Partly as a result of this campaign and of the gradual decline of Castro's appeal throughout the hemisphere, middle-of-the-road Mexicans seemingly have regained the political initiative. Jockeying preliminary to presidential elections in July 1964 has already begun.

Communism

Mexico has long been a major center for the international Communist movement in Latin America. Mexican sympathies for the social revolutionary aspects of the Cuban revolution, historic opposition to intervention, and suspicion of the US fostered by historic relations, have provided an atmosphere from which the communist movement has profited recently. Estimated membership in a miniscule Trotskyite party (POCM), the 3,000-member orthodox Mexican Communist Party (PCM), and a much larger Marxist party (PPS) totals somewhat under 50,000. The PCM exercises strong influence in the Movement of National Liberation (MLN), a rabidly anti-US, pro-Cuban mass organization established in 1961 under the leadership of leftist ex-President Cárdenas. The Mexican Government continues to tolerate extreme leftists in the Foreign Ministry and other departments and in the educational system. Communists are also prominent in some peasant groups and a few labor unions. The large student federation at the National University, and its affiliated schools is not Communist-directed, but is given to irresponsibility and has on occasion been effectively manipulated by its strong Communist minority.

Economic situation

Economic solutions are not readily available for the problem of the increasingly discontented rural and slum-dwelling masses. It is now obvious that neglect of Mexico's human resources is posing both economic and political threats to the industrial and commercial elite. The population is increasing by about 1 million persons or 3.1% annually, bringing roughly 350,000 people into the labor force each year. The cheapness of labor and its low productivity constitute increasing major deterrents to improving levels of living. Nevertheless, Mexico is not without assets in coping with the problems of an unfinished revolution and the stresses of economic development.

Mexican economic development has been considerable since 1940 when industrialization began in earnest. Since then, the physical output of goods has more than doubled with average real growth in excess of 6% a year through 1956. From 1957 to 1960 the annual growth rate slowed down to an average of 5% dropping to 3.5% in 1961 and adding only a little to per capita income in the face of a population increase estimated at 3.1% per annum. Nevertheless, per capita income has risen considerably for the period as a whole and now is equivalent to US$320. Furthermore, Mexican output has acquired a composition characteristic of a reasonably advanced economy. Industry (manufacturing, construction, petroleum and electric power) accounts for over 35% of GNP, considerably more than agriculture with 20%. And even in agriculture a large part of the output is from commercial rather than subsistence farming. Mexican exports are more diversified than those of any other Latin American country, and only 20% of imports are consumer goods.

The public sector of the economy—when measured in terms of its direct contribution to the GNP—seems to occupy a minor role. To be sure, the government owns the petroleum industry, the electric power industry and the railroads; some major steel plants, fertilizer plants, railroad equipment plants and various lesser industrial establishments; a number of commercial and industrial banks; organizations engaged in the distribution of foodstuffs and newsprint; and a variety of other institutions. Still, the activities of these enterprises plus those of the governmental institutions proper account for little more than one-tenth of GNP. The total tax burden in Mexico is among the lowest in the world—around 11% of GNP. Limited revenues, which from 1957–1960 failed to grow as fast as real GNP, have meant substantial federal deficits in recent years as the government has rapidly increased capital expenditures and spending for social services while paying out subsidies to state enterprises, particularly the railways, petroleum and electric power entities. Aware of its need to improve its financial position the administration has introduced a limited income tax reform, which will increase revenue from that source to some extent and has lately indicated that it may move to reduce subsidization and limit access to central banking financing of deficits.

The government's role in capital formation is far larger than its contribution to GNP, currently accounting for around 40% of total investment. This proportion is rather low by Latin American standards although it has been increasing since 1957 as a result of expanded government outlays in the face of a slight decline in private investment as a percentage of real GNP. Since 1956 approximately 80% of government investment has gone into irrigation, electric power, petroleum and transportation with most of the balance going to social investment in public health, housing, education and research.

During the period 1962-64 most government investment is scheduled to increase in absolute terms with irrigation and social investment intended to increase most sharply over 1961 levels. In the absence of new taxes or reduction of subsidies, ambitious increases in government spending will require extremely large-scale internal or external financing.

The private sector of the Mexican economy has been one of the most dynamic in Latin America. It has successfully installed a full range of consumers' goods industries and many producers' goods plants, developed commercial agriculture for the local and export markets, and improved marketing and distribution systems.

The slowdowns in the rate of private capital formation and in the overall rate of growth in the period since 1957 are of obvious concern. There is no precise explanation of the trend but many factors have been mentioned and they have doubtless had a cumulative, negative effect. Among them are the sluggishness of the US economy, which has a depressing economic and psychological effect on Mexican business; the lower world prices obtaining for exports of coffee, cotton, and Mexican minerals; a lessening of easy opportunities for small investments yielding high returns; limitations placed on the internal market by inequitable distribution of income; and the limited availability of credit for the private sector in recent years. In addition, private loss of confidence stems from the fears of domestic capital regarding government intervention in business, apprehensions of foreign capital concerning the Mexicanization of enterprises, fears of radical social reforms and fears of Castro-communism. Such fears brought on a serious capital flight in 1961.

Economic prospects

Improvement in economic conditions in the United States would provide a much-needed shoring up of the confidence of the ruling bourgeoisie and induce them to renew their previously vigorous entrepreneurial operations. Mexico, more than any other Latin American country, is locked into the US economy on which it depends in myriad ways—as its chief market, source of tourist receipts, outlet for surplus labor, supplier of foreign investment and technology and, to an important extent, a moulder of businessmen's attitudes. The direction of Mexico's GNP curve since 1940 has closely paralleled that of the United States and there is a strong likelihood that if the US economy pulls ahead Mexico will again achieve satisfactory growth rates.

In terms of its own resources and efforts, there are a number of steps that Mexico can take to encourage development. A step-up in gross domestic investment might be accomplished by reducing the threat of government competition with private enterprise. At the same time a fiscal policy that helps to redistribute income somewhat and increase demand for local manufactures and services could stimulate business. Correction of the urban-rural imbalance cannot be quickly realized but gradual improvement could be achieved with additional rural credit to small as well as large farmers and by transplanting of excess population from the central plateau to newly developing regions in the south-central area. Vocational education for the more restless, urbanizing elements of the rural population would also facilitate transfer into urban occupations.

Alliance for Progress prospects

Mexico is likely to be only a limited partner in the Alliance for Progress. The country's strong nationalism is expected to limit its willingness to advertise cooperation with the United States' Alliance programs. A government investment plan has been submitted to the OAS and the IBRD and a program of frontier development designed to renovate border towns along the Rio Grande has been announced. Officials and financial experts continue to resist planning for development on a national basis, preferring to draft plans by sector, such as railroads, power, irrigation or a specific industrial development. It seems probable that Mexico will continue to rely on IBRD and Ex-Im bank loans for external financing of major economic overhead projects.

Mexico's interest in foreign aid for social overhead projects will be shaped by domestic political decisions. Depending on the exigencies of the moment, Mexico may seek loans for rural credit, colonization and possibly housing. The country's nationalistic views regarding education will probably limit its interest in foreign assistance in this field.

If the commercial and industrial interests that have guided policy for nearly two decades continue to dominate the political situation, it seems probable that they will not encourage projects that build up government economic operations. They view government as a useful partner for private capital and as a buffer against large-scale popular demands. They do not wish to see a build up of new privileged sectors of the population although they would probably permit limited assistance to the masses if it reduced politically dangerous unrest.

193. Memorandum of conversation, June 29, between President Kennedy, President Lopez Mateos, and Minister Tello¹

June 29, 1962

SUBJECT

Flow of Private Capital

PARTICIPANTS

President Kennedy
President Lopez Mateos
Minister Tello
Ambassador Mann
Ambassador Carrillo Flores

President Kennedy opened the conversation by expressing his gratification and thanks for the warm reception he had received and inquired about the youth organization which he had seen on the route from the airport. President Lopez Mateos said this was an organization under the direction of the Ministry of Education and had three purposes: Physical education, civic education and cultural education.

President Lopez Mateos suggested that Ambassador Moscoso and Mr. Linder of the Export-Import Bank meet with the Minister of Finance and with the Minister of National Patrimony. President Kennedy agreed.

President Kennedy lamented the fact that private capital today seemed to be [illegible in the original] and frightened. He spoke of the need for private investment in order to [illegible in the original] adequate economic growth rate and the importance of confidence on the [illegible in the original] private capital. The President remarked that Canadian difficulties today stemmed in part from a Canadian desire to reduce the rate of United States private investments in Canada; but this had had the effect of slowing down economic growth and creating a balance of payments problem. President Kennedy also spoke of his hope that United States private investments would flow in greater volume to developing countries rather than to the highly industrialized European Common Market. President Lopez Mateos appeared to be in agreement and made some reference to the fact that a newspaper article in a small town paper was adequate to cause flight of capital from Mexico.

¹ Flow of private capital. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, Presidential Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.

In the course of the discussion, President Lopez Mateos invited President Kennedy to speak freely concerning any topic that was on his mind and mentioned that he particularly wished to discuss later the question of salt water as well as broader questions of the Alliance for Progress and hemisphere relations.

194. Memorandum of conversation, June 29, between President Kennedy, President Lopez Mateos, and Foreign Minister Tello¹

Part I

June 29, 1962

SUBJECT

Salinity Problem

PARTICIPANTS

President Kennedy
President Lopez Mateos
Foreign Minister Tello
Ambassador Mann
Mr. Martin
Ambassador Carrillo Flores

President Kennedy opened the discussion by indicating that the present situation with respect to salinity of the water being delivered to the Mexicali Valley is unsatisfactory. He hoped that agreement could be reached on means for correcting this, as he was not happy with what we had been doing. While there were no provisions in the treaty with respect to salt content, the United States should seek in a friendly spirit to help maintain the quality of the water. We thought we would be able to keep the salt at reasonable levels until the end of 1963, and by then hoped to have worked out a solution to the problem. Any solution would require funds, and therefore a major part of our problem is satisfying the Congress as to its fairness.

¹ Salinity problem. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, Presidential Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.

President Lopez Mateos expressed concern that by 1963 there might be irreparable damage and felt that a canal to waste saline waters to the Gulf was required.

President Kennedy felt we must keep the scientific panel studying the question in order to come up with a solution. He emphasized that we could not contemplate any change in the Treaty itself, as the Senate would not approve any change. He pointed out that work needed to be done in Mexicali to improve the drainage. He stressed that we are concerned about the problem and that we will do all we can but it will take a cooperative effort.

President Lopez Mateos confirmed that Mexico had a long time plan to improve Mexicali's drainage. He thought that this was a problem which must be solved in a practical manner as quickly as possible, and nothing done in the Mexicali Valley would provide a solution.

President Kennedy said that we are anxious to meet our responsibilities but water is a very short commodity and there are wrong feelings about it. We would work ahead vigorously in the Executive Branch and with the Congress.

Ambassador Mann urged that Mexico submit an application to the IBRD for funds to undertake the works in the Valley. He felt this would be very helpful to us in securing action on our side.

President Lopez Mateos said this would be of no value if the United States did not reduce the salt content.

Ambassador Mann agreed, but said we must each have faith that the other would act.

President Kennedy affirmed again that we are going to do the best we can in face of difficult problems to correct the situation which had been created from our side of the border. We would keep in touch with the President of Mexico on our progress, and hoped that he would see what he could do on his side.

195. Memorandum of conversation, June 29, between President Kennedy, President Lopez Mateos and Foreign Minister Tello¹

Part II

June 29, 1962

SUBJECT

Communism in Latin America

PARTICIPANTS

President Kennedy
President Lopez Mateos
Foreign Minister Tello
Ambassador Mann
Mr. Martin
Ambassador Carrillo Flores

President Kennedy brought up the subject of the danger of the spread of Communism in Latin America, particularly in the Caribbean basin, as a result of Sino/Soviet influence in Cuba and the use of Cuba as a springboard.

President Kennedy first asked whether President Lopez Mateos thought that the Cuban people would be able in the foreseeable future to recover their sovereignty from the Castro regime. President Lopez Mateos expressed the opinion that while the Castro regime had lost ground with the Cuban people because it had perverted the original purposes of the revolution and had come under the influence of the Communist bloc, it seemed doubtful, as a practical matter, that the Cuban people would be able to do very much about it in the foreseeable future because of the nature and military strength of the Castro regime. President Lopez Mateos doubted that the Communist revolution could gradually become a national type of revolution such as the one which took place in Mexico.

There was some discussion about the ability and disposition of the Soviet Union to give meaningful aid to Cuba.

President Kennedy, following up on President Lopez Mateos' appraisal of Castro's chances for survival, then asked what President Lopez Mateos thought could be done to prevent the spread of Soviet power and doctrine via Cuba to other American Republics. President Kennedy mentioned his concern with Soviet activities in countries like Venezuela, Colombia, Guatemala and Ecuador. Guerrilla activities in Colombia and the recent revolts in Venezuela were specifically mentioned.

¹ Communism in Latin America. Secret. 3 pp. DOS, Presidential Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.

President Lopez Mateos acknowledged that this was a very difficult question. He said that Mexico had the ability to deal with Communist subversion and implied each country should take whatever measures are necessary to defend itself. Mr. Tello suggested at this point that it is important that Latin American countries prevent their territories from being used as a base of operations against other American Republics.

President Lopez Mateos repeated the familiar Mexican thesis: The important thing is to create better economic and social conditions and especially to provide jobs. When the people were better off, he thought it would not be easy for the Communists to lead them astray. He stressed his opinion that the Alliance for Progress is the best way to combat Communism.

President Kennedy replied that he did not underestimate the importance of economic growth and social progress; nor was he suggesting that Communism was an immediate danger in the United States or Mexico. But he pointed out it would take a decade to achieve the objectives of the Alliance for Progress even under the best of conditions. In the meantime, the question was: What did Mexico think should be done to prevent the spread of Communism in other American Republics? President Kennedy pointed out that, as Cuba shows, once a Communist regime has fastened itself on a country, it is most difficult for the people to rid themselves of it.

The Foreign Minister then recalled that Mexico was the first country at Punta del Este to openly espouse the doctrine of incompatibility between Cuba and the inter-American system and argued that this was a very substantial contribution to the success of Punta del Este because this was the thesis that prevailed rather than the Colombian or Peruvian doctrines. He explained again the Mexican juridical doctrine of the necessity for amending the Charter of the OAS so that there would be a sound legal basis for collective action.

The Foreign Minister went on to say that the Castro regime had made many "mistakes" and in his opinion would continue to make mistakes. He said that Chile, for example, had recently been on the verge of breaking relations with Cuba. (Ambassador Carrillo Flores later informed Ambassador Mann that he interpreted Tello's statements about Castro's "mistakes" to mean that Mexico might later break relations with the Castro regime because of its interventionist tendencies in Mexico).

President Kennedy returned again and again to his question of what President Lopez Mateos thought was the best way to deal with the obvious danger of an expansion of Communist influence in Latin America. President Lopez Mateos each time repeated his view that rapid economic development and social progress was the answer. In the end he said he would give the matter more thought.

In the course of the discussion, President Kennedy stated that the United States wished to deal with the problem of Communist penetration in the hemisphere in cooperation with other Latin American states like Mexico. He said he wanted to keep in close touch with Mexico on this point and to reach agreement on practical measures which could be taken by American states to deal with the threat. He said the United States had no plans at the present time for unilateral military action against the Castro regime.

196. Memorandum of conversation, June 30, between President Kennedy, President Lopez Mateos, and Foreign Minister Tello¹

June 30, 1962

SUBJECT

Salinity and other problems

PARTICIPANTS

President Kennedy
President Lopez Mateos
Foreign Minister Tello
Ambassador Mann
Ambassador Carrillo Flores
Mr. Martin
Senator Mike Mansfield

The meeting was opened with further considerable discussion of the salinity problem as it would be treated in the Communiqué. After the language had been worked out, President Lopez Mateos expressed his concern that the situation might become acute again after October 1963 which would be a very active period in preparation for the 1964 elections in Mexico. President Kennedy said he would do his best to prevent a recurrence of the difficulties which the Mexicans had experienced last fall.

¹ Salinity problem on the lower Colorado River and other problems. Confidential.
2 pp. DOS, CF, 611.12/6-3062.

There followed considerable discussion of the Communiqué on the subject of the Chamizal problem. At the conclusion of this discussion President Kennedy proposed that our experts continue to work on drawing up an appropriate line, with the Mexicans realizing the difficulty of taking land that had been built on and lived on by American residents of El Paso since the original award, and what would be possible in terms of compensation in lands less difficult for us to turn over. He thought we might seek a solution within the framework of an arrangement in which the United States would agree that the award was a just one which the United States should have accepted at the time it was made. Mexico would indicate that while it agreed with this view, it realized the changes that had taken place which made an accurate carrying out of the award very difficult, and as a gesture was accepting parcels of land elsewhere rather than at the exact location indicated by the award. President Lopez Mateos said he agreed with this.

Foreign Minister Tello, in response to a question from President Kennedy as to whether there were any points on which Mexico felt it might be in the wrong, said that Mexico was [omission in the original].

1. They would not support any action which was not related to the UN action.

2. They would not support anything which was related to positions taken at the Belgrade Conference.

3. They should defend aggressively the Alliance for Progress.

4. They should defend aggressively LAFTA.

5. In general, barriers to trade should be reduced and on this Mexico had in mind restrictions of the common market.

President Lopez Mateos, after expressing his appreciation for the exchange of views during the visit, said he was fully aware that recent Mexican actions, in particular with respect to Cuban matters, have created doubts in some parts of United States' opinion about Mexico's basic attitude on Cuba and the United States. He wished formally to assure President Kennedy and the people of the United States that in case any conflict should arise, Mexico would be glad to guard the United States' rear with its 35 million people. President Kennedy expressed his great appreciation for this, and said we would be glad to defend the Mexican flanks as well.

197. Memorandum from Brubeck to McGeorge Bundy, July 10¹

July 10, 1962

SUBJECT

Status of Salinity Problem on Lower Colorado River and Chamizal Dispute

1. Salinity Problem on Lower Colorado River

The United States Commissioner on the International Boundary and Water Commission and the Chairman of the United States panel of scientists studying the salinity problem went to Mexico City about June 16 in what proved to be a final attempt to reach agreement with the Mexican scientists on a joint report. This attempt followed a personal letter from the Secretary of State to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Mexico, in which the Secretary urged that the Mexican scientists be permitted to sign a joint report on which tentative agreement was reached on May 8. The effort was unsuccessful because the Mexican Government wanted to include a strong reservation as to the adequacy of the proposals of the United States panel and insisted, if any discussion of the Mexicali Valley were included, that the report state that the facts demonstrated that the situation in the Mexicali Valley was not responsible for the salinity problem. The United States panel saw little merit in a joint report which highlighted the disagreement between the scientists of the two countries. Although the panel considers that the crux of the problem is a reduction in the amount of salt discharged to the river by the Wellton-Mohawk irrigation district in Arizona, it did not feel it could agree to a paragraph which stated that the situation in the Mexicali Valley had nothing to do with the problem.

The United States panel has now prepared a separate report of which a draft has been furnished to the Departments of State and Interior. As soon as it has been approved by the panel members it will be submitted formally to the United States Commissioner. The panel is expected to propose three possible solutions, the most promising of which involves the by-passing of saline waters without charge to Mexico. The United States Commissioner has prepared his comments and recommendations and will forward them with the report as soon as it is submitted to him. The Bureau of Reclamation has re-programmed $50,000 of fiscal year 1962 funds, and will re-program an additional $335,000 of fiscal year 1963 funds to complete engineering studies of the proposals which the panel is expected to make. The Chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, in agreeing to this re-programming, stipulated that none of the funds could be used to study any proposal involving the by-passing of saline water to the Gulf of California nor any proposal that did not charge to Mexico all drainage water from the Wellton-Mohawk irrigation district. So long as this restriction applies, it will not be possible to investigate the proposal which the United States panel considers offers the best possibilities for a satisfactory solution.

¹ Status of salinity problem on lower Colorado River and Chamizal dispute. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Mexico, General, June to September, 1962.

2. Chamizal

The United States Commissioner on the International Boundary and Water Commission has let a contract for an aerial photograph of the Chamizal area. This is the first step in engineering studies to determine the feasibility of relocating the river in the El Paso area to "cut" to Mexico as much as practical of the Chamizal tract. He also plans to obtain estimates on (1) the value of land and improvements in the Chamizal, (2) the cost of relocation of public utility and power lines, the railroad, and Franklin irrigation canal and (3) construction costs for the new river channel and levees. In view of the public controversy which has been stirred in El Paso because of the discussion of the Chamizal issue, the Commissioner plans to wait until public debate quiets before he proceeds with the appraisals which of necessity would have to be done on a fairly public basis.

Ambassador Mann discussed Chamizal with the Mexican Foreign Minister on July 6. He urged that Mexico agree to accept our version of the 1864 river line (which would mean that the Chamizal tract contains 420 acres) if the United States is to agree to accept the Chamizal award. The Ambassador considers it would be physically possible, without injury to El Paso, to relocate the Rio Grande so that 420 acres would be cut to Mexico from the Chamizal tract or immediately adjacent thereto. The Foreign Minister showed no disposition to compromise on his position that the United States should accept the award, agree to Mexico's version of the 1864 river under which Chamizal consists of 457 acres, and give the acreage to Mexico in one cut in El Paso.

Ambassador Mann plans to brief the Governor of Texas, as well as the two candidates for Governor. It was not possible to work this out during the weekend July 7-8, but the Ambassador is prepared to do so any time after July 20 if agreeable to Vice President Johnson and Governor Daniels. Congressman Rutherford, in whose district El Paso is located, is being kept fully informed of all developments.

The United States Commissioner is preparing several alternative locations for the Rio Grande at El Paso which he believes would be acceptable to El Paso. He will discuss these with Ambassador Mann, and the Ambassador will then seek an appointment with the Mexican President in an effort to reach an understanding that will provide a basis for the negotiation of a treaty on this matter. Unless such an understanding can be reached, it would not appear politically possible to consider recognizing the arbitration award rendered in 1911.

*/s/ Warren Slater
for*

William H. Brubeck
Executive Secretary

198. Memorandum from Brubeck to McGeorge Bundy,
December 14¹

December 14, 1962

SUBJECT

Sale of Minesweepers to Mexico

Early in 1961 the Government of Mexico expressed interest in purchasing a number of American minesweepers which had been declared surplus by the Department of the Navy. This interest caused considerable concern in American shrimp fishing circles owing to the continuing shrimp vessel seizure problem with Mexico. Mexico claims nine miles of territorial sea; the United States recognizes but three. The consequences of this controversy have been repeated molestation of American shrimp boats operating outside of three miles off the coast of Mexico in the Gulf of Mexico, including their seizure and the imposition of fines for alleged illegal fishing in Mexican waters (there have been well over 100 such seizures since 1950). It was feared that the acquisition by Mexico of an additional patrol fleet would serve to heighten Mexican enforcement activity against the American shrimp-fishing fleet.

It was realized that it would be difficult for the United States to refuse to sell to Mexico since such vessels had been declared available for purchase by any member of the free world. However, we wanted to be satisfied that the vessels would be used only for naval purposes and not for patrol intended to hurt American fishing activities considered legitimate by the United States Government. Consequently, in discussions between the Department and the Mexican Embassy it was made clear that we would have difficulty considering the request unless the vessels would be used only for naval purposes. The Mexican Ambassador said he understood this problem and that the ships would not be used for patrol activities against shrimp boats.

¹ Sale of minesweepers to Mexico. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 712.5621/12-1462.

The Caribbean Defense Command and the Department of the Navy recommended the sale on military grounds to improve Mexico's patrol and minesweeping capabilities.

After thorough consideration, including consultation with the United States Embassy at Mexico City, and Mexican stipulation of the naval purposes for which the vessels would be used (not including fishery patrol) it was decided to approve the sale of the twenty minesweepers, provided:

"... that Embassy Mexico City should make a clear oral statement to the Mexican Foreign Office at the time the Mexican Government is informed of our willingness to make this sale . . . that the United States Government is not placing conditions on the sale, but wants the Mexican Government to understand that it would be a source of embarrassment in the relations between the two governments should any of the vessels concerned be used to seize United States shrimp boats outside a three mile limit from the Coast of Mexico."

The current furor regarding the transaction is attributable to a UPI story of November 24, 1962 from Tampico quoting an unnamed Mexican naval officer to the effect that the minesweepers were to be used against "pirate shrimp boats from Texas". Upon learning of this press story on November 28 the Department discussed it with the Mexican Ambassador. The Ambassador later informed the Department that he and the naval commander at Tampico had been authorized by the Foreign Minister and the Naval Minister to state that any such statement by a Mexican naval officer was unauthorized and that the minesweepers would be used by Mexico solely for naval purposes.

The Department has no information indicating that the Mexican Government has any plans for the vessels in question other than those naval purposes stipulated by the Mexican Government.

/s/ Howard Furnas
for

William H. Brubeck
Executive Secretary

199. Memorandum from Brubeck to McGeorge Bundy,
January 11¹

January 11, 1963

SUBJECT

Status report on negotiations for settlement of Chamizal dispute

This memorandum is in response to the President's request of January 9 to Assistant Secretary Martin for a status report on negotiations for settlement of the Chamizal dispute.

Ambassador Mann outlined informally to the Mexican Foreign Minister on August 9, 1962, a proposal for solution of the Chamizal dispute. At the same time he left with the Minister a draft note which would be delivered if Mexico considered the proposal a basis for negotiation. At the request of Vice President Johnson we did not press for a decision in September and October 1962 to keep the Chamizal dispute from becoming embroiled in the election campaign in Texas. Moreover, the President of Mexico and his Foreign Minister were on a trip to the Far East during October 1962. On January 4, the Foreign Minister informed Ambassador Mann that he would like to enter into detailed discussion of the salinity and Chamizal problems when the Ambassador returns to Mexico City on January 14.

The proposal which Ambassador Mann outlined informally to the Foreign Minister involves digging a new channel for the Rio Grande at El Paso which would transfer to Mexico a net of 437 acres of territory over which the United States now exercises jurisdiction. This is the most favorable offer we have considered making to Mexico in our 50-year effort to settle this dispute. The Mexican and United States Commissioners agreed that they could support a figure of 437 as the acreage south of the 1864 river which was awarded to Mexico in 1911. Previously the Mexican Government had insisted that the area south of the 1864 river consisted of 450 acres whereas the most we would agree to was 420 acres. Because of the location of buildings in the Chamizal Zone, particularly a high school, El Paso has been unwilling to agree to transfer more than 336 acres from the Chamizal Zone itself. It is prepared to make up the remainder of the acreage from the area east of Cordova Island. The "island" itself is under Mexican jurisdiction. In rectifying the river at El Paso, some 228 acres of Cordova Island which protrudes into downtown El Paso would be transferred to the

¹ Status report on negotiations for settlement of Chamizal dispute. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 611.1231/1-1163.

United States, and Mexico would be compensated with an equal acreage east of Cordova Island. The possibility that the northern half of Cordova Island would be transferred to El Paso is the feature of the proposal that makes a solution attractive to El Paso. The attached map shows this proposed solution.

The foregoing solution has been discussed with the Governor of Texas and city officials and civic groups in El Paso and is acceptable to them. We have also consulted with the Vice President's Office and interested Senators and Congressmen. A solution along these lines is also generally acceptable to them. Senator Tower has not approved the solution but stated he would go along with any solution approved by the people of El Paso. It is believed that Congressman Foreman, who now represents El Paso, would agree, but he made no commitment when Commissioner Friedkin briefed him on the dispute.

The Mexican Foreign Minister is not enthusiastic about our proposal for settlement. He wants as much as possible of the 437 acres to come from the Chamizal Zone. We are proposing that 336 acres come from the Chamizal Zone and 101 acres from the area east of and adjacent to Cordova Island. He apparently considers that Mexico should receive about 380 to 400 acres in the Chamizal Zone with the remainder to come from land east of Cordova Island. On the other hand, the proposal would be unacceptable to El Paso and Texas if we suggested any significant increase in the acreage in the Chamizal Zone to be transferred to Mexico or significantly decreased the acreage from Cordova Island which El Paso hopes to receive.

/s/ Walter Lubkeman
for

William H. Brubeck
Executive Secretary

Enclosure:

Map showing proposed solution.

200. Memorandum of conversation, February 15, between Ambassador Carrillo Flores and Robert M. Sayre¹

February 15, 1963

SUBJECT

Current Bilateral Problems Between U.S. and Mexico

PARTICIPANTS

Mr. Antonio Carrillo Flores, Ambassador to Mexico
Mr. Robert M. Sayre, CMA

1. The Ambassador began by referring to the conversation he had just had with Assistant Secretary Martin on the delivery of minesweepers to Mexico. He said he had talked to Foreign Minister Tello who agreed that he could inform the United States that it was reasonable for the United States to expect that the use of the minesweepers by Mexico would not create any difficulties for the United States Government. (Mr. Martin had discussed with the Ambassador reports that the Mexican Government might use the minesweepers which it was acquiring from the United States for enforcing its fishing regulations and had emphasized the embarrassment it would cause the United States Government if the minesweepers were used for this purpose).

2. The Ambassador inquired whether there were any new developments looking toward a solution of the salinity problem on the lower Colorado River. Mr. Sayre said that the Bureau of Reclamation had not completed its engineering study but it was expected to do so very soon and that we anticipated a report around March 1. He said that there had been meetings between the White House and Interior on the subject but that he was not aware of the exact outcome of these meetings. He could only say that the matter is being followed very closely by the White House in keeping with the statement in the Joint Communiqué of June 30, 1962.

3. The Ambassador referred to the Mexican offer to settle the Sabolo claim and inquired whether the claimants had settled their tax problems with the United States Government. Mr. Sayre said that the lawyers for the claimants planned to discuss the problem with the Department's lawyers on February 18.

4. Mr. Sayre said that Ambassador Mann would be discussing the Chamizal problem with interested persons in Texas beginning February 18. He hoped that the informal understanding on a line reached between Ambassador Mann and the Foreign Minister would be acceptable to El Paso.

¹ Current bilateral problems between the United States and Mexico. Confidential.
4 pp. DOS, CF, POL 33-1 MEX-US.

5. The Ambassador referred to the political situation in Mexico and to a short item in U.S. News and World Report to the effect that Diaz Ordaz, now Minister of Government, is the front-running candidate for the next President of Mexico. The item had stated that Diaz Ordaz was anti-communist and pro-American. The Ambassador said he had talked to the magazine's reporter in Mexico about the item and had passed on comments he had heard that it might have been planted by enemies of Diaz Ordaz. He said Mr. Migdail had told him that he had filed a lengthy report on Mexico in which Diaz Ordaz had been mentioned as the leading candidate. This was the only part of his report that his editors had seen fit to publish so far. The Ambassador considered the political situation in Mexico tranquil. He expounded the PRI philosophy that the party had to keep the leftist elements within the PRI if political tranquility is to be maintained. He observed that Lopez Mateos had to act with caution during this period before the elections in 1964 to avoid upsetting the political situation. The Ambassador thought that the next President of Mexico would be more to the center. He acknowledged that President Lopez Mateos was left of center and thought we could now expect a swing back toward the center. He considered Cardenas to be outside the PRI because Cardenas had put himself outside the official party. He considered the newly-formed CCI of little consequence and thought its formation would have gone unnoticed except for the presence of Cardenas at the inaugural sessions. He considered Maldonado, ex-Governor of Baja California, to be a politician of no consequence. He hoped that the Government would not have to act against Cardenas and the CCI, but, if it did, he thought the move would be against Cuauhtémoc Cardenas. He said Alejandro Carrillo was close to the President. He characterized Carrillo as a Marxist and exponent of the view that Mexico should move closer to the neutralist countries. Thus Carrillo had urged that Mexico participate in the Belgrade Conference. Mr. Sayre said his problem with the so-called neutralists was that they were not neutral but heaped criticism on the United States while praising the Soviet Union or at least not saying anything critical. The Ambassador agreed.

6. The Ambassador said he was holding conversations with the Director of the Smithsonian Institution for the purpose of arranging for an exhibition of Mexican art in the fall of 1963 or winter of 1964. It is the same exhibit which has been touring Europe. He hoped to arrange for an exhibition in other major cities in the United States. If a showing could be arranged at the National Gallery he hoped that it could be opened by the President. Mrs. Lopez Mateos (or possibly the Foreign Minister or Minister of Education) would come to the United States for the occasion. In view of the nature of the art exhibit, the Ambassador thought the only appropriate place for its showing in Washington would be the National Gallery. He thought January 1964 might be an appropriate time, but recognized that this was an especially busy time for the President. He also planned to discuss October or November 1963 as possibilities with the Director of the Smithsonian Institution.

7. The Ambassador referred to the proposed trip of President Lopez Mateos to France, Western Germany, the Netherlands, Yugoslavia and Poland. He said that his President was concerned that a trip to France at this time might be misunderstood in the United States. Mr. Sayre said that he did not think it would give rise to any particular misunderstanding. The Ambassador said that when President Lopez Mateos talked to him about the trip he had not mentioned all of the countries at once but had led him through a discussion of the problems vis-à-vis the United States of each country. He said he had inquired of the President why he had to go to Poland. He got essentially two reasons: 1) President Lopez Mateos wanted to visit Poland to see for himself how things are there and 2) visits to such countries are useful for demonstrating Mexico's independence of the United States. The Ambassador thought Mexico's views carried more weight in international meetings and was actually helpful to the United States if it had a reputation of being independent. He said the Mexican Congress would be called to approve the trip.

(The Ambassador made no suggestion at all that the visit might be expanded to include the Soviet Union. Rather, his comments emphasized that the countries were carefully chosen to give a balanced trip, taking into account Mexico's domestic and foreign policies.)

8. The Ambassador said that the Foreign Minister was definitely interested in a convention with the United States which would end the dispute over shrimp fishing in the Gulf. He thought Mr. Sayre had drawn the wrong conclusion from the fact that the Foreign Minister had evidenced no interest in a convention when it was discussed during the visit of President Kennedy to Mexico in June 1962 and in conversations last week between Ambassador Mann and the Foreign Minister. He said that Tello wanted to maintain the "tradition" of the Foreign Office and was reluctant to take any steps that might modify Mexican policy. Tello did not want to agree to anything which might adversely affect Mexico's claim to a nine-mile territorial sea. For this reason the Ambassador said he had discussed the matter with Undersecretary Gorostiza who represents the "tradition" of the Foreign Office. Gorostiza found no problem with the line the Ambassador was following. The Ambassador said he had told Tello there was no point talking about a fisheries convention if Mexico tried to settle the territorial waters problems in the convention. He had urged that a convention deal only with conservation of fishing resources and that it contain a paragraph which said it in no way affected the position on territorial waters held by either country. On the other hand, the Ambassador said that the convention should give Mexico exclusive control over fisheries out to nine miles. He suggested that the convention which the United States signed with Cuba in 1958 seemed to provide a useful model for an agreement between the US and Mexico. He planned to suggest that an exploratory meeting be held in Mexico City soon to see whether there was a basis for reaching agreement. He hoped that Mr. Chayes would be able to come down on the US Delegation.

Mr. Sayre observed that the Lopez Mateos Administration would probably go down in Mexican History as the one to clear up all outstanding problems with the United States if we succeeded in clearing up all the problems we had discussed. The Ambassador said he had told the Mexican President the same thing and hoped that it proved to be correct.

201. Memorandum from Brubeck to Dungan, February 27¹

February 27, 1963

THROUGH

Mr. McGeorge Bundy

SUBJECT

Status Report on Chamizal Negotiations

Ambassador Mann held discussions with Foreign Minister Tello in January and February on the Chamizal problem and Commissioner Friedkin went to Mexico City in the first week of February to participate in these discussions. Ambassador Mann and the Foreign Minister agreed informally on the line along which the boundary would be relocated subject to further consultations with community leaders in El Paso. The Mexican President has also approved. The Ambassador spent the week of February 18-22 in Texas talking to community leaders in El Paso and to the Governor of Texas and other state officials.

¹ Status report on Chamizal negotiations. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, POL 32-1 MEX-US.

Department officers have consulted with the Vice President's office, Senators Morse, Yarborough and Tower, and Congressman Foreman.

The El Paso City Council, the County Board of Commissioners, the El Paso Chamber of Commerce and other civic groups have approved the recommended solution. The Governor of Texas also approves. Our estimate is that the recommended solution would have the support of most influential sectors in El Paso. There is opposition from residents of the Chamizal zone who are uncertain of their future and their ability to re-establish themselves elsewhere if they receive only the market value of their present holdings. Owners of tenement dwellings and industrial and commercial enterprises who would be moved out can also be considered as opposed. There is a third group which opposes under the slogan of "Don't give up one inch of sacred Texas soil". This third group would like a "plebiscite" in the zone affected or would require approval of the Texas State Legislature. Such procedures would pose a problem which at first glance would be unacceptable to the Federal Government. The Legal Adviser of the Department is preparing a memorandum on the precedents.

Two problems have merged in our efforts to work out the details of a settlement, now that we seem to have agreed on a new boundary line:

1. We have a claim which we have not asserted for some fifty years to the northern half of Cordova Island. Mexico wants to state in a proposed joint report which would make recommendations for final solution of the problem that Cordova Island is Mexican territory. We do not want to accept the Mexican language because this would extinguish our claim. We are prepared to drop the claim once a convention is ratified by both countries, but until that time we want our claim preserved. We are hopeful that we can work out language in the report which would do that.

2. In preliminary discussions last year the Mexican Foreign Minister agreed that Mexico would reimburse the United States for all structures which are passed to Mexico intact in the Chamizal and which we acquire by purchase or condemnation. Mexico is entitled free of charge only to the land on which those structures stand. The Mexicans awakened this week to the fact that this will run into several million dollars. They are concerned that the figure may look so big to the Mexican public that the Mexican Government will be accused of buying the Chamizal. The Mexican Foreign Office is now considering how it can handle this problem.

At the present time we have agreed with the Mexicans that the two Foreign Offices would prepare a joint report (a working draft of which is enclosed) containing recommendations for a solution. This report would be released simultaneously with press statements by each President (the first draft of proposed statements is also enclosed) that he has approved the report and instructed his respective Foreign Office to proceed with negotiations of a convention. The convention would be submitted to the Senates of the respective countries for approval. The Mexican Foreign Office is presently of the view that we have to work out point 2 above before we can proceed on the negotiation of the report and convention.

/s/ J.T. Rogers
for

William H. Brubeck
Executive Secretary

Enclosures:

1. Draft of Joint Report.
2. Draft of Proposed Statements.

202. Memorandum of conversation, February 28, between President Kennedy and Ambassador Carrillo Flores¹

February 28, 1963

SUBJECT

Salinity Problem on Lower Colorado River and Transit of Latin Americans Through Mexico

PARTICIPANTS

The President
Antonio Carrillo Flores, Ambassador of Mexico
Mr. Ralph Dungan, Special Assistant to the President
Mr. Sterling J. Cottrell, Acting Assistant Secretary of State
Mr. Robert M. Sayre, Acting Deputy Director of the Office of Caribbean and Mexican Affairs

The Mexican Ambassador called at his request to deliver a letter from the Mexican President on the salinity problem on the lower Colorado River. He said that he wanted first to thank the President for his cooperation in achieving a temporary solution until October 1963. He said that Mexico is anxious to know what measures can be taken before October 1963 to prevent the recurrence of the problem at that time. He noted that Mexico is entering a highly political period and that the Mexicali Valley is one of the few areas in Mexico where the Communists are active. The Mexican Government is concerned that they will use the salinity issue even more to agitate and create political difficulties for the Government.

¹ Salinity problem on lower Colorado River and transit of Latin Americans through Mexico. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Mexico, General, March–June 1963.

The President recalled his conversation with President Lopez Mateos on the salinity problem. He said that he had asked the Department of the Interior for its recommendations on an urgent basis and anticipated that he would receive them in a few days. He noted that the two Governments are proceeding satisfactorily on achieving a solution to the Chamizal problem and hoped that we could do the same with the salinity problem. He asked the Ambassador to inform President Lopez Mateos that we will respond to his letter as soon as we have more details on what actions we might be able to take on the salinity problem. He inquired about the progress of the Mexican rehabilitation program for the Mexicali Valley. The Mexican Ambassador said that it is included in the Mexican "Plan of Immediate Action" now being studied by an IBRD Mission and an ad hoc committee of the OAS "Nine Wise Men." He said that Mexico realized that a rehabilitation program was necessary even if the salinity issue had not arisen. But he added that the problem in the Mexicali Valley had been made much more difficult for Mexico because of the highly saline water being delivered by the United States.

The President said that he wanted to write President Lopez Mateos in some detail about the serious difficulty which Latin American countries have because of the guerrilla and other type training which Latin Americans are receiving in Cuba. President Betancourt had raised the issue with him and had urged the necessity of a program to control travel to Cuba. The President noted that much of this traffic is through Mexico and he desired to explore with the Mexican President what might be done to help control it. He said that 2,000 Cuban trained agitators each year constituted a serious problem in Latin America especially because many of the Governments had serious internal political problems which these agitators could aggravate.

The Ambassador said he was aware of the problem and the fact that it had been discussed when Assistant Secretary of State Martin was in Mexico in January. He doubted that the traffic through Mexico was as great as suggested because there is only one round trip flight each week by Cubana. Foreign Minister Tello had agreed that Mexico would not grant a transit visa for travel to Cuba to any person from a Latin American country who presented a passport which bore a notation that it was not valid for travel to Cuba. The Ambassador observed that under the Mexican Constitution the Government could prevent persons from entering the country but not leaving. He noted that some other Latin American countries are unwilling to take the political steps to prevent their nationals from traveling to Cuba and Mexico did not want to assume the political responsibility of doing it for them.

The President said the problem would be discussed at the meeting of Presidents in San Jose in March. The Central American countries share Venezuela's concern. He observed that we had the military threat posed by Cuba under control but that the countries in the Hemisphere needed to develop a system to take care of the subversive problem. The United States is developing the facts on the problem and would have concrete suggestions to make for both a multilateral and bilateral approach.

The Ambassador said that his President planned to visit France in March and would discuss trade problems with President de Gaulle. The President welcomed the trip because he considered it useful for the Latin Americans to bring their trade problems directly to the attention of the European countries. (President Lopez Mateos will also visit Poland, West Germany, the Netherlands and Yugoslavia).

203. Telegram 2494 to Mexico City, March 6¹

March 6, 1963

In news conference March 6 President was asked question Chamizal. Begin verbatim:

Question: Mr. President, reports from Texas seem to indicate that the United States is ready to transfer the Chamizal to Mexico. If this is true, could you give us some idea of the time-table expected?

The President: No, but there have been negotiations on Chamizal for a good many years, and they were stepped up following the visit to Mexico. We are close, I would hope, to an agreement and I think that the next week should tell us whether we can get an accord. The advantage of course of the Chamizal is that if we can get a solution, is that it will wipe out a black mark in the record of the United States where we refused to accept an arbitration claim 40 years ago and as a result we have never been able to get the Mexicans to agree to any arbitration with us. So I am very anxious to see that settled and we have made pretty good progress on it. There are still some questions that have to be settled but the prognosis I would think was hopeful and we would know in the next few weeks. End verbatim.

¹ President's response to news conference question on Chamizal. Unclassified. 1 p. DOS, CF, POL 32-1 MEX-US.

Rusk

204. Memorandum from Brubeck to McGeorge Bundy, March 29¹

March 29, 1963

SUBJECT

Solution of the Salinity Problem on the Lower Colorado River; Recommendations of the Department of State

This memorandum is in response to an oral request of March 21 from Mr. Ralph Dungan for the recommendations of the Department of State on a solution to the salinity problem with Mexico on the lower Colorado River. The Department of State recommends the following interim and long term measures to solve the problem:

I. Construction Required

A. Interim

Reduction of pumping in the Wellton-Mohawk District during the winter of 1963–64 by about 40,000 acre feet.

Installation of a tile drainage works in the District to further reduce the salinity and to insure against damages due to reduction of pumping. (Estimated cost $3.3 million.)

B. Long Term

Construction of a 300 cubic second foot diversion channel which would permit the diversion of Wellton-Mohawk drainage during the five winter months to a point below Morelos Dam, and of additional wells to enable pumping of better quality wells in the summer. (Estimated cost $11 million.)

¹ Solution of the salinity problem on the lower Colorado River; recommendations of the DOS. Confidential. 6 pp. DOS, CF, POL 32–1 MEX–US.

II. Operation of Works

A. An interim solution is required for the five winter months beginning on October 1, 1963. It is not possible in the intervening months to construct works that would provide adequate temporary relief. The Department of State therefore recommends that the Bureau of Reclamation review the practicability of the reduction of pumping in the District, supplemented by tile drainage works. A reduction in pumping is suggested in light of the lowering affected in the ground water table during the past eighteen months and the Department's understanding that the current rate of drainage pumping (210,000 acre feet per year) is that required for full project development of 75,000 acres, whereas for the some 60,000 acres now under irrigation, pumping of only about 170,000 acre feet annually is required. The Department believes that a reduction of 40,000 acre feet can be achieved by a 45% decrease in the rate of pumping during the winter months without a material rise in the water table that will result in waterlogging of any of the cultivated acreage. The District wells were completely shut down for about 10 days in November–December 1961 when ground water levels were considerably higher, with no serious adverse effects.

A reduction in pumping will probably be required in the equivalent of only four of the five winter months because Mexico may not need to irrigate during the other month. Resulting salinity to Mexico would be in the range of 1600 ppm to 1900 ppm depending upon the quantity of river flows. Tile drains should be installed in the possible danger spots in the District lands as suggested in the Bureau Report. Such supplemental drainage works would also enable some further reduction in salinity of waters to Mexico during the coming winter. A combination of reduction in pumping supplemented by tile drains would result in mean salinity water to Mexico at the northerly boundary in the range of 1400 to 1700 ppm depending upon the quantity of flows in the river. This would afford material interim relief to the problem.

The Bureau of Reclamation proposed the installation of additional pumps in Phase 1 of its program. The Department of State agrees that additional pumps are required as an essential part of the long term solution, but does not concur in the proposed method of operation suggested by the Bureau for either interim or permanent relief. The Bureau proposed that the highest salinity wells be pumped in summer, and the lowest in winter. Our analysis of this method of operation has convinced us that this would aggravate the problem because it would result in further serious deterioration in the quality of the water for Mexico's principal summer crop. The Department believes that the lowest salinity wells should be pumped in the summer to achieve an improvement in the quality of summer waters and that the highly saline wells should be pumped in the winter with the drainage to be diverted below Morelos Dam.

B. A long term solution requires that measures be adopted to reduce the total salts in the drainage water of the Wellton-Mohawk District. Such a solution can be achieved either by

1) Stopping the pumping of highly saline waters underlying the Wellton-Mohawk District and instead accomplishing drainage of the project with surface drainage works to include open or tile drains as is practiced in the nearby Yuma Valley and Imperial Valley, or

2) Reducing total quantity of salts pumped from the District to the Colorado River for diversion by Mexico, to an amount closely approaching the quantity of salts diverted to the District. This amount is required for successful irrigation in the District. Salts in excess of this amount should be disposed of elsewhere.

The Department understands that alternative 1) is not acceptable to the District primarily because of adverse effects on District lands. Estimates of the cost of installation of the tile drainage for the entire District vary, but are in the $35 to $45 million range. The Department considers this an acceptable cost only if there is no other practical way to solve the problem.

The Department considers that the more acceptable alternative is the diversion of an estimated 90,000 acre feet annually of Wellton-Mohawk drainage so that it does not mix with the reasonably good water in the river above Mexico's main diversion point, Morelos Dam.

III. Legal Issues

As a practical matter, drainage from Wellton-Mohawk in the winter is not required to fill Mexico's water schedule because winter water deliveries to Mexico now exceed Mexico's Treaty schedule by more than the amount of such drainage. This excess is a consequence, in part, of rainfall, releases from upstream dams for hydroelectric purposes, leakage at these dams, and irrigation drainage. The amount of water arriving in the limitrophe section of the Colorado River between October and February is thus 106,000 to 139,000 acre feet greater than the 1,500,000 acre feet which the United States is obligated to deliver to Mexico each year pursuant to the Mexican Treaty. Furthermore, Mexico does not credit the United States for this excess.

Inasmuch as the current winter salinity problem with Mexico arises from approximately 90,000 acre-feet of effluent from the pumps of the Wellton-Mohawk irrigation district during these same winter months, we have examined the legal consequences of diverting this 90,000 acre feet to a point below Morelos Dam.

The Department considers that bypassing the winter drainage from the Wellton-Mohawk project down to the Gulf of California by means of the proposed bypass channel would not deprive the Wellton-Mohawk irrigation district of its right to characterize such drainage as "return flow" as that term is used in the recommended decree in Arizona v. California. The decree defines consumptive use as meaning the "diversions from the stream less such return flow thereto as is available for consumptive use in the United States or in satisfaction of the Mexican treaty obligation." The first point is whether the term "available" applies to the clause "in satisfaction of the Mexican treaty obligation."

Prior to 1961 when the pumps at Wellton-Mohawk started to discharge drainage for delivery to the Colorado River, the amount of water arriving at the limitrophe section for delivery to Mexico was already in excess of treaty obligations of the United States. If the definition of the use of return flow included only water actually used to satisfy the Mexican treaty obligation as opposed to water available to satisfy such obligations, the necessary effect would be impairment of cultivation in Wellton-Mohawk and any other irrigation projects south of Imperial Dam. This impairment would stem from the inability of these irrigation districts to cultivate all the acreage authorized by federal law if they received water diversions from the mainstream equal only to their drainage available for downstream United States consumption or actually used in satisfaction of Mexican treaty obligations.

We cannot conceive that the recommended decree anticipates that these projects which chance to be lowest on the United States portion of the Colorado River should suffer the loss of part of their authorized acreage merely because their drainage is not needed to meet Mexican treaty requirements. As noted above, the excess quantity of waters arriving for delivery to Mexico are beyond the control of these projects. Consequently, common sense urges that "available" is applicable to "satisfaction of the Mexican Treaty obligation".

As this must be the case, we believe that the Wellton-Mohawk District may reasonably claim that any water which arrives in the limitrophe section whether through a bypass channel or from the Gila River to the Colorado River is "available in satisfaction of the Mexican Treaty obligation." Return flows are now arriving in the Colorado River below Morelos Dam which are charged against Mexico's Treaty schedule.

There is no party that we can foresee taking issue with these conclusions so far as they are addressed exclusively to waters which are not only of no value to the United States in the Colorado mainstream but, indeed, render the United States a disservice. This legal formula cannot be applied to any effluent from Wellton-Mohawk which might be pumped out during the summer months so far as there is a need for water during these months and, if it is not supplied from irrigation drainage, it must be released from Davis Dam. Such a release from Davis Dam would be a net loss to the United States of useable water.

IV. Proposal of the Bureau of Reclamation

The Department has reviewed the study of the Bureau of Reclamation on the salinity problem on the lower Colorado River entitled "Special Studies—Delivery of Water to Mexico, February 1963."

The Bureau's stated purpose is to reduce the peak salts concentrations in water delivered to Mexico under the 1944 Water Treaty. Its proposal involves essentially a change in the delivery pattern for salts by reducing the salt concentrations in the peak winter months but increasing them in the summer. No material decrease would be achieved for many years in the total tonnage of salts delivered to Mexico from the Wellton-Mohawk District which is now discharging in its drainage water about 3.5 times the salt tonnage required for successful irrigation.

The Bureau's proposal, by decreasing the winter peak salt concentrations, would help the minor winter crop which provides less than 20% of the agricultural income in the Mexicali Valley derived from acres irrigated by Colorado River water but, by increasing the summer salt concentrations, would adversely affect the major summer crop which provides more than 80% of the income. The combined net effect would be a substantial reduction in income and hence aggravation of the problem. If the choice is between the present situation and the Bureau proposal Mexico would therefore probably prefer the present situation.

V. Recommendations

1. That the Department of the Interior discuss with the Wellton-Mohawk District a reduction of pumping for the winter of 1963–64 of 40,000 acre feet. This reduction should be coordinated with the Mexican irrigation schedule through the International Boundary and Water to achieve the maximum feasible reduction in winter salinity consistent with uses in the United States.

2. If necessary, lawyers of Justice, State and Interior should be prepared to discuss in detail with the Wellton-Mohawk Board of Directors and attorneys for the District the legal risks involved for the District and the United States unless a satisfactory solution is reached. Because our present information indicates that Mexico plans, if necessary, to press its case in the form of a suit by the Colorado River irrigation district of Mexico against the Wellton-Mohawk District in a U.S. Federal court, it is recommended that Justice assume responsibility for these discussions.

3. That the Department of the Interior prepare and submit legislation requesting funds to construct the works recommended above. The installation of tile drainage works should be accomplished as promptly as possible so that their operations safeguard the District lands and make a further contribution to the reduction of salinities in the winter of 1963–64.

4. That the President discuss the matter with Senator Hayden before any of the foregoing steps are taken and seek his concurrence in them.

5. That the United States Commissioner on the IBWC consult with the “Committee of Fourteen” representing the seven Basin State Governors and seek their approval of the proposed solution.

*/s/ Dave Rowe
for*

William H. Brubeck
Executive Secretary

205. Memorandum of conversation, April 18, between Ambassador Carrillo Flores and Sayre¹

April 18, 1963

SUBJECT

Salinity Problem on Lower Colorado River

PARTICIPANTS

Ambassador Carrillo Flores—Ambassador of Mexico
Mr. Sayre—CMA

The Ambassador said he had been instructed by the Foreign Office to convey to the Department his Government’s serious concern about the salinity problem and the nature of proposals that the United States has under consideration for solving the problem. He showed Mr. Sayre the instructions which he has received which read in translation as follows:

“You may inform (the Department of State) orally that the preliminary review of the (Bureau of Reclamation) report has produced a distressing reaction among us because we believe that the measures which are recommended do not comply with the spirit of the conversations which took place between the two Presidents nor with the provisions of the Water Treaty.”

¹ Salinity problem on lower Colorado River. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 33–1 MEX–US.

The Ambassador recalled the conversations which had taken place between the two Presidents in which he participated. He said that President Kennedy had remarked that the action of the Wellton-Mohawk irrigation district was not in keeping with the spirit of the Water Treaty. The Ambassador said the phrase in his instructions had been chosen with President Kennedy's remark in mind. He said that Mexico's position is that a permanent solution should reduce the high salinity of the water throughout the year. His Government did not regard as an adequate or permanent solution measures which only "alleviated" the problem. He recalled his meeting with President Kennedy on February 28 and expressed his concern that he had not made his Government's position clear. He felt he may not have emphasized sufficiently the political difficulty it is giving the Lopez Mateos Administration or the use the Communists in Mexico are making of the issue to enhance their political position and promote anti-Americanism. Mr. Sayre said that the President understood the problem very well and he doubted that there was any misunderstanding on his part as to Mexico's views.

The Ambassador inquired why there should be any problem with the presentation of the issue to the International Court. He said that there was an honest difference of opinion as to the meaning of the Treaty and he thought that two friendly Governments should be able to submit such a dispute to a third party for resolution. Mr. Sayre said that we hoped the matter could be resolved by the adoption of a practical program. The Ambassador recalled that he had tried to get the United States to agree to refer the legal issue to the International Bank or the Inter-American Bank. He mentioned the mediation efforts of Eugene Black on the Indus River problem between India and Pakistan. Mr. Sayre said he recalled this, but that he thought the situation was different because the United States and Mexico had a Treaty on the subject whereas a treaty did not exist with respect to the Indus River. The Ambassador said he had pressed his Government strongly to present its rehabilitation program for the Mexicali Valley to the International Bank, but had been unsuccessful. He felt that the Bank's review of the program would have solved the factual question as to whether the water which the United States is now delivering is usable. He anticipated that the Bank would have refused to finance the project if it found that the water could not be used even with improved irrigation works. He said he had not been successful because his Government believed that such action would have been an admission by Mexico that the salinity problem was a soils problem in the Mexicali Valley. His Government was firmly convinced this was not the case and did not want to take any action on its part to prejudice its position.

Mr. Sayre said that the President's Science Adviser was studying certain technical points and we hoped he would be making his recommendations in the near future as to possible alternative courses of action. He said he would convey the Mexican Ambassador's message to the appropriate persons.

206. Memorandum from Edwin Martin to Acting Secretary Ball, May 22¹

May 22, 1963

TO

The Acting Secretary

THROUGH

S/S

FROM

Edwin M. Martin

SUBJECT

Settlement of the Chamizal dispute with Mexico

Discussion:

Ambassador Mann, with the assistance of Commissioner Friedkin on the International Boundary and Water Commission, the Legal Adviser's Office, and this Bureau, has succeeded in negotiating with the Mexican Government a proposed settlement of the Chamizal dispute. The problem of sovereignty over the Chamizal zone in El Paso, Texas, originated in 1864, and has constituted a major problem in relations with Mexico since the United States in 1911 rejected an international arbitral commission's decision awarding a large part of the Chamizal zone to Mexico.

Every Administration beginning with that of President Taft has attempted to resolve the controversy in a mutually satisfactory manner. Proposals have differed widely and naturally have become increasingly costly. The present settlement, in accordance with the instructions of the two Presidents issued when President Kennedy visited Mexico in June 1962, is intended to give effect to the 1911 award as nearly as practical in today's circumstances, but not to prejudice the juridical position of either Government with respect to the award.

¹ Settlement of the Chamizal dispute. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, POL 32-1 MEX-US.

The attached memorandum to the President (Tab A) describes the nature of the recommended settlement. The memorandum lists the Members of Congress who have been consulted, and suggests that the President may want to consult with them and possibly others.

The terms of settlement are presented to the President in a Memorandum in the form of recommendations by the two Foreign Offices (Tab B), on the substance and language of which agreement has been essentially reached after months of tedious discussion. If the President approves the terms and procedure for agreement, the Embassy at Mexico City would agree with the Mexican Foreign Office, through an exchange of notes (Tab C), on the terms of the proposed settlement and on simultaneous release of statements by President Kennedy and by President López Mateos (Tabs D and E) accepting the solution proposed in the Memorandum. In the exchange of notes the Embassy would affirm that in the event of a failure of the settlement, this Government's position would remain as it was before the negotiations.

The Department is also requesting in the memorandum to the President authorization to proceed at once with the conclusion of a convention, which would incorporate the terms of settlement already agreed upon in the Memorandum.

The Mexican Government is particularly sensitive about the proposed arrangement whereby Mexico would reimburse the United States for the structures passing intact to Mexico in the Chamizal tract by a relocation of the boundary. By a separate exchange of notes a procedure would be agreed upon, for incorporation in an annex to the convention, for a lump sum payment to be made by a Mexican bank based on the value of the structures to Mexico (Tab F).

Since relocation of the boundary will not take place at least for two years, the Mexican Government would like a symbolic ceremony in the area shortly after ratification of the convention by both Governments. The Department would agree to a preliminary marking of the new boundary for that ceremony.

It is proposed that the Department issue a press release at the time the Presidential statements are released. This release (Tab G) would emphasize that the proposed settlement is a further step in the resolution of the controversy that has been earnestly sought by every Administration since 1910. The final step would be, of course, the conclusion and ratification of a convention.

Because of the imminence of a Presidential electoral campaign in Mexico the completion of these steps is most urgent. It is hoped that the Presidential statements can be released not later than May 24.

If the President approves, the Department will immediately authorize Ambassador Mann to agree on a public release on or about that date. Ambassador Mann will also be authorized to initiate negotiation of a convention.

Recommendations:

1. That you approve the memorandum to the President;
2. That, subject to the approval of the terms and procedure by the President, you authorize me to instruct Ambassador Mann to inform the Mexican Government that the Department approves the Memorandum containing the terms of the recommended settlement, and to arrange with the Mexican Government for its public release;

Approve GWB
Disapprove _____

3. That you authorize me, in consultation with the Legal Adviser's Office, to approve any last-minute minor revisions in these documents that may seem desirable; and

Approve GWB
Disapprove _____

4. That you authorize me in accordance with the Department Circular 175 to instruct Ambassador Mann to proceed with negotiation of the convention.

Approve GWB
Disapprove _____

Concurrences:

L _____ P _____ H _____ A _____

Attachments:

1. Memorandum to the President (Tab A).
2. Foreign Offices' Memorandum (Tab B).
3. Embassy note (Tab C).
4. Presidents' release statements (Tabs D and E).
5. Notes and letters (re payment to Mexican bank) (Tab F).
6. Press release (Tab G).

207. Memorandum of conversation, May 23, between Ball and Ambassador Carrillo Flores¹

May 23, 1963

SUBJECT

Salinity Problem on Lower Colorado River

PARTICIPANTS

The Acting Secretary, Mr. Ball
Antonio Carrillo Flores, Ambassador of Mexico
Mr. Martin, Assistant Secretary of State
Mr. Sayre, Acting Director, CMA

The Mexican Ambassador called at his request to present a note protesting the delivery of water to Mexico under the 1944 Water Treaty. (Note No. 2011 of May 17, 1963)

The Ambassador said he wanted to express the deep concern of his Government regarding the special study of the Bureau of Reclamation of February 1963 on the salinity problem. He said that he knew that the report had not been approved by the United States Government but that his Government was frankly disturbed about the recommendations in it.

The crux of the problem, the Ambassador said, was that the United States did not recognize any obligation to Mexico with respect to the manner in which it conducted irrigation operations in the United States which directly affected Mexico. He said that Mexico could not accept the position of the United States that it had no obligation to Mexico under the Treaty or international law. He considered that the United States was bound by the same legal principles with respect to Mexico that it applied internally with respect to the several states. He said Mexico could not accept a solution which did not recognize that Mexico had rights under the Treaty and international law. He considered a solution based only on comity and the view that the United States had to be a good neighbor was unsatisfactory.

The Ambassador noted that if one of the States was being adversely affected it would have a remedy in the Supreme Court, or the State's representatives in Congress would look after the State's interests. Mexico, he noted, had no such representation, but he felt that Mexico had the right to expect that the United States Government would make every effort to treat Mexico as fairly as one of the several States.

¹ Salinity problem on lower Colorado River. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 33–1 MEX–US.

The Acting Secretary said that the United States was very conscious of the salinity problem and that we had taken several preliminary steps to resolve it. He noted that it continued under active consideration within the United States Government.

The Mexican Ambassador said that he understood the United States' domestic and political problems which made it difficult to reach a solution but he thought that the United States Government had tied its hand by declaring that it had no obligation to Mexico. He hoped that the United States could present a fair proposal for a solution of the problem. He did not think that the United States should place arbitrary restrictions on the types of solution which might be considered such as the restrictions imposed by the Congress when it authorized the studies carried out by the Bureau of Reclamation.

Finally, the Ambassador desired to point out the political aspects of the problem for Mexico. He said that Mexico was entering a "political" period in which Mexico would have to choose a new President. He noted that the situation in Baja California was particularly sensitive because of radical groups in that area. He implied that unless a satisfactory solution could be achieved and a flare-up avoided in Baja California that the President would be under considerable pressure to select a candidate more acceptable to radical elements.

Mr. Martin noted the problem of obtaining agreement among the technicians as to the facts and to the effect of those facts on both the Mexicali Valley and the Wellton-Mohawk irrigation district. He said that the President's Science Adviser is actively engaged in the effort to develop a satisfactory solution.

The Acting Secretary said that the United States Government was very sympathetic to the problem presented by the Mexican Government and would continue its efforts to achieve a prompt and fair solution.

208. Memorandum from George Ball to President Kennedy, May 24¹

May 24, 1963

SUBJECT

Settlement of the Chamizal Dispute

In accordance with your understanding with President López Mateos of Mexico, the Department of State, the Mexican Ministry of Foreign Relations, and the International Boundary and Water Commission have drawn up recommendations for a final solution to the Chamizal dispute. The dispute originated with a shift in the channel of the Rio Grande at El Paso, Texas in 1864. After a meeting between Presidents Taft and Diaz in 1910, the dispute was submitted to international arbitration. The United States did not accept the arbitral award on the ground, among others, that the Arbitral Commission exceeded its terms of reference by dividing the tract. Each Administration since that time has attempted to work out a solution to the controversy.

A Memorandum which presents the essential features of a settlement in the form of recommendations to the Presidents has been drawn up by the two Foreign Offices. The recommended settlement entails a net transfer to Mexico of 437 acres of United States territory. (A map of the area showing the recommended boundary changes is enclosed). The Rio Grande would be relocated into a new channel so that all Mexican territory (366 acres in the Chamizal zone, 193 acres of Cordova Island already under Mexican jurisdiction, and 264 acres east of Cordova Island for a total of 823 acres) would be south of the Rio Grande.

Press statements expressing acceptance of the recommendations have been drafted for you and President López Mateos to issue simultaneously with the public release of the Memorandum. Finally, there is general agreement on an exchange of notes which would incorporate a related understanding on payment for structures which would pass intact to Mexico, which because of the sensitivity of this problem in Mexico, the Mexican Government prefers to handle separately from the Memorandum.

These documents would represent a commitment to conclude a convention on the terms recommended in the Memorandum. Once the recommended terms are formally accepted by both Presidents, the Foreign Offices would proceed as quickly as possible to conclude a convention, which would be submitted to the respective Senates for approval.

¹ Settlement of the Chamizal dispute. Confidential. 3 pp. DOS, CF, POL 32-1 MEX-US.

We estimate that the net cost to the United States of acquiring the lands and improvements in the areas involved and our share of the cost of relocating the river channel, replacing existing bridges, and moving two rail lines would be about $18 million. This figure is based on preliminary estimates, and would entail an appropriation of $26.5 million, offset subsequently by reimbursement of $4.7 million for structures passing intact to Mexico and by $3.3 million from sale of a portion of the land acquired by the United States. The cost of relocating the river channel and of erecting new bridges is to be shared equally. Some 3,750 persons would have to be evacuated from the part of the Chamizal and the area east of Cordova Island to be transferred to Mexico.

Ambassador Mann, United States Commissioner Friedkin on the International Boundary and Water Commission, and officials of the Department have regularly over the last several months consulted with local, Texas and Federal officials and with members of Congress. Officials of El Paso and Texas, including Governor Connally, and most community leaders in El Paso favor a settlement and have indicated acceptance of the one proposed. Within the last week the following have been advised in detail of the terms and timing of the proposed settlement, either directly or indirectly according to their preference: the Vice President through Mr. Jenkins; Senator Mansfield through Mr. Valeo; all members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee by a memorandum prepared by the Foreign Relations Committee Staff; Senators Morse and Hickenlooper had been consulted in detail previously; Senator McClellan through Mr. Westbrook; Senator Hayden by memorandum; Senators Yarborough, Tower and Saltonstall directly; Congressman Morgan through Mr. Crawford of the House Foreign Affairs Committee Staff; Congresswoman Bolton and Congressmen Bow, Selden and Foreman directly, and Congressmen Hailiard, Cannon, and Rooney by memorandum. Only Senator Tower and Congressman Foreman have expressed reservations, but have not indicated they are opposed. No significant organized opposition to the settlement has been expressed in Texas except by home owners in the actual area to be transferred and by extremist groups.

I recommend that you approve the general terms for settlement of the dispute, and authorize the Department to reach agreement with Mexico on the Memorandum and the Presidential statements approving it and their release to the press, and to proceed with the negotiation and signing of a Chamizal convention.

I also recommend that, before public release of the terms of settlement, you consider meeting with the above-mentioned members of the Congress to inform them of your decision or have an appropriate member of your staff consult them.

George W. Ball
Acting Secretary

Enclosures:

1. Foreign Offices' Draft
Memorandum of Recommendation.
2. Map of El Paso-Juarez area.
3. Proposed Presidential press statement.
4. Proposed press statement for President Lopez Mateos.

209. Memorandum from Edwin Martin to Chayes, June 20¹

June 20, 1963

SUBJECT

Salinity Problem on Lower Colorado River

The Congress has appropriated $6 million for additional pumps in the Wellton-Mohawk Irrigation District and the Bureau of Reclamation expects to operate them in a manner which would reduce the salinity of the water delivered to Mexico in the winter time to a peak of approximately 2000 p.p.m. In addition, the Bureau of Reclamation expects to adopt other measures such as a reduction in pumping of approximately 20,000 acre-feet, which will reduce the winter salinities to a peak of 1800 p.p.m. No other measures are foreseen which would reduce the winter salinities below 1800 p.p.m. for the winter of 1963–64. You will recall that Mexico refused to accept any water with a salinity of 1800 p.p.m. during the winters of 1961–62 and 1962–63. We, therefore, have the clear prospect of a serious crisis in our relations with Mexico in October.

In the meeting which you attended at the White House on the salinity problem, the Secretary of the Interior recommended that we adopt whatever measures we can to alleviate the salinity problem without causing any adverse effects on the Wellton-Mohawk district and await the Mexican Government reaction. This is the course we are now following.

¹ Salinity problem on lower Colorado River. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, POL 32–1 MEX-US.

The Secretary of the Interior suggested that if the Mexican reaction was sufficiently strong we might then be able to persuade those opposed to measures which would remedy the problem to agree to such steps as a bypass channel or tile drains in the Wellton-Mohawk district. Neither of these remedial measures could be adopted and have any effect before the winter of 1964-65. The only actions of which we are aware that could avoid a crisis this winter are (1) release of storage water and (2) reduction of pumping in the Wellton-Mohawk district by about 75%.

We have no basis for judging the possible Mexican action in October except by past actions and the statements of both the Mexican Foreign Minister and Mexican Ambassador. Our best estimate is that the Mexican Government would seek to have us take emergency measures to reduce the salinity of the water to an acceptable level. Failing this, Mexico would probably refuse to accept any water this winter and there would be no agricultural production in the Mexicali Valley for this five month period. It is possible that Mexico would seek to minimize the adverse effects by restricting wheat acreage and increasing water applications to compensate for the higher salinities. To the best of our knowledge, however, it did not do this in either of the two previous winters. Mexico would probably seek a remedy by court action. The Mexican Foreign Office has retained lawyers for this purpose. The Mexican Government apparently has not decided whether to take the case to the International Court or to a US Federal court. The Mexican Foreign Minister is known to favor bringing the case in the International Court, but may decide a US Federal Court is preferable on the assumption that a decision can be obtained sooner.

Ambassador Mann discussed this possible course of events with the Secretary on June 17. He noted that the Mexican President considers he obtained a commitment from President Kennedy to remedy the situation before October 1963. He expressed concern that a major crisis with Mexico could have the most serious consequences for our relations and could be used by the extreme left to tip the scales in favor of an extreme left candidate for President of Mexico. Ambassador Mann took issue with what seems to be the implicit assumption in our present course of action, i.e., that if we let the issue go to court we will win, or at the very worst, if we lose the decision would not require more extensive remedial measures than mentioned above.

The Secretary requested a brief on the problem which he might use for discussions with the President and Senator Hayden. He desires to take the matter up with the President after the President returns from his European trip. He asked to be informed primarily of the possible effect on the supply of Colorado River water available to US users if the United States should lose a suit in either the International Court or a US Federal Court. He desires to know:

1. Whether there is a sound legal basis for Interior's view that the operations at Wellton-Mohawk are in keeping with the 1944 Water Treaty and international law; or, to state it in the reverse, whether Mexico has a strong legal basis for its assertion that the operations are in contravention of the Treaty and international law.

2. Whether the Mexican Government would be able to satisfy the jurisdictional requirements of the International Court or a US Federal Court. If the Mexican Government decides not to subject itself to the jurisdiction of a US Federal Court, would the Mexicali farmers have standing in a Federal Court and what is the likelihood of their success in enjoining the Wellton-Mohawk operations and being awarded damages.

3. What are the possible legal theories which a court might adopt in deciding a case brought by Mexico or the Mexican farmers and what would be the effect on the supply of water available to the Colorado Basin states under each theory.

210. Telegram 504 from Mexico City, August 21¹

Mexico City, August 21, 1963

Dept Pass IBWC El Paso. For Martin from Mann.

Urgent and important decisions are necessary concerning the salt water problem which continues to be the number one issue in our relations with Mexico. I consider this problem of such high priority, and the risks and consequences of further delay in reaching decisions so great, that I believe this telegram merits the personal attention of the President and the Secretary.

The salinity issue has not yet reached crisis proportions in Mexico, despite strong pressures on the government from various sectors, including the 300,000 people whose livelihood depends on the Mexicali Valley, only because the government has up to this time decided to down-play this problem. However, Mexico interprets the statement on salinity in the joint Presidential communiqué of June 30, 1962—"They expressed their determination, with the scientific studies as a basis, to reach a permanent and effective solution at the earliest possible time with the aim of preventing the recurrence of this problem after October, 1963"—as an undertaking on our part to come forward with a satisfactory solution before the end of October 1963.

¹ Salinity problem on lower Colorado River. Confidential. 4 pp. DOS, CF, POL 33-1 MEX-US.

If we cannot negotiate successfully with Mexico in the next two months on the basis of concrete plans on our side for a "permanent and effective solution" we should expect Mexico to move toward actions which can only be harmful to our national interests. I believe Mexico would, sooner or later, file suit in the World Court or encourage a class suit for injunction in one of our Federal Courts, or raise the issue of rights of a lower riparian state in the OAS or the UN, or simultaneously follow two or more of these routes. I doubt that Mexico has made final decisions about the action it will take, and it is not improbable it might defer decision until November or December. By that time it will be clear to Mexico that this winter's salinity levels (predicted at about 2,000 parts per million throughout the winter) will be higher than they were last winter and Mexico must decide whether to waste the water with all that this implies for the winter wheat crop or to use it with the consequent additional salt damage to the soil. Moreover, by that time a decision will also have been made on the Nobel Peace Prize, with reference to which Mexico has been reluctant to become involved in international disputes because of the effect this might have on its campaign to obtain the peace prize for Lopez Mateos.

If the salinity issue is taken to court by Mexico it seems to me probable that the decision would be against us, and even possible that it would be adverse to a degree which could permanently prejudice the present rights of United States users of Colorado River waters. I assume that it was this possibility of a court decision far more damaging to American users of Colorado River Waters than a negotiated settlement which prompted six of the seven Colorado River Basin States to recommend a by-pass channel through which the most highly saline Wellton-Mohawk waters could be wasted. And even in the unlikely event a court should sustain our position, the price we would pay would be confirmation of Mexico's right to send into the Rio Grande highly saline waters which would seriously damage US farmers in the lower Rio Grande Valley.

Moreover, if Mexico is forced to take action against us the wraps presently held around Mexican press coverage will be taken off, the people will learn of the facts in this issue, and unnecessary damage will be done to our relations with the government and people of Mexico. Communists and opportunists will take every advantage of this opportunity to attack us on legal and moral grounds, raising issues on which they will be joined by many other Mexicans, even those who are anti-communist and normally friendly to us. Indeed, since the salinity issue could come to a head precisely at the time the Lopez Mateos administration selects the next Presidential candidate, it is even possible that a wave of anti-United States feeling, stemming from our inaction and apparent indifference, could cause the selection of a leftist candidate deemed capable of standing up to the United States in defense of Mexico's rights. I need hardly say that the implications of such a selection could be far reaching.

We should face up to the fact that the Wellton-Mohawk salinity problem was not created by an act of God. It was deliberately created by us on the theory that because the 1944 Colorado Water Treaty is silent on the issue of quality, the United States had no obligation to use reasonable care to avoid unnecessary injury to a lower riparian user. According to this theory, we are, in consequence, free to dump on the Mexicali Valley over an estimated 20 year period the highly saline Wellton-Mohawk underground lake and gradually to replace those underground waters with water of a better quality from the Imperial Dam so that the Wellton Mohawk could have a usable underground reserve supply available for its crops in addition to its allotted share of river water. The fact is that the Wellton-Mohawk is pumping out and sending down to Mexico nearly four times as much salt as would normally be required for successful irrigation operations. There is no way to disguise this hard fact or the additional fact that gradually but inevitably the productivity of the soil of the Mexicali Valley will be seriously impaired if the water is used.

The only remedial action which the Mexicali Valley could take, if it used the water, would be further to substantially reduce the number of acres in cultivation so as to be able, by applying more water per acre than is normally required, to wash the added salt through the root zone. And even if this were politically and economically feasible to do in this heavily populated valley (which I doubt) there could be no assurance that salt would not continue to accumulate to the detriment of productivity in at least a part of the smaller acreage cultivated. Mexico has a shortage of arable land as well as water. It is not an overstatement to say that the Mexicali Valley is as important to Mexicans as the Imperial Valley is to us.

We have the opportunity now to reduce these risks by negotiating settlement with Mexico based on the concept of approximate salt balance. This can be achieved either by wasting the poorest quality waters of the Wellton Mohawk District or going over to a system of tile drains such as are used in the Imperial and other valleys. We will not have this same choice nor the initiative once we are waist deep in a crisis situation.

Mann

211. Telegram 508 to Mexico City, September 5¹

September 5, 1963

Following is uncleared memcon between Secretary and Mexican Ambassador on September 5. No additional memcon will be prepared:

Mexican Ambassador called on Secretary at former's request to deliver letter from President Lopez Mateos to President Kennedy on the Chamizal. Letter recalls agreement of two Presidents to attempt achieve solution of Chamizal problem and expresses hope now that Convention has been signed that it can be promptly ratified. Secretary said he would discuss with Senator Fulbright after Convention submitted to Senate. He inquired whether any doubt Convention would be approved in Mexico. Carrillo Flores said there was not but that Mexico traditionally waited until US acted on important bilateral treaties. Secretary expressed hope Mexico would act this year even if US Senate did not so that ratification would not be postponed until September 1964. He noted US Senate might not get to Treaty until January. Carrillo Flores said he had recommended to his Govt that Mexican Senate act on Convention before it adjourns in December even though US had not approved. He noted that he had recommended to President Lopez Mateos that Mexican Cabinet approve Convention so that Presidential hopefuls would be bound and that this had been done. Ambassador said he had also discussed Convention approval with Senator Mansfield who is personal friend of Lopez Mateos. Secretary expressed appreciation for letter and said he would be pleased forward it to President.

Mexican Ambassador then raised salinity problem. Said he hoped that provisional action could be taken avoid crisis this winter. Secretary said he was studying problem and would be talking to Secretary Udall and President. He promised talk again with Ambassador once he had more definite information.

Secretary then inquired about Mexico's views on Cuba. Ambassador said he considered it significant Lopez Mateos did not make any remarks on Cuba in his September 1 State of Union message which could be considered favorable. He noted President had referred only to missile crisis in which Mexico had urged withdrawal of missiles and had condemned wanton aggression of China against India. In response to question, Secretary said there appeared to be further withdrawals of Soviet forces and that recent increase in shipping had disturbed us but that it may have been associated with sugar shipments. He thought real problem was continued training in Cuba of Latin Americans for guerrilla and subversive activities in their own countries. US saw no signs Castro's desire dominate Latin America had lessened but we continued believe Castro considered himself revolutionary of hemisphere importance and too big for Cuba alone. Ambassador inquired about US assessment of reported break between Soviets and Cuba. Secretary said we did not attach much credence these reports. He speculated that fact Cuba has not signed Partial Test Ban Treaty, for example, might indicate desire on Cuba's part avoid taking sides between USSR and China.

¹ Transmits September 5 memorandum of conversation between Rusk and Ambassador Carrillo Flores re Chamizal dispute; salinity problem; Cuba; President Lopez Mateos' trip to Europe. Confidential. 4 pp. DOS, CF, POL 33-1 MEX-US.

Secretary inquired about results of Lopez Mateos trip to Europe. Ambassador said it had been successful trip. He noted that Tito would be visiting Mexico next month. His subsequent remarks reflected Mexican view that visit by Tito to Mexico would not unnecessarily disturb US because US-Yugoslav relations were most QUOTE normal END QUOTE of generally QUOTE abnormal END QUOTE relations between US and Soviet bloc countries. To bolster point he said Senator Mansfield had told him US Congressmen would be visiting Yugoslavia in near future. Secretary acknowledged US relations with Yugoslavia were probably on better basis than with any country in Soviet bloc. He said import of Khrushchev-Tito meeting not clear as yet. He considered it useful for members of Congress visit Yugoslavia to see situation first-hand. He was hopeful Congress would remove restrictive provisions in foreign aid legislation on trade with Poland and Yugoslavia.

Rusk

212. Memorandum of conversation, October 11, among Rusk, Udall, and other U.S. officials¹

October 11, 1963

SUBJECT

Colorado River Salinity Problem

PARTICIPANTS

The Secretary of State
The Secretary of the Interior
Mr. Floyd Dominy, Commissioner of Reclamation
Mr. Joseph F. Friedkin, U.S. Commissioner, IBWC
Mr. Sterling J. Cottrell, Acting Assistant Secretary
Mr. Abraham Chayes, Legal Adviser
Mr. Frank J. Barry, Solicitor of the Department of the Interior
Mr. Edward Weinberg, Deputy Solicitor of the Department of the Interior
Mr. Robert M. Sayre, Deputy Director, CMA

Secretary Udall said that the water supply on the Colorado River was the shortest this year that it had been in several years. He noted that it might be necessary to release some of the water being impounded at Glen Canyon Dam to meet downstream requirements. This situation made it extremely difficult to find a solution to the salinity problem on the lower Colorado River. He thought any solution involving the provision of the additional water to Mexico would not be acceptable to the Basin States. Mr. Dominy recalled the Senate hearings that had followed his decision last year to release impounded flood waters for river regulation. Mr. Friedkin agreed that any solution to the salinity problem involving the release of additional water for Mexico would not be acceptable to the Basin States and thought that other solutions were possible.

The Secretary of State said that he was seriously concerned that continued failure to find a solution would lead to court action in which the United States stood to lose, given the state of facts in this case. Secretary Udall agreed and said that he desired to avoid any possibility that an international water master might be appointed for the Colorado River.

Secretary Udall said that the proposal of the Department of State for coordinating the pumping at Wellton-Mohawk with the Mexican diversion schedule was essentially sound, but that his Department would need the details on the Mexican schedule to work out a program.

¹ Colorado River salinity problem. Limited Official Use. 4 pp. DOS, CF, POL 33-1 MEX-US.

He said that his Department would attempt to work out a program so that the salinity level of water delivered to Mexico would be 1,500 p.p.m. or less during the coming winter. Commissioner Dominy asked if the Mexicans would be agreeable to such a program and would accept water with 1,500 p.p.m. Commissioner Friedkin said that 1,500 p.p.m. this winter would be about salt balance. He thought that the Mexicans would accept it. In any event, he considered that the United States could defend itself if it achieved this quality of water for delivery to Mexico this winter. He said he would take the matter up with the Mexican Commissioner as soon as possible. He added that he thought the Mexican Commissioner would have a difficult time accepting unless there were a long-term solution in prospect. He regarded a satisfactory long-term solution as the key to any acceptance by the Mexicans of an interim solution which they did not regard as entirely in keeping with their rights under the Treaty.

Mr. Weinberg noted that under the Treaty Mexico has the right to divert 900 cubic second feet at all times and that they would in effect have to forego this right for limited periods during the winter. Mr. Friedkin agreed that this was the difficult point for Mexico. Mr. Chayes observed that the two Presidents had agreed to work out a practical solution without regard to their juridical positions. He thought the temporary solution for this winter fit this formula and hoped that the Mexicans would agree.

Secretary Udall agreed that there had to be a long term solution. Working out a long-term solution was not as easy, however, because it would require appropriations. He considered the alternatives the installation of tile drain or the by-pass channel. He recalled that his Department had obtained funds to install 8,000 acres of tile drain at Wellton-Mohawk and that this construction is now well underway. However, Bureau of Reclamation's model studies to date do not reveal that tile drains would be effective in initially reducing salinity of the drainage effluent as indications are that the tile drains would intercept and discharge the saline waters of the lower aquifer. It is understood, however, that installation of a tile drain system and abandonment of the deep well pumping would satisfy Mexican interests and would avoid the legal issues raised by a by-pass channel. Mr. Dominy observed that the Bureau's model studies are not definitive and that there is conflicting evidence on the effectiveness of tile drains insofar as producing a drainage effluent of better quality than that from the deep drainage wells. Commissioner Friedkin agreed that there was conflicting evidence on the tile drain solution. Nevertheless, the Mexican Commissioner regarded tile drain as an acceptable method of drainage and Commissioner Friedkin thought that the United States could defend itself on using this type of drainage at Wellton-Mohawk.

Secretary Udall said that his Department would consider a by-pass channel as a long-term solution if tile drain proved impractical. He emphasized that the long-term solution required appropriations and that he and Commissioner Dominy would have to discuss it with Senator Hayden and other interested parties before he could make a definitive decision. He wanted to be assured that the Mexican Government would not publicly discuss the possible alternatives before he could complete the necessary discussions. Mr. Sayre said that the Mexican Government had consistently taken the position that it had a commitment from President Kennedy to resolve the problem by October but had not discussed possible alternatives. He thought the Mexican Government would agree to avoid any discussions of details. He said the Department could instruct Ambassador Mann to discuss the matter with the Foreign Minister and obtain a specific commitment to that effect.

The Secretary of State inquired whether the Mexican Government had indicated it would accept the temporary solution proposed for the winter of 1963-64. Mr. Sayre said that Foreign Minister Tello had proposed informally to Ambassador Mann a temporary solution along the lines the Department of State had recommended. The Foreign Minister had not been specific in his conversation, but Mr. Sayre thought the proposal would be acceptable to Mexico.

It was agreed that Commissioner Friedkin would obtain as soon as possible Mexico's proposed diversion schedule for the winter of 1963-64 so that the Bureau of Reclamation could develop an operating program for coordinating the pumping at Wellton-Mohawk with the diversion schedule. It was also understood that Commissioner Friedkin could assure the Mexican Commissioner that the United States would make a decision soon on a long-term solution.

It was agreed that the Department of State would instruct Ambassador Mann to discuss the matter with the Mexican Foreign Minister, to inform him in general terms of the temporary solution proposed for this winter, to assure him that a decision would be made on a long-term solution soon, and to obtain a commitment from him that the Mexican Government would avoid any discussion of the details of the temporary solution or the possible alternatives for a long-term solution.

Venezuela

213. Memorandum of conversation, March 31 between Foreign Minister Falcon Briceno and Thomas C. Mann, and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials¹

March 31, 1961

SUBJECT

VENEZUELA: Urgent Need for Financial Assistance

PARTICIPANTS

Dr. Marcos FALCON BRICEÑO, Foreign Minister of Venezuela
Dr. Raul NASS, Counselor, Venezuelan Embassy
Thomas C. Mann, Assistant Secretary of State
Milton J. Barall, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State
John J. Ingersoll, Officer in Charge of Venezuelan Affairs
William Pryce, Staff Assistant to Mr. Mann

COPIES TO

ARA — Mr. Mann
ARA — Mr. Barall
S — Mr. Berle
E — Mr. Martin
FN — Mr. Moser
EST — Mr. Boonstra
EST — Mr. Ingersoll

REA — Amb. Turkel
INR — AmEmbassy Caracas

Dr. Falcon Briceño called on Mr. Mann, by appointment, to discuss a number of matters. Other subjects covered in this talk are reported separately.

The Foreign Minister spoke with some emotion about the urgent need of Venezuela for financial assistance from the United States, covering much the same ground as he had on the preceding day in his talk with Mr. Berle.

Mr. Mann suggested the desirability of a "package" of assistance for Venezuela, and to this end recommended consideration of the utility of a team of well-known, Latin American economists and technicians from the Inter-American Development Bank and other financial agencies visiting Venezuela and working out with the GOV plans for meeting the immediate problem and also for long-range economic development. Such persons should be experts in their fields but, perhaps more important, they would be thoroughly familiar with the criteria, procedures and policies of the various Washington lending agencies.

¹ Venezuela's urgent need for financial assistance. Confidential. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 731.5-MSP/3-3161.

Dr. Falcon Briceño said he felt that Venezuela has good economists and technicians who know what needs to be done, from an economic and financial point of view. But, he said, the arithmetic is easy; the real problem is political. He said that to balance the budget would require reducing the payroll of the Federal Government by more than 24,000 persons. Virtually all of these are in Caracas and their discharge, into the already troublesome ranks of the unemployed, would be political suicide for the Betancourt Government. He said that all of the existing financial institutions are fine but that for the Venezuelan situation they take too long. He said that while their long-term development plans are being worked out, democracies such as Venezuela can founder. This is the aspect which makes the problem frighteningly urgent.

Mr. Mann said he felt the sending of a team of technicians to Caracas would help speed things up rather than lose time. He suggested also that the Venezuelan Government prepare figures and hard factual data and, with such material in hand, talk privately with Secretary Dillon and others at the forthcoming Rio de Janeiro Conference of the IDB.

214. Memorandum of conversation, May 5, between Perez Guerrero and Bowles and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials¹

May 5, 1961

SUBJECT

Venezuelan Financial Mission's Call on The Under Secretary

PARTICIPANTS

Dr. Manuel PEREZ GUERRERO, Director, Office of Coordination and Planning, Venezuela

Dr. Jose Antonio MAYOBRE, Ambassador of Venezuela

Dr. Ivan SENIOR, Director, Office of Public Credit, Ministry of Finance of Venezuela

Mr. Alejandro OPOPEZA Castillo, Governor, Federal District of Caracas

¹ Request by the Special Financial Mission from Venezuela for U.S. assistance with its economic development program. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 331.

Mr. Oscar NIEMTSCHIK, Economic Counselor, Embassy of Venezuela
Dr. Carlos SOSA Rodriguez, Venezuelan Ambassador to the Un N.
The Under Secretary
Teodoro Moscoso, U.S. Ambassador-Designate to Venezuela
John J. Ingersoll, Officer in Charge of Venezuelan Affairs

The Venezuelan Special Financial Mission, headed by Dr. Perez Guerrero, called on the Under Secretary, by appointment, at 4:15 p.m. on May 5, 1961. The Under Secretary received the group in the diplomatic waiting-room adjoining the Secretary's suite.

The Under Secretary expressed his pleasure in receiving the Mission and inquired about their activities and objectives.

Dr. Perez Guerrero explained that his purpose was to meet with officials of the United States Government concerned with financial matters and with officials of the several United States and international lending institutions from which his Government hoped to obtain assistance in carrying out its four-year economic development program and in achieving budgetary balance and restoring confidence in the investment and financial stability of Venezuela. He outlined briefly the sense of his group's meetings with Department officers and his immediately preceding meetings with Secretary of Treasury Dillon and with Mr. George McGovern, of the President's Food for Peace Program. He said that his mission would meet with officers of the Export-Import Bank immediately after this call and that one of the items with which he was most concerned was a request to the Eximbank for a further $50 million credit on terms similar to those of a credit for a like amount which is in the final stages of negotiation. He expressed his hope that his Government could count on the support of the Under Secretary and the Department of State for this credit which is much needed as a part of the Government's over-all development program.

The Under Secretary expressed the desire of the United States Government to help effectively to improve living standards and economic and social conditions in under-developed countries and noted that these efforts must be accompanied by serious efforts on the part of the peoples of the less developed countries themselves. He said that we and countries receiving assistance from us have made mistakes in the past and that he hoped we all have learned from our mistakes.

Ambassador Mayobre asked the Under Secretary if it might not be possible for the Department of State to issue a statement to the press regarding the Perez-Guerrero mission and the serious desire of the United States to help the Venezuelan Government succeed with its economic development and stabilization programs. He said that the IBRD and the IDB were planning to issue releases and that such a statement by the U.S. Government would be most helpful psychologically in Venezuela.

The Under Secretary said the Department would be glad to issue an appropriate statement. He instructed Ambassador Moscoso and Mr. Ingersoll to check with Mr. Rogers in his office on the preparation of such a statement.

Dr. Perez Guerrero thanked the Under Secretary for his kindness in receiving the group and expressed his pleasure with the warm and constructive reception his mission had been receiving from all of their contacts in the United States Government.

215. Memorandum of conversation, June 22, between President of the Chamber of Deputies Caldera, Ambassador Mayobre and Rusk and Ingersoll¹

June 22, 1961

SUBJECT

VENEZUELA: Political Situation

PARTICIPANTS

Dr. Rafael CALDERA, President of the Chamber of Deputies of Venezuela

Dr. Jose Antonio MAYOBRE, Ambassador of Venezuela

The Secretary

John J. Ingersoll, Officer in Charge of Venezuelan Affairs

Dr. Caldera, accompanied by Ambassador Mayobre called on the Secretary at 4:40 p.m. today.

The Secretary expressed his pleasure to see Dr. Caldera and Dr. Caldera said he wished to express to the Secretary the appreciation of his Government for the sympathetic and helpful attitude of the Department and the new Administration for Venezuela's problems.

The Secretary asked Dr. Caldera what are the principal problems occupying the attention of the Venezuelan Government.

Dr. Caldera said that the principal problems are economic at the present time. He described the budget difficulties, the unemployment situation and the austerity measures proposed by President Betancourt.

¹ Political situation in Venezuela. Official Use Only. 2 pp. DOS, CF, 731.00/6-2261.

He said that the communists and other extremists had labelled these measures "Program of Hunger". He said that for the most part the Government has demonstrated its ability to control the subversive and disruptive efforts of the left-wing extremists.

The Secretary inquired about the political conditions at the University and Dr. Caldera said that political action by his party and other moderate elements is necessary at the University and secondary school level because the communists are extremely active in these fields and must not be left to control these vital groups. Dr. Caldera said that the recent elections in the labor unions and in the Universities have shown considerable and growing strength on the part of the COPEI and AD forces. He outlined in some detail the extent of the recent victories in the individual Universities.

The Secretary asked about the strength of religion in Venezuelan politics. Dr. Caldera replied that the Venezuelans try to keep religion and politics separated. There followed some general discussion of the tactics and ability of the communists to extend their influence at all levels of the population, particularly in the towns and villages and rural areas. The Secretary said that Mr. Khrushchev has tried to label the United States the "Gendarme of the Status Quo" and that we must make clear to the common people everywhere that this is not so and that we do, in fact, sincerely desire to improve the lot of the common man but in an atmosphere of freedom.

Dr. Caldera thanked the Secretary for his courtesy in receiving him and expressed his hope that they would meet again soon.

216. Memorandum from Battle to Swank, October 16¹

October 16, 1961

Memoranda of Conversation Between the Secretary and Venezuelan Foreign Minister Falcon-Briceño

The following memoranda of conversation, dated October 6, between the Venezuelan Foreign Minister and the Secretary are referred for approval prior to distribution:

Tab A—Perez Jimenez Extradition Case;

Tab B—The Cuban Problem; and

Tab C—U.S. Congressman Rousselot's Verbal Attack on President Betancourt.

These memoranda were drafted by Mr. Moskowitz, the Venezuelan Desk Officer. The Secretary's remarks are sidlined in red. These memoranda are considered suitable for distribution to CIA.

L.D. BattleTab A*SUBJECT

Pérez Jiménez Extradition Case

PARTICIPANTS

Dr. Marcos Falcón-Briceño, Foreign Minister of Venezuela

Dr. Jose Antonio Mayobre, Ambassador of Venezuela

The Secretary

ABA—Mr. Coerr

EST—Mr. Moskowitz

The Venezuelan Foreign Minister had requested an appointment with the Secretary to discuss several matters of mutual interest.

Dr. Falcón-Briceño brought up the subject of the Marcos Pérez Jiménez extradition case. He touched briefly on the legal developments to date and then expressed the concern of the Venezuelan Government that Pérez Jiménez may attempt to flee the country as the time approaches for a verdict by the Appellate Court. He said that he did not believe there was a great likelihood that Pérez Jiménez might flee before such a moment. However, he mentioned that Mr. Westwood, of the law firm representing the Venezuelan Government in the case, had expressed his fear to the Venezuelan Government and to United States authorities that Pérez Jiménez might take advantage of the absence of surveillance to make good his escape.

¹ Transmits memoranda of conversation, between Rusk and Foreign Minister Falcon-Briceño. Perez Jimenez extradition case; Cuban Problem. Confidential. 4 pp. DOS, Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 331.

The Secretary referred to the legal limitations confronting the United States executive authorities in this particular matter. He pointed out that the Department had expressed its concern to the Justice Department and asked that the necessary measures be undertaken to prevent Pérez Jiménez from fleeing illegally. He also stated that when the case was resumed the Department of Justice might undertake to approach the Court about Pérez Jiménez's bail.

Tab B

SUBJECT

The Cuban Problem

PARTICIPANTS

Dr. Marcos Falcón-Briceño, Foreign Minister of Venezuela

Dr. Jose Antonio Mayobre, Ambassador of Venezuela

The Secretary

ARA—Mr. Coerr

EST—Mr. Moskowitz

The Venezuelan Foreign Minister had requested an appointment with the Secretary to discuss several matters of mutual interest.

The Secretary asked the Foreign Minister for his opinion of the Cuban problem.

The Foreign Minister immediately referred to a recent speech by President Betancourt in which the latter had stated publicly that only humanitarian reasons were preventing a break in diplomatic relations between Venezuela and Cuba. The Minister pointed out that there were still close to 70 asylees in the Venezuelan Embassy in Habana for whom the Cuban Government had thus far refused to issue safe conduct passes. Among these were former Cuban President Urrutia and his young daughter (granddaughter?). The latter was suffering from a serious illness and the Minister thought that it was possible that she might die in the Venezuelan Embassy if permission were not granted for her to leave to receive medical treatment. He said also that the Venezuelan Chargé had recently returned to Habana with orders to do everything possible to get the Cuban Government to issue safe conduct passes for the asylees remaining in the Embassy. In response to a question he answered that about 70% of the asylees in the Venezuelan Embassy, who had numbered more than 200 a few weeks ago, had been given safe conduct passes and had departed with the assistance of a Venezuelan sponsored airlift.

The Foreign Minister mentioned that there were numerous Cubans living in Venezuela who were divided into pro- and anti-Castro groups. They were creating problems for the Venezuelan Government by engaging not only in polemics but also in what amounted to terrorist activities against one another.

The Foreign Minister stated that Venezuela's position on Cuba was well known to the Department and alluded again to President Betancourt's recent speech, mentioned above, as being indicative of the Venezuelan Government's antipathy for the Castro regime. The Minister stated that he had heard the rumor that there might be some early action from the Inter-American Peace Committee on the Cuban problem and asked whether we had any information on this.

Mr. Coerr stated that we were interested in possible action by the Inter-American Peace Committee as were a number of Latin American states.

217. National Intelligence Estimate No. 89-61, November 21¹

November 21, 1961

THE SITUATION IN VENEZUELA

THE PROBLEM

To estimate the prospects for the Betancourt government, for the survival of democratic government in Venezuela, and for orderly social and economic reform.

CONCLUSIONS

1. Venezuela, an extraordinarily wealthy country in terms of its natural and financial resources, is nevertheless beset by severe economic, social, and political problems which reflect the strains inherent in a transition, in one lifetime, from military dictatorship and an oligarchic social order toward a democratic welfare state. (Paras. 10-11)

¹ "The Situation in Venezuela." Secret. 3 pp. CIA Files: Job 79-R01012A, ODDI Registry.

2. The Betancourt administration, elected after the overthrow of the Perez Jimenez dictatorship, is a social democratic-Christian socialist coalition committed to the evolutionary reform of economic and social institutions. It is opposed by extreme leftists, including the Communists and other Castro sympathizers, and also by rightist elements, but, with the support of the armed forces, has survived repeated coup attempts, including several attempts to assassinate Betancourt. (Paras. 15–22)

3. Pro-Castro sentiment, once strong in Venezuela, has sharply declined. In late 1960, the successful suppression of serious disorders fomented by the revolutionary left showed that it lacked sufficient strength to coerce or overthrow the government. (Paras. 23–27)

4. Despite the resources available to it, the Betancourt government is beset by severe financial problems resulting from (a) the end of the Venezuelan oil boom, with a consequent decline in the growth of income from the petroleum industry, and (b) greatly increased expenditures for politically necessary social welfare programs. Its difficulties have been further complicated by a serious economic recession and heavy flight of capital. Unemployment now amounts to about 12 percent of the labor force and is rising. (Paras. 33–36)

5. The government is counting heavily on external assistance to restore business confidence and to carry out its programs for economic recovery and development. Even with such aid, progress in these respects is likely to be slow and uncertain. (Paras. 37–41)

6. Popular dissatisfaction and impatience with the slow rate of economic improvement is likely to grow, especially in the congested urban areas. This dissatisfaction will provide the Communists and other revolutionary leftists with further opportunities for agitation against the regime. At the same time, distrust and dissatisfaction in business circles is likely to continue, and some rightists will continue to conspire with reactionary military elements to overthrow the regime. Thus Betancourt will remain under continuing threat from both the left and the right. (Para. 42)

7. On the other hand, Betancourt enters the final half of his term with certain important advantages. His standing in the Caribbean area as a leading exponent of constitutional government and moderate reform adds to his domestic prestige. The military will probably continue to support him against threats from the right as well as from the revolutionary left. (Paras. 43–44)

8. On balance, we believe that Betancourt will probably be able to serve out his term, ending in early 1964. We are much less confident, however, that his administration will have provided a stable foundation for the continuation of constitutional government. (Paras. 45–48)

9. Betancourt has carefully avoided any appearance of dependence on the US, but has done his part to keep relations with the US on a cordial footing. His position at home and in the area has been strengthened by recent developments in the Dominican Republic. He probably is inclined to go along with an inter-American acceptance to the Balaguer government in the Dominican Republic now that the Trujillo family's power over it has been broken. He has broken diplomatic relations with Cuba, and is supporting the Colombian proposals for collective action against the Castro regime. (Paras. 49–51)

[Here follows the discussion section of the paper.]

218. Memorandum of conversation, December 16, between President Kennedy and President Betancourt and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials¹

December 16, 1961

SUBJECT

Conference Between President Kennedy and Venezuelan President Betancourt—Community Development

PARTICIPANTS

The President
 Ambassador Chester Bowles
 Mr. C. Allan Stewart, Chargé d'Affaires ad interim
 Mr. Robert F. Woodward, Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs
 Mr. Teodoro Moscoso, Assistant Administrator for Latin America of the Agency for International Development
 Mr. Richard Goodwin, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Latin American Affairs
 Mr. Harold Linder, President of Export-Import Bank of Washington
 Mr. Fernando van Reigersberg, LS staff interpreter
 President Romulo Betancourt of Venezuela
 Dr. Marcos Falcón Briceño, Foreign Minister of Venezuela
 Dr. Andres German Otero, Minister of Finance of Venezuela
 General Antonio Briceño Linares, Minister of Defense of Venezuela
 Dr. Jose Antonio Mayobre, Venezuelan Ambassador to the United States
 Dr. Alejandro Oropeza Castillo, Governor of the Federal District of Venezuela
 Dr. Manuel Perez Guerrero, Chief, Office of Coordination and Planning, Venezuelan Government

¹ Community development-housing/slum clearance project. Limited Official Use. 3 pp. DOS, Presidential Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.

The meeting convened at 5:15 p.m. on December 16, 1961, at Los Nuñez, President Betancourt's residence in Caracas, Venezuela. Several unrelated matters were discussed at this conference, including the subject covered in this memorandum.

Community Development—Housing/Slum Clearance Project

President Betancourt asked Governor Oropeza to explain the national community and municipal program and urban low-cost housing improvement plan described in his memorandum No. 3.

Governor Oropeza spoke of the necessity of hastening urban housing, pointing out that the shacks (ranchos) ringing Caracas were eloquent testimony of the need. He said the Federal District needed this type of low-cost housing most, but that similar problems were faced in Maracaibo, Maracay, Cumaná and other larger cities. A total sum of $50,000,000 is needed in 1962.

Dr. Oropeza stated that certain funds for housing had already been obtained by Venezuela. However, the situation in Caracas was extremely critical and special funds that could not be obtained from traditional sources would be necessary in order to start work. Venezuela's funds are one-hundredth of what is really needed. Therefore, a new approach in financing had become necessary.

President Betancourt asserted that 33 per cent of the population of Caracas lived in shacks forming a cordon around the city. On the other hand the Government had ambitious plans for an independent autonomous foundation to provide a massive community development program which would re-locate persons, provide light, sewers, self-help housing, and improve economic opportunities. He cited that of every 300 persons in Venezuela, only 30 had access to running water. He said this project needed special financing, not being within the realm of the Export-Import Bank, IDB or DLF.

Mr. Moscoso remarked that he was well acquainted with the problem and that a more careful study of requirements for Caracas low-cost urban housing had to be made. He suggested that a housing expert be brought from Puerto Rico to make the study. He said that plans have to be drawn up very carefully. Knowing that a problem exists is not enough. A solution can only be justified by the programs that are necessary to solve the existing problem. We might be able to work out a five year commitment for the United States to do certain things provided Venezuela did part of the work. Slum clearance is a very urgent matter. People who live in slums should be given the hope of improving their lot. Some slums have to be eliminated completely and some can be rehabilitated by building roads, water supply systems, and sewage facilities. The extremely bad social conditions which prevail in the Caracas slums give the Communists fertile ground for subversion. If work could start soon in various parts of the city it would give people the necessary hope and incentives.

Mr. Goodwin emphasized that plans were extremely important in order to justify the projects.

President Kennedy stated that two problems have hindered progress in this field; insufficient planning on the Venezuelan side and excessive slowness on the American side. It would be important for Mr. Fowler Hamilton and Mr. Moscoso to look into the matter at once. The United States can provide technical assistance in drawing up the necessary plans in order to justify the project. This technical assistance would include the training of Venezuelan experts who could take an active part in the actual implementation of the plans.

Dr. Perez Guerrero stated that if Venezuela were given the opportunity to start this type of work and if it received assistance during the next few months it would be able to get out of the present recession and use more of its own resources. Time is an essential factor. Long-term fund commitments are indispensable for sensible planning. All traditional sources of funds have been used for other projects and a new approach is necessary for this type of work.

President Kennedy stated that funds available for Latin America are probably insufficient. However, it will be difficult to get additional funds from Congress.

President Betancourt underlined the importance of slum clearance and housing.

219. Memorandum of conversation, December 16, between President Kennedy and President Betancourt and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials¹

December 16, 1961

SUBJECT

Conference Between President Kennedy and Venezuelan President Betancourt—Oil Imports Problem

PARTICIPANTS

The President
Ambassador Chester Bowles
Mr. C. Allan Stewart, Chargé d’Affaires ad interim
Mr. Robert F. Woodward, Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs
Mr. Teodoro Moscoso, Assistant Administrator for Latin America of the Agency for International Development
Mr. Richard Goodwin, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Latin American Affairs
Mr. Harold Linder, President of Export-Import Bank of Washington
Mr. Fernando van Reigersberg, LS staff interpreter
President Romulo Betancourt of Venezuela
Dr. Marcos Falcón Briceño, Foreign Minister of Venezuela
Dr. Andres German Otero, Minister of Finance of Venezuela
General Antonio Briceño Linares, Minister of Defense of Venezuela
Dr. Jose Antonio Mayobre, Venezuelan Ambassador to the United States
Dr. Alejandro Oropeza Castillo, Governor of the Federal District of Venezuela
Dr. Manuel Perez Guerrero, Chief, Office of Coordination and Planning,
Venezuelan Government

The meeting convened at 5:15 p.m. on December 16, 1961, at Los Nuñez, President Betancourt’s residence in Caracas, Venezuela. Several unrelated matters were discussed at this conference, including the subject covered in this memorandum.

Oil Import Problem

President Betancourt at this point expressed Venezuela’s concern about United States restrictions on imports of Venezuelan oil, which is discussed in memorandum No. 1 of four submitted to President Kennedy by the Venezuelan President. He said this matter was extremely vital for Venezuela and he hoped that the United States Government would give it further study. He indicated that Venezuela was interested in increasing its quotas both for residual and crude oil, with emphasis on the latter. He said considerable harm was being done the Venezuelan oil industry by granting United States inland independent refineries oil quotas which they, in turn, assigned to other importers to the detriment of Venezuela.

¹ Oil imports problem. Limited Official Use. 2 pp. DOS, Presidential Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.

When President Kennedy asked whether an increase in residual oil imports would help Venezuela, the Venezuelan President said this would indeed be helpful but any decrease in crude oil imports would seriously hurt the local industry.

Mr. Goodwin pointed out that the present quotas had been frozen for six months while a study was being made and there was no intention for the moment of decreasing Venezuelan crude imports.

President Kennedy stated that the United States might be able to assist Venezuela by increasing residual imports but crude was another matter. However, he promised to look into (1) residual oil; (2) increasing crude imports, and (3) the question of import licenses for inland refineries. He stated that a meeting on the oil problem had already been held and that another was scheduled for next week. To illustrate the problems connected with crude imports he explained that the key Senator on whom the success of his new trade program rested came from an oil-producing state.

Ambassador Mayobre said Juan Pablo Pérez Alfonzo, Venezuelan Minister of Mines and Hydrocarbons, was in New Orleans for medical treatment but planned to visit Washington early in January for discussions. President Kennedy said he did not plan to wait until January to look into the problem and added he would keep in touch personally with President Betancourt on the oil import program.

220. Memorandum of conversation, December 16, between President Kennedy and President Betancourt and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials¹

December 16, 1961

SUBJECT

Conference Between President Kennedy and Venezuelan President Betancourt—Military Assistance

PARTICIPANTS

The President
Ambassador Chester Bowles
Mr. C. Allan Stewart, Chargé d’Affaires ad interim
Mr. Robert F. Woodward, Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs
Mr. Teodoro Moscoso, Assistant Administrator for Latin America of the Agency for International Development
Mr. Richard Goodwin, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Latin American Affairs
Mr. Harold Linder, President of Export-Import Bank of Washington
Mr. Fernando van Reigersberg, LS staff interpreter
President Romulo Betancourt of Venezuela
Dr. Marcos Falcón Briceño, Foreign Minister of Venezuela
Dr. Andres German Otero, Minister of Finance of Venezuela
General Antonio Briceño Linares, Minister of Defense of Venezuela
Dr. Jose Antonio Mayobre, Venezuelan Ambassador to the United States
Dr. Alejandro Oropeza Castillo, Governor of the Federal District of Venezuela
Dr. Manuel Perez Guerrero, Chief, Office of Coordination and Planning,
Venezuelan Government

The meeting convened at 5:15 p.m. on December 16, 1961, at Los Nuñez, President Betancourt’s residence in Caracas, Venezuela. Several unrelated matters were discussed at this conference, including the subject covered in this memorandum.

Military Assistance to Venezuela

Minister of Defense Briceño Linares was asked by President Betancourt to discuss military equipment needs. General Briceño Linares said that the equipment of the Venezuelan armed forces was obsolete and worn out and that, in view of the Castro menace and increasing arms smuggling, it was vital that new equipment be obtained on long credit terms to make the Venezuelan armed forces more efficient. The Air Force is flying F–86’s and some European-made airplanes but would need new equipment. The same applies to the Army, which is also in great need of new barracks.

¹ Military assistance. Secret. 3 pp. DOS, Presidential Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.

President Kennedy invited General Briceño to visit Washington to discuss his needs with the Pentagon. He asked what Venezuela needed and the Minister said he was preparing a list.

President Kennedy indicated that there has been considerable Congressional curtailment of funds for military assistance to Latin America as a result of previous use of some of these funds in Latin American countries under dictators who procured weapons which they utilized to keep themselves in power. President Kennedy expressed the opinion that Castro did not present a great overt aggressive threat to Venezuela because, if his forces attacked Venezuela, the OAS and US would come to Venezuela's defense in a matter of hours. He did think, however, that Venezuela might justify its military needs to provide internal security against such things as guerrilla warfare and arms smuggling.

General Briceño said unassessed intelligence in possession of his Government indicated that Panama, through the collaboration of the Panamanian National Guard and a "prominent Panamanian family", was becoming a dangerous center for smuggling of arms, some of which were coming into Venezuela. This information has been uncovered by the Venezuelan military and additional studies are being made. When asked whether Iron Curtain Country weapons were being encountered, General Briceño replied that most of them were surplus weapons emanating from the United States and from many European countries.

President Kennedy stated that some way should be found of halting arms smuggling and added that if General Briceño could devise a plan for so doing and present it during his Washington trip it would be very helpful. The President said that it might be possible to take some Caribbean-wide measures to counter this smuggling. This might include the creation of Caribbean defense machinery.

President Betancourt stated that a special fund administered by the armed forces had been heavily drawn upon for the purpose of lending money to the military for housing and additional new funds were needed. He inquired whether funds that are appropriated under the Mutual Security program could be assigned to this housing fund. President Betancourt pointed out that, in general, Venezuela does not want more equipment but only wishes to replace that which is becoming useless. The change would be for conventional and more modern equipment without seeking anything fancy. He said the Venezuelan aircraft were antiquated and that ships which go out on Unitas maneuvers thereafter require expensive overhauling abroad. The purchase of these ships in Europe during the dictatorship was accompanied by huge graft payments with the result that Venezuela got stung. Venezuela has only one submarine, although three crews have been trained and a morale problem is thereby created.

General Briceño also mentioned the need for an additional submarine.

President Kennedy replied that it would be very difficult to provide a submarine at the present time.

President Kennedy said he would look forward to seeing General Briceño in Washington and would put him in contact with the Defense Department. He asked again that General Briceño attempt to devise a solution to the arms smuggling problem.

General Briceño, as a parting shot, mentioned the gift of aircraft to Yugoslavia and President Kennedy said the aircraft obtained helped the Yugoslavs very little.

President Betancourt thanked President Kennedy and expressed his satisfaction over a very fruitful meeting.

The meeting concluded at 7:00 P.M.

221. Memorandum of conversation, December 16, between President Kennedy and President Betancourt and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials¹

December 16, 1961

SUBJECT

Conference Between President Kennedy and Venezuelan President Betancourt—Refinancing Venezuela's External Debt

PARTICIPANTS

The President
Ambassador Chester Bowles
Mr. C. Allan Stewart, Chargé d'Affaires ad interim
Mr. Robert F. Woodward, Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs
Mr. Teodoro Moscoso, Assistant Administrator for Latin America of the Agency for International Development
Mr. Richard Goodwin, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Latin American Affairs
Mr. Harold Linder, President of Export-Import Bank of Washington
Mr. Fernando van Reigersberg, LS staff interpreter
President Romulo Betancourt of Venezuela
Dr. Marcos Falcón Briceño, Foreign Minister of Venezuela

¹ Refinancing Venezuelan external debt. Limited Official Use. 2 pp. DOS, Presidential Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 66 D 149.

Dr. Andres German Otero, Minister of Finance of Venezuela
General Antonio Briceño Linares, Minister of Defense of Venezuela
Dr. Jose Antonio Mayobre, Venezuelan Ambassador to the United States
Dr. Alejandro Oropeza Castillo, Governor of the Federal District of Venezuela
Dr. Manuel Perez Guerrero, Chief, Office of Coordination and Planning,
Venezuelan Government

The meeting convened at 5:15 p.m. on December 16, 1961, at Los Nuñez, President Betancourt's residence in Caracas, Venezuela. Several unrelated matters were discussed at this conference, including the subject covered in this memorandum.

Refinancing Venezuela's External Debt

President Betancourt introduced the subject of refinancing Venezuela's external debt, which is discussed in detail in his memorandum No. 2, and called upon his Finance Minister, Dr. Otero, to make an oral presentation. Dr. Otero said the Government of Venezuela is called upon to pay $118,400,000 in each of the years 1962 and 1963 to cover loans received from United States commercial banks and to repay treasury bonds financed by external institutions. The 1962 budget provides for repayment but the Government would prefer that part of the sum be refinanced over a longer term to free the budgeted funds for developmental projects in the country. He asked for United States support in obtaining longer terms from the private banking institutions. He said that negotiations on Venezuela's behalf were being undertaken by Mr. George Woods of the First Boston Corporation to have part of the debts mature over a 10-year period of time and some headway was being made. The Chase Manhattan Bank and the First National City Bank seemed disposed to postpone until 1964 three-fourths of the amounts due in 1962 on their loan.

President Kennedy stated that he was familiar with the situation and that he hoped that Minister Otero would have a chance to discuss this matter with Mr. Linder, President of the Export-Import Bank.

Mr. Moscoso expressed the view that the proposal made by the commercial banks could be improved and he and Mr. Woods were of the opinion that the Venezuelan Government should seek a better deal. Mr. Moscoso said that he was working closely on the matter with Mr. Woods, hoping to have half of the 1962-63 payments financed on a long-term basis. He added that Venezuela needs long-term capital and should try to obtain a delay in repaying any debts for a couple of years in order to strengthen its economic and financial position.

Dr. Falcon Briceño asked whether the new law concerning insurance of credits could be extended to Venezuela and he was assured that it could be.

President Kennedy said he would talk next week to Secretary of the Treasury Dillon about this subject and that he would confer also with Mr. Moscoso and Mr. Linder in Washington.

222. Memorandum from Hilsman to Edwin M. Martin, May 29¹

May 29, 1962

SUBJECT

Venezuela and the Alliance for Progress

The following study on Venezuela has been prepared in connection with the meeting of the Latin American Policy Committee to be held June 7.

1. Political Setting

The Venezuelan political picture has historically been characterized by chronic instability and extended periods of dictatorship, usually in the persons of military caudillos. Progress toward popular self-government is a product of the last 25 years, but was interrupted by the authoritarian regime of General Marcos Pérez Jiménez (1948–58). In fact, the present government headed by President Rómulo Betancourt, who recently completed three years in office, is the longest-lived popularly elected civilian government in the country's experience.

Power and authority in the society traditionally rested with an oligarchy of landholders and merchants. However, in response to increasingly insistent popular demands for representative government and socio-economic reforms during the past quarter century, two vigorous and competing political forces emerged: the armed forces, which espoused order and authority and were also eager to seize and exercise power in their own interest, and mass-based political parties. In addition, as part of the process of modernization of the country in recent decades, a new class of industrial and commercial representatives has arisen to displace the old order as directing elements in the society. Moreover, burgeoning urban labor and middle class groups have made their appearance, and at present the political party and government leadership is largely derived from the latter sector.

The Betancourt government was elected to a 5-year term in December 1958 in an atmosphere marked by widespread revulsion over the excesses of the recently overthrown Pérez Jiménez dictatorship, strong popular determination to prevent a return to authoritarianism, and a formal pre-election agreement to establish a coalition government with representation of the major political parties and independent political sectors and to undertake basic socio-economic reforms. Inaugurated in ¹ Venezuela and the Alliance for Progress. Confidential. 8 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, William H. Brubeck Series, Venezuela, 1961–1962.

February 1959, President Betancourt organized a coalition government comprised of his own Democratic Action (AD) Party, the Social Christian (COPEI) Party, the Republican Democratic Union (URD) Party, and political independents, which was endorsed by the armed forces and all major non-political civilian groups.

During the first two years of the regime, President Betancourt followed a policy of preserving harmonious relations among the political parties as a prerequisite for survival of constitutional, democratic government, and initiated action on a comprehensive 4-year socio-economic reform program. Nevertheless, from its inception the government was subjected to a continuing series of attempted coups d'état by disgruntled reactionary civilian and dissident rightist military elements, including an almost successful assassination attempt against the President. These moves have been thwarted by effective government action, strongly supported by the armed forces, and rightist plotters have been generally discredited. Nevertheless, their activities continue at the present time.

In addition, since mid-1960 the Betancourt government has been threatened by the militant activities of extreme leftist groups, including the Communists (PCV), the pro-Communist Leftist Revolutionary Movement (MIR) and elements of the URD, seeking its overthrow and the installation of a Castro-type regime. To counter this threat the government partially suspended constitutional guarantees and initiated a campaign of moderate harassment against these groups. With the separation of the URD from the coalition in late 1960, President Betancourt reorganized his government along a narrower but more homogeneous political basis, including only AD, COPEI and independents, which still retained majority control over the Congress and organized labor and continued to have the support of the armed forces and responsible non-political groups. The coalition lost control of the lower house of Congress in early 1962 after a "Young Turk" group (ARS) abandoned the AD and joined forces with the opposition. Moreover, in recent months the government has had to contend with renewed agitation by extreme leftist forces including a small Communist-student guerrilla movement in the interior, a campaign of terrorist activities in the major urban areas, and a sizable abortive revolt by dissident leftwing military elements collaborating with PCV and MIR in the port city of Carúpano in early May. In the face of considerable popular unrest over the continuing violence and indications of growing armed forces uneasiness, the government undertook vigorous military action to curb the guerrilla groups and on May 10 issued a decree banning PCV and MIR activities.

2. The Socio-Economic Setting

The large-scale development of its petroleum resources during the past 20 years has provided Venezuela with the highest economic growth rate and per capita income in Latin America. It is the largest petroleum exporter and third largest petroleum producer in the world. Its tremendous natural resources offer the prospect for continued rapid advances and diversified economic development over the long run. However, even in the short run there is also the alternative of economic collapse and chaos as the result of a possible breakdown in orderly political processes.

US economic interest in Venezuela is quite substantial, since total US trade with the country is greater than with any other in Latin America and US direct investment in Venezuela (about $3 billion) is larger than in any other country except Canada. In fact, foreign capital and technology (US, British, Dutch) have been primarily responsible for development of the country's natural resources.

The population of over 7.5 million, although growing at an annual rate of about 3.5%, is small in comparison with Venezuela's natural resources, and the rapid economic expansion in recent years has not been accompanied by development of its human resources. Many Venezuelans have been virtually untouched by the nation's prosperity, and distribution of national income is extremely uneven. Thus, most Venezuelans are ill-fed, poorly housed, unhealthy, and lacking in basic facilities. As recently as 1958 perhaps 50% of the population was still illiterate, while several hundred thousand school age children were unable to attend school due to lack of teachers and adequate facilities. The housing shortage is on the order of an estimated 700,000 units and is increasing at the rate of more than 100,000 each year. Unemployment (about 13% of the labor force) and underemployment are critical problems, primarily in the large urban areas. As the result of the petroleum boom and recent heavy internal migration to the cities, there is a considerable imbalance between urban (70% of the population) and rural areas.

During the past 4 years the economy has been depressed by comparison with the pre-1958 high, and the annual economic growth rate has since declined almost to insignificance. This situation resulted from a combination of factors, including large-scale capital outflow, sharp reduction of foreign exchange reserves, Venezuela's weakened competitive position in the world petroleum market, a slowdown in petroleum exploration and construction, serious budgetary deficits, and widespread apprehension and distrust in foreign and domestic business circles concerning the economic policies and objectives of the leftist reform government. The problem has been aggravated by a marked increase in bureaucratic payrolls, the large expenditures required in the implementation of the government's reform program, and widespread opposition to austerity and exchange control measures.

The government's 4-year development program (adopted April 1960 and revised annually in subsequent years) calls for a more rational utilization of income derived from the petroleum industry in order to promote diversification and expansion of agriculture and industry, agrarian reform, and improvements in education, housing, and health and public welfare services. The plan gives target dates and specifies the goals set forth in each sector of planned development. Substantial but varying progress has been achieved to date in several areas of reform, notably agrarian resettlement, rural housing and education, but in other areas, such as urban renewal and measures to relieve unemployment, improvements have at best been haphazard. Nevertheless, the Betancourt government is one of the hemispheric leaders in the promotion of social reform and economic development within a democratic constitutional framework.

3. Problems and Prospects

The basic problem confronting Venezuela and, specifically, the Betancourt regime involves, on the one hand, strengthening the framework of constitutional, representative government and orderly political processes, and, on the other, moving forward energetically on socio-economic reforms, while promoting a revitalization of the economy and its diversification. The success of such efforts is hampered by lack of consensus in the society and violent divergences between political groupings in the country, which threaten to precipitate a breakdown in public order and reversion to authoritarian government. The vested interests—including the propertied groups, some of the military, and certain favored classes in the metropolitan area—developed their expectations during the 1950's boom period, tend to associate the Betancourt regime with lack of popular discipline and unsound economic policies, and regard the masses with fear and distrust. Some metropolitan interests see their future compromised by AD's emphasis on development of the hinterland and of human resources in general. Agrarian reform has whetted the appetite of campesinos for land, credits, and housing, without providing solutions up to the level demanded by this group. The national complex of dependence on the foreign petroleum companies nourishes suspicion and dislike of foreigners in dominant positions. Student groups supply a receptive audience for Communist and Castroist propaganda and have shown their alienation from society in violent demonstrations and, recently, in guerrilla activity.

In all these conflicts and suspicions extremist political forces find a fertile field to sow dissension and to hinder the growth of broad support of government programs for development. Frequently Venezuelans appear to be agreed only on the desirability of getting as much money as possible as fast as possible. This nourishes political conflict, since competing groups in the population make most of their claims in terms of material aid, direct or indirect, from the government. In this charged atmosphere the pressures on the government have increased considerably with adverse effects on the economy.

The close involvement of business, labor, agrarian, and unemployed elements as well as political parties with the exercise of government authority has meant that the maintenance of power on a democratic footing required a repeated marshalling of pro-government groups to match displays of force by the opposition. This in turn has tended to limit the flexibility and the range of action in government economic policy. To ask for austerity and restraint on behalf of a long-term investment program becomes impractical when political stability is constantly being placed in question by subversive movements of the right and the left.

Compounding the effect of pressures on the government for immediate satisfaction of conflicting demands is the general inexperience and incapacity of the bureaucracy. It is not only highly political by recruitment and by sympathy, but it is also learning to govern and administer on a trial and error basis. The present government and political leadership not only has much to learn about economic management but inherited a fiscal and administrative system little changed from pre-modern days. With a background largely in party organization this leadership is personalistic and expedient in approach, and it is not inclined to impose the discipline and standards needed for large-scale economic operations of the government at the expense of losing political support. Moreover, the tendency of the Old Guard political leadership, particularly in AD, to monopolize the positions of power has frustrated much of the parties' younger, less experienced element, with the consequence that much of this group has defected to the opposition and to advocating extremist solutions for the country's problems.

4. The Alliance for Progress and Related Programs

Until recently there was virtually no US assistance program for Venezuela, and the government's development plan originally did not call for large-scale foreign assistance. Nevertheless, during the past year a substantial Alliance for Progress program has been formulated with respect to Venezuela, involving assistance in the fields of programming and urban and rural development. The Venezuelan Government is also currently revising its 4-year development program in line with the coordinated country plan approach set down at Punta del Este, which is scheduled for early submission to the "Nine Wise Men" and the US Government. Considerable progress has been made in formulating Alliance programs and selecting projects, and some actual work is already in progress on a number of projects. Nevertheless, USAID Caracas is still only about one-third staffed and President Betancourt has complained to our Embassy over what he characterized as undue slowness in implementation of the Alliance program. This, obviously, is the major problem toward the solution of which those involved in the Alliance operation have been exerting their efforts.

To supplement the substantial progress already being achieved in the economic and social aspects, consideration might also be given to formulating a joint program directed specifically toward preserving political stability in Venezuela over the long run, and over the short run assisting the present government to fill out the remainder of its term (to March 1964), providing for an orderly transition of power to its duly elected successor, and contributing to the efforts of the moderate forces to win the late 1963 elections. Although the US capacity of influencing this situation directly is limited, our interest in the problem might be dramatized by efforts to improve the somewhat deteriorating relationship between Old Guard political leaders, who presently occupy most top positions in the government, the parties and the labor and peasant unions, and the younger leaders in these sectors, many of whom are frustrated in their ambitions to advance rapidly in their professions and see their progress blocked by the older element. We might influence this situation initially by approaching President Betancourt and other top government and party officials with suggestions for a joint US-Venezuelan undertaking along the following lines:

a) To establish in Caracas a Venezuelan version of the Costa Rican Institute of Political and Social Studies, which would offer political leadership training to acceptable (moderate, progressive, non-extremist) young members of the AD and possibly COPEI and independents. Young AD members have been participating in the Costa Rican experiment for some time; however, their numbers are limited and they are forced to be away from Venezuela for extended periods. An institution located in Venezuela would enable larger numbers of young political figures to participate while continuing to fill their party, labor, government or other positions. Moreover, assuming a favorable Venezuelan response, the United States would be able to contribute directly and to a greater degree than in Costa Rica to a new undertaking of this type, with the resultant political and propaganda advantages. As in Costa Rica US universities should be encouraged to participate. However, consideration should also be given to the possible propaganda and other pitfalls resulting from extensive official US involvement in such a project.

b) To expand on a priority basis the exchange program for young leaders, whereby really significant numbers of party, labor, government and other representatives are regularly invited to visit the United States (including Puerto Rico) for short observation, study, or other types of tours. To date the exchange program has been quite limited in this respect. An expanded program would enable a sizable proportion of the country's future leadership to acquire a first-hand impression of the United States, which should contribute to continuing close relations between the two countries and to a better understanding of democratic constitutional government processes by the younger Venezuelan element. Moreover, it would be most profitable to have regular visits of similarly qualified young American leaders to Venezuela. American companies operating in Venezuela should be encouraged to participate.

c) To investigate the feasibility of initiating a large-scale public administration educational program in Venezuela, probably in cooperation with local and American universities. In view of the limited capacity of Venezuelan universities at present to offer courses in this field, consideration should be given to assisting these universities to expand their facilities. Some study has already been devoted to an effort of this type.

d) To provide US assistance for a major program of training for labor union rank-and-file members and junior directors in Venezuela, in addition to the effort that has existed for some time on the part of AD and to the somewhat limited approach scheduled under the US aid program. In this connection also, urgent action is imperative. American universities, labor unions and businesses should be urged to participate.

e) To undertake overt and covert approaches to moderate elements in ARS as a possible means to encourage stronger support for the present government, its reform program, and orderly political processes. Similarly, with regard to URD, consideration should be given to (1) encouraging "responsible" opposition and (2) splitting the moderates away from the extremists in the party.

In view of the dangerous extent of Communist and pro-Communist infiltration of university and secondary student circles in Venezuela and their success in instigating anti-government student violence and anti-American sentiment there would appear to be urgent need for the formulation of a broad US program aimed specifically at students. There are indications that the Venezuelan Government is reaching the limits of its toleration of student agitation and insurgency, and that it may be contemplating adoption of restrictive measures against these elements. Nevertheless, the problem of student irresponsibility and extremism is a basic and long-lasting one and, consequently, it might be appropriate to investigate in some detail the feasibility of implementing a positive US approach to Venezuelan students, as well as the possibility of assisting the Betancourt Government in its efforts in this field. Some study has already been devoted to this question by the Embassy in Caracas and in the Department, but early action on a positive counter strategy (overt and covert) program is indicated.

223. Memorandum of conversation, August 30, between President Kennedy and Minister of Defense Briceño and other U.S. and Venezuelan Officials¹

Part I (of 2)

August 30, 1962

SUBJECT

Venezuelan Defense Requirements

PARTICIPANTS

The President

Brigadier General Antonio Briceño Linares, Venezuelan Minister of Defense

Assistant Secretary Edwin M. Martin

Lt. Colonel George Dwyre, (USAF), DOD Escort Officer

Major Teodoro Thielen, Venezuelan Aide to General Briceño

Donald F. Parnes, State Department Interpreter

Several related matters were discuss during the conversation including the subject covered in this memorandum.

General Briceño said that on the occasion of the President's visit to Caracas, he had mentioned the aspirations of the Venezuelan Armed Forces of obtaining special assistance from the United States, above and beyond the aid received under the mutual assistance agreement. He said that he was not optimistic about the outcome of this request, but that he wanted to make a plea that the U.S. Government [illegible in the original] of special additional military [illegible in the original] on a loan or lease basis. He said that the Venezuelan Armed Forces [illegible in the original] requested more funds than they did in the national budget; but that they understood the need for balancing the budget, and limited their requests to the amount recommended by the Finance Minister. He said that the Armed Forces did not want to ask for funds that could better be used for the solution of social problems and for alleviating the living conditions of the working class. He said that he was fully aware that social measures were the best way of counteracting the spread of Communism, rather than a repressive government.

General Briceño said that the Venezuelan military realized that a dictatorship was not the best solution to the problems of the Armed Forces, and that Venezuela had suffered under two dictators that proved this point. General Briceño said that the 27-year Gómez dictatorship had represented a period of no progress for the Armed Forces, since the soldiers in those days were put to work on the dictator's farms, and the officers were used to [illegible in the original]. During this period, other Latin American [illegible in the original] colleges, which permitted them to have well-trained cadres of reserve officers now.

¹ Venezuelan defense requirements. Confidential. 3 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD/ISA Files: FRC 65 A 3501, Venezuela, 1962, 000.1-381.

General Briceño said that under the Pérez Jiménez dictatorship the Armed Forces had been nothing more than a bluff, and that the 10 years of this regime had seen no progress in the organization of the Armed Forces. There had been much discussion as to what units should have the primary combat mission, with no decisions being made. Some equipment had been purchased during those years, on a haphazard basis, with poor maintenance. All of this had contributed nothing to the needs and objectives of national defense.

General Briceño said that under the new Administration, the various [illegible in the original] of the Armed Services had prepared [illegible in the original] organizational plans [illegible in the original], with clear objectives, tailored to the [illegible in the original] of the [illegible in the original], but the country lacked the economic means to develop their plans especially with [illegible in the original] to construction of buildings.

General Briceño said that he knew that the United States had a lot of military equipment that was obsolete by American standards, but that could be put to good use in Venezuela; and that it was knocking on the door [illegible in the original] United States in an appeal for some of this equipment, knowing that the answer could be either a yes or a no.

The President said that the entire quantity of military aid [illegible in the original] to Latin America was under fire in Congress, due particularly to the events in Peru and Argentina. He said that each was being [illegible in the original] over the fact that it [illegible in the original] tank that had knocked down the gates of the Presidential Palace in [illegible in the original], and that a U.S.-trained officer had been the one to arrest the Peruvian [illegible in the original]. He said that these arguments were not valid as far as he was concerned, but that they increased the complexity of the problem. He said that, for example, Senator Wayne Morse, a friend of President Betancourt's, seriously questioned the wisdom of military assistance to Latin America. He recommended that General Briceño have a talk with Senator Morse. He said that he understood that Venezuela had received 12 million dollars worth of mutual assistance last year, and was scheduled to receive 10 million dollars this year. He asked whether Venezuela needed military assistance over and above this amount.

General Briceño said that Venezuela would like to receive aid for construction projects for its Naval Academy, similar to that received by Uruguay and Colombia.

Mr. Martin said that General Briceño was going to have a meeting with the Acting Secretary of Defense.

General Briceño handed the President a list of requirements. He said that the reconnaissance squadron mentioned in the list was of special importance. He said that Venezuela's position was very different from that of other Latin American countries, due to its location.

The President said that he was aware of the support given by the Armed Forces to President Betancourt.

General Briceño said that he intended to hold a press conference to refute the allegation that the Armed Forces had exercised pressure on President Betancourt. He referred to a Time magazine article in which this accusation had been made. The President told him not to be concerned about Time article.

The President said that he thought it would be useful if General Briceño talked with Senator Morse, who was opposed to the military assistance program to Latin America. He said that he felt that this program was vital, since the Armed Forces were essential to prevent the radical left or right from taking over.

224. Memorandum of conversation, August 30, between President Kennedy and Minister of Defense Briceño and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials¹

Part II (of 2)

August 30, 1962

SUBJECT

Smuggling of Arms into Venezuela

PARTICIPANTS

The President
Brigadier General Antonio Briceño Linares, Venezuelan Minister of Defense
Assistant Secretary Edwin M. Martin
Lt. Colonel George Dwyre, (USAF), DOD Escort Officer
Major Teodoro Thielen, Venezuelan Aide to General Briceño
Donald F. Farnes, State Department Interpreter

Several related matters were discussed during the conversation including the subject covered in this memorandum.

¹ Smuggling of arms into Venezuela. Confidential. 2 pp. WNRC, RG 330, OASD/ISA Files: FRC 65 A 3501, Venezuela, 1962, 000.1-381.

President Kennedy asked how the situation was in Venezuela, and General Briceño replied that it had improved. When the President inquired about participation of Naval officers in the latest attempted coup, General Briceño replied that they were Marine Corps officers. He said that they were sympathizers of the extreme Left, and that the Government had traced the plot beginning in November 1961. He said that the Government had learned that the plotters had hoped to cause a disturbance on the occasion of President Kennedy's visit to Venezuela, but had failed. He said that it was difficult to prove participation in plots such as these until the plotters actually struck.

The President said that the Venezuelan Government had been doing a wonderful job in this connection. He asked whether it was true that arms were being smuggled into Venezuela via Panama. General Briceño replied that he had some information in this sense, which his Government had no means of processing. He gave the President a number of documents in English, which the President read.

The President asked whether it would be possible to prove a connection between the arms shipments and General Pérez Jiménez (the former Venezuelan dictator), General Briceño said that this was something the United States Government could trace. The President said that he had no information of any connection. Mr. Martin said that he was not aware of any such connection, but that he would check.

General Briceño said that Venezuela found it difficult to halt arms [illegible in the original] of its low cost and the lack of equipment.

President Kennedy asked Mr. Martin whether the U.S. had discussed this matter with Panamanian authorities. Mr. Martin replied that he had not been aware of arms going through Panama to Venezuela. General Briceño said that a high Panamanian official, who was in a good position to help the smugglers, was involved.

225. Memorandum from Clint E. Smith to the Latin American Policy Committee, September 21¹

September 21, 1962

SUBJECT

VENEZUELA—Plan of Action for Period to March 2, 1964

The attached plan of action for Venezuela during the period from the present until March 2, 1964, the end of the Betancourt Administration's term of office, was approved by the Latin American Policy Committee on September 13, 1962. Each member of the Committee is requested to integrate these actions into the programs of his respective agency.

A. OBJECTIVES

1. To have the Betancourt Administration complete its term of office democratically and constitutionally on March 2, 1964.

2. To increase the stability of the Betancourt Administration in order to strengthen the prospects for continued democratic civilian government in Venezuela.

3. To encourage the Venezuelan Armed Forces to remain loyal, support the Betancourt Administration and, when called on, suppress insurgencies fomented by opponents of democratic, constitutional government.

4. To assist the Betancourt Administration in rapidly carrying out a sound reform and development program to achieve orderly economic, social and political progress.

5. To support and encourage the orientation of Venezuela's Government and people toward individual freedom, national independence and economic and social progress under a democratic system.

6. To prevent the growth of Communist strength or influence in Venezuela or the conversion of Venezuela into a beachhead for the propagation of such strength or influence elsewhere in the Hemisphere.

7. To encourage continued Venezuelan cooperation in action to isolate, weaken and promote the downfall of the Cuban Communist Regime.

B. PLAN OF ACTION

I. Political

1. Emphasize United States support for the constitutional, democratic Betancourt Administration in public statements by or messages from high United States officials on appropriate state occasions or in the event of serious threats against the Betancourt Administration.

¹ Plan of action for Venezuela to March 2, 1964. Secret. 8 pp. DOS, CF, 611.31/9-2162.

2. Have our diplomatic and consular officials in Venezuela communicate the foregoing sentiment, as appropriate, to Venezuelan military officers, politicians, businessmen, journalists, and public opinion leaders. Indicate when necessary that the United States would view with grave concern the overthrow of elected constitutional government and its replacement by an unrepresentative authoritarian regime of the Right or Left. We would consider such a development as being contrary to the purposes and principles of the inter-American system and prejudicial to the objectives of the Alliance for Progress; and it would necessitate re-examination of our relations and existing cooperation with Venezuela in this context.

3. Discourage would-be subversives of any kind who seek United States acquiescence in or encouragement of their activities to overthrow the Betancourt Administration.

4. Discourage conspiratorial activities against the Betancourt Administration by dissident Venezuelans residing in or visiting the United States. Undertake legal action against such persons if we have reason to believe they have violated United States laws by engaging in anti-Betancourt activities.

5. Identify and encourage democratically-oriented and socially conscious leadership, which may be politically dormant, to take an active and constructive part in the political life of Venezuela as a means of broadening the political base of forces which can effectively carry out Venezuela's economic and social progress under a democratic system.

6. In the event Venezuelan democratic political leaders seek our intercession in Venezuelan internal political problems, we should express our interest in the cooperation of all responsible elements, who adhere to representative democracy and constitutionality, in making the democratic system operate effectively to achieve political stability and social and economic progress in which we are prepared to assist. In responding, we should avoid even an appearance of intervening in Venezuelan internal political conflicts or becoming too closely identified with any political party or faction, not excluding that of President Betancourt.

[text not declassified]

III. Labor

(Several of the following are general statements largely complementing the more detailed presentation in a separate AID/LA Policy Consideration Paper.)

1. Assist Venezuela in maintaining a free labor force in support of the present government and resisting left extremist attempts at creating parallel organizations to the CTV.

2. Assist Venezuela in preparing its labor force in various skills, trades and professions to facilitate optimum development of human resources.

3. Assist Venezuela in training government labor officials to provide effective government labor services and strengthen labor-management-government relations.

4. Assist the democratic leadership of the Venezuelan labor movement through leader grants and worker education programs to strengthen its internal trade union administration so that it may be more effective in Venezuelan economic and social programs.

5. Encourage the Venezuelan Confederation of Labor and its affiliates to enlarge their contacts with ORIT and the International Trade Secretariats (ITS) to augment the possibilities of establishing trade union leadership training programs, improving collective bargaining techniques, etc.

IV. Economic and Social

(Several of the following are general statements largely complementing the more detailed presentation in a separate AID/LA Policy Consideration Paper.)

1. Join our AID, Food for Peace and Peace Corps programs, as appropriate, with other free world sources of assistance in the Alliance for Progress, to help the Venezuelan Government to strengthen the Venezuelan economy as rapidly as possible and continue progressive social development efforts in direct impact projects in the fields of housing, education, agrarian reform, health and community services.

2. Intensify our efforts to work with the Venezuelan Government to improve its reform projects and to institute other self-help measures such as a unified exchange rate, further tax reforms, liberalization of the central government's borrowing authority, further reduction of government operating costs, and improvement of public administration.

3. Assist Venezuela in developing and implementing a sound program which will stimulate a maximum use of private funds and enterprise to induce economic recovery.

4. Assist Venezuela in developing an effective cadre of public administrators and instructors to train lower and middle echelon public servants in specialized fields.

5. Assist Venezuela in stabilizing the rural population through more effective implementation of its agrarian reform program, including: supervised agricultural credit; commercial agricultural development; and rural health, welfare and community services.

6. Assist Venezuela in increasing industrial production by encouraging private capital and initiative; and in implementing sound, labor-intensive programs, such as private and public housing, which will create employment opportunities in the cities.

7. Assist Venezuela in setting up and carrying out a savings and loan system for middle class housing; and in developing and initiating a long-range housing program for urban centers to clear slums and provide decent, hygienic, low-cost housing units.

8. Utilize the Peace Corps to:

a. help expand the programs of the non-denominational Venezuelan YMCA to help urban youth to develop socially and to become better citizens;

b. assist the Venezuelan Government's efforts to make its newly established University of the East a model of social responsibility and scholarship;

c. supplement the efforts of the Venezuelan 4-H (5-V Clubs) organizations to increase agricultural production and improve the rural standard of living in the Western Andean region.

9. Encourage the Venezuelan Government to foster a climate of security for beneficial foreign private capital investment by clearly enunciating and pursuing policies which will dispel fears of nationalization, discrimination or unfair competition from public corporations.

10. Encourage and, if possible, assist the GOV to obtain sound private management for its government-owned industries and other enterprises, demonstrating thereby that competent private management of government-owned industries may be a politically feasible means of improving the administration and operations of presently unprofitable state enterprises.

11. Encourage the function of sound joint ventures in which United States and Venezuelan capital join forces and utilize United States "know-how" in developing economically rational industrial enterprises.

12. Within limits of United States national security interests, avoid undue restriction of imports and off-shore purchases of Venezuelan petroleum products. Explore ways to open new possibilities for petroleum and other exports to the United States.

13. Encourage Venezuela to do away with trade and exchange restrictions as soon as possible and to follow a trade and tariff policy that will allow a maximum freedom of trade without uneconomic protective provisions.

14. Do not oppose Venezuelan trade restrictions which limit selected imports for the protection of developing industries contributing to the diversification of Venezuela's economy; but support credit assistance for the initiation or expansion of enterprises only when they appear to offer a reasonable net contribution to that economy.

15. Oppose discriminatory or unreasonable restrictions on United States shipping or air carriers, with due consideration for legitimate Venezuelan interest in developing and protecting Venezuelan national carriers.

16. Undertake civil aviation consultation, whenever appropriate, to establish agreed interpretations and modifications of the bilateral air transport services agreement of 1953.

V. Military Security

1. Assist Venezuela in developing its military capability to maintain internal security, counter guerrilla and other insurgent activities and protect Venezuelan oil fields, iron mines and ancillary installations. Facilitate training for Venezuelan military personnel in Venezuelan and/or at U.S. installations; and expedite the delivery of equipment under our bilateral military credit program.

2. Maintain close liaison with the Venezuelan Government on contingency planning to prevent another Communist-dominated regime from coming to power in the Caribbean region.

3. Discourage conspiratorial or undemocratic sentiments from flourishing among Venezuelan military personnel by using personal contacts to good advantage.

4. Encourage the employment of Venezuelan military forces, as practicable and without detriment to their primary security mission, on projects which contribute to economic and social development.

VI. Civilian Security Forces

(See also AID/LA Policy Consideration Paper)

1. Assist the Venezuelan civil police forces to improve their capability for maintaining law and order, rendering needed police services and controlling civil disturbances.

2. Assist the Venezuelan civil security forces to improve their capability in counter-subversive techniques.

3. Expedite delivery of equipment and ammunition urgently required by the civilian security forces.

VII. Public Affairs

(Several of the following are general statements largely complementing the more detailed presentation in USIS-Caracas Country Plan for FY 1963 contained in USIS message 113 of 6/21/62, as amended).

1. Help to strengthen the confidence of Venezuelans in their present system of constitutional, democratic government.

2. Convince Venezuelans that their aspirations for economic development with social justice can be achieved most effectively by applying Western democratic concepts rather than those of Communist totalitarianism, with the Alliance for Progress the positive do-it-yourself means of achieving their desired objectives.

3. Emphasize U.S.-Venezuelan cooperation in the Alliance for Progress.

4. Enhance Venezuelan knowledge about the United States and its foreign policy; and respect and appreciation for United States cultural, social and scientific achievements as developed by a free society for the general welfare.

5. Exploit the Cuban Communist Regime as an example of Communist imperialism which seeks to destroy Venezuela's political independence and to impose a system which flouts the dignity of the individual and human rights, impedes economic and social progress and retards the general welfare.

VIII. Youth/Students

1. Encourage, through cooperation with the Government [1 line not declassified], the orientation of Venezuela's youth and students toward the support of Venezuelan democratic institutions and the pursuit of serious academic programs in the national institutions of higher learning.

226. Memorandum of conversation, February 19, between President Kennedy and President Betancourt and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials¹

February 19, 1963

SUBJECT

U.S.-Venezuelan Petroleum Relations (Part 1 of 2 Parts)

PARTICIPANTS

For the United States:

The President

Mr. Edwin M. Martin (ARA)

Mr. Griffith Johnson (E)

Ambassador C. Allan Stewart (ARA)

Mr. Teodoro Moscoso (AID)

Mr. John M. Kelly, (Interior)

Mr. Ralph A. Dungan (White House)

Mr. Myer Feldman (White House)

For Venezuela:

President Betancourt

Dr. Andres Germán Otero, Minister of Finance

¹ Petroleum issues. Confidential. 5 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Venezuela, March–May 1963.

Dr. Godofredo Gonzalez, Minister of Development
Dr. Enrique Tejera París, Venezuelan Ambassador to U.S.
Dr. Carlos Pérez de la Cova, Venezuelan Embassy

Following President Kennedy's opening remarks at 4:30 p.m. on other matters, the conversation turned to petroleum. President Betancourt stated that he would like to refer only to economic matters of common interest during this meeting and would leave consideration of political questions for the meeting to be held the following day when the Foreign Minister would also be present. He indicated his interest in extending the exchange of views to other areas of the world such as Europe and Asia.

President Betancourt stated that the main problem confronting Venezuela is that of oil. He noted that the Presidential Proclamation of November 30, 1962 had produced a scare in Venezuela, and had serious political repercussions. In Venezuela there is a national awareness of the importance of this problem and every six months the country lives a period of anxiety until the determination is made of the amount of crude and residual fuel oil that Venezuela will be able to place in the United States market. He asserted that Venezuelan crude oil was being sold in the U.S. market at a price which was not only under the domestic price but also under the price of Canadian oil. The system of giving import allocations to inland refineries, instead of limiting them only to the traditional importers, resulted in the practice of discount sales that placed a pressure on Venezuelan prices. He stated that Creole Petroleum discount sales represented a loss of Venezuelan revenue amounting to 70 cents per dollar.

President Betancourt said that present U.S. policy discriminates against Venezuela, a consistent war and peace oil supplier of the United States, and benefits Mexico and Canada. He stressed that high level technical discussions should be continued in order to seek a mutually satisfactory solution. He suggested that the final press communiqué state that in the future joint consultations would be held before any steps are taken on matters affecting oil imports to the U.S. market. He did not consider that consultations held 48 hours before the proclamation allowed sufficient time for a careful study.

President Betancourt advocated the establishment of a system of Western Hemisphere quotas that would assure stable prices, in the belief that this would be a satisfactory solution that would maintain the "terms of trade". With stable prices and a stable quota Venezuela would not need Alliance for Progress assistance (AID or Social Progress Trust Fund loans) because World Bank and Export Import Bank financing would suffice. He emphasized the political importance of oil that makes Venezuela the number one objective of the Castro-Communist offensive.

President Kennedy agreed that there should be prior consultation and that this should be stated in the communiqué. Oil was a matter of great interest to the U.S. Congress because it affected the balance of payments situation. For national security reasons it was also an important factor in relations with Canada and Mexico. It was very difficult to satisfy all parties concerned and the reason the U.S. had not consulted at greater length was our belief that Venezuelan oil interests were adequately protected under the terms of the last proclamation. The White House experiences considerable pressure of all kinds on this matter—from coal producers, from Middle Eastern, Canadian and Mexican oil producers, and also from consumer groups. Consultations should be held in the future, not 48 hours before a proclamation, but real consultations. As was expressed by the Feldman mission, it was hoped that the Venezuelan share of the U.S. market would not diminish. He asked whether President Betancourt was more concerned about the November proclamation than about the future.

Dr. Otero explained that Venezuela was facing the same problems confronted by other developing countries dependent upon the sale of their raw materials. In the last few years the terms of trade have deteriorated. Oil represents 92% of the export earnings of Venezuela and these have increased only 2 or 3% in the last few years. However, the price index of manufactured goods imported from the U.S. and Europe has increased between 24 and 30%. It is necessary to stop this trend and the problem is of special urgency because it affects a kind of resource (oil) that is irreplaceable. U.S. restrictive policies since 1957, while justifiable to strengthen the domestic industry, have been implemented in a manner which has adversely affected oil prices. The system of allocating quotas to inland refineries exerts a downward pressure on prices. Bilateral studies at the technical level should continue in order to find a formula to achieve U.S. objectives without adversely affecting Venezuelan oil prices. Unfortunately, the areas of agreement reached in recent technical discussions are still limited. Discrimination is one problem. Venezuela would like a similar treatment as that accorded to Mexico and Canada and therefore it proposes a quota system for the entire Western Hemisphere.

Dr. Otero said that another area of disagreement is the matter of considering liberalized residual fuel oil imports as a means for compensating Venezuela for lower crude oil imports. Residual fuel oil is a low value product. The U.S. refining processes have improved to such a degree that U.S. refineries only produce 9 percent of residual oil. Venezuelan oil is refined in such a manner that 50 to 60 percent of it is residual oil. The trend therefore is for Venezuela to receive the lowest earnings for its oil.

To a question of President Kennedy, Mr. Feldman replied that Canadian oil imports were 125,000 barrels daily in Districts I through

IV and that this figure was much lower than the 450,000 barrels a day imported from Venezuela. The 30,000 barrels a day imported from Mexico is a very small amount that is not of great concern. Voluntary restrictions on the part of Canada would allow Venezuela to share in the increasing U.S. oil market.

Dr. Otero replied that Venezuela did not object to imports from Canada of 120,000 or 130,000 barrels daily but that the objection was to the system of quota allocations to inland oil refineries.

Mr. Feldman stated that there was disagreement between U.S. and Venezuelan technicians on this point, and that, although allocations to inland refiners were necessary to U.S. security, the impact of the present balance between coastal and inland refiners would be studied further.

Mr. Kelly stated that there was actually a discount on Canadian prices. Canadian oil was not being sold at the same price as U.S. domestic oil. Allowing imports of 125,000 barrels daily from Canada removed the pressure for Canadian industry to build a pipeline to the Montreal area market that presently imports Venezuelan oil at the rate of 220,000 barrels daily.

Responding to President Kennedy's question regarding the reasons for differences in U.S. import conditions between Canada and Venezuela Mr. Kelly stated that U.S. security considerations were initially responsible. At first the U.S. market was unrestricted to Canadian exports but during the last 15 or 16 months these had increased 100 per cent. For this reason we recently asked Canada to establish voluntary restrictions, limiting exports to the U.S. to 125,000 barrels. The balance of the U.S. market is open to competition and Venezuela is one of the competitors who captures a very large share of this market. With a growing U.S. market, Venezuela can share in the growth while Canada and Mexico are restricted. The present system is considered a balanced one, that offers a price umbrella to Venezuelan exports to Canada and to the U.S. The volume balance might not be perfect but the revenue balance is quite good when you consider both the number of barrels and the price of oil.

President Kennedy then instructed the U.S. experts present to look further into the inland refinery distribution structure to report its effects on the Venezuelan crude oil price structure.

Dr. Otero stressed Venezuela's concern over the import system of tickets that are subject to trading with a deteriorating effect on prices. Venezuela would prefer a system of free competition with payment of custom duties, rather than a system of tickets that further depresses already low prices.

President Betancourt stated that although it is true that Venezuela would benefit from U.S. market growth in terms of number of barrels, it would not benefit from the standpoint of increased revenues. Venezuela is selling oil cheaper to Western Europe, but this is due also to the deteriorating prices in the U.S. oil market. It is unfortunate that countries such as Italy and France, that have been made prosperous by the Marshall plan, should be buying raw materials from underdeveloped countries at low prices.

President Betancourt then referred to the attempts of the Organization of Oil Exporting Countries (OPEC) to achieve stable prices in order to improve national incomes and carry out social reform. He said that the Middle Eastern countries are also seriously menaced by the Communists. He had been informed that the Shah and King Faysal were going to meet with the directors of the oil companies to discuss problems relating to oil income. He had been asked to convey to President Kennedy a request to have the State Department cooperate with those countries in order to improve their income from oil.

President Kennedy agreed that it was unfortunate that Western European countries should be bargain hunting and playing Middle Eastern oil against Latin American oil and also using Soviet oil as a bargaining factor. The U.S. would try to convince its Western European allies of the need to protect common interests.

At this point the petroleum discussion ended and the conversation turned to another subject.

227. Memorandum of conversation, February 19, between President Kennedy and President Bentancourt and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials¹

February 19, 1963

SUBJECT

U.S.-Venezuelan Balance of Payments (Part 2 of 2 parts)

PARTICIPANTS

For the United States:
The President
Mr. Edwin M. Martin (ARA)
Mr. Griffith Johnson (E)

¹ Balance of payments. Confidential. 3 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Venezuela, March–May 1963.

Ambassador C. Allan Stewart (ARA)
Mr. Teodoro Moscoso (AID)
Mr. John M. Kelly, (Interior)
Mr. Ralph A. Dungan (White House)
Mr. Myer Feldman (White House)

For Venezuela:
President Betancourt
Dr. Andres German Otero, Minister of Finance
Dr. Godofredo Gonzalez, Minister of Development
Dr. Enrique Tejera Paris, Venezuelan Ambassador to U.S.
Dr. Carlos Perez de la Cova, Venezuelan Embassy

Following a discussion of petroleum matters, President Kennedy raised the question of the U.S.'s unfavorable balance of payments with Venezuela.

Dr. Otero stated that his figures did not indicate that the U.S. had an unfavorable balance with Venezuela. Venezuela sells to the U.S. 36% of its total exports and buys 55 to 56% of its imports from it.

President Kennedy gave the following figures on U.S. payments with Venezuela for the year 1962:

Exports $500 million.
Returns on investment $100 million.
Imports from Venezuela $970 million.
Adverse balance of payments in the order of $300 million.

Dr. Otero replied that although he did not have available figures for 1962, 1961 figures did not reflect such an imbalance. On the basis of income tax returns of U.S. oil companies a disinvestment of over $300 million had taken place in contrast to the U.S. figures of only $100 million.

Secretary Martin stated that there had been some disinvestment. However there was an increase in the value of the companies as a result of reinvestment.

Dr. Otero stated that the 1961 balance of payments was favorable to the U.S. and that U.S. oil companies had possibly reinvested profits withdrawn from Venezuela in other areas such as Libya, Argentina and other countries.

President Betancourt noted the existence of another problem related to this disinvestment. While foreign capital needed to finance Venezuelan industrialization was being withdrawn for investment elsewhere, Venezuelan banks were making loans to U.S. companies. The Ford Co., with a solid reputation and Detroit backing, had set up an assembly plant financed largely by Venezuelan banks.

President Kennedy expressed interest in the possibility of such a "leakage" and asked his economic advisers to look into the balance of payments figures more deeply.

Dr. Otero stated that there were only three countries with a surplus balance of payments with Venezuela: Italy, Germany and Japan. All other countries have an unfavorable balance with the exception of the United States which up to 1961 had an even balance of payments.

President Kennedy noted that in 1962 there was an unfavorable trade balance of about $400 million and suggested that technical discussions could probably be held with U.S. companies focusing attention on this problem. He then asked about steps that could be taken to steer Venezuelan trade to the U.S.

Dr. Otero stated that until 1961 he considered Venezuela had been instrumental in collecting U.S. dollars around the world. Another point in connection with the balance of trade between both countries was that oil companies had decreased imports of equipment from $400 million in 1957 to only about $30 million in 1962. He understood the U.S. dollar drain problem and agreed to cooperate in seeking solutions to it.

In conclusion President Kennedy indicated his satisfaction with the cordial meeting and stated it would be necessary to set aside at least one and one-half hours the following day to continue the discussion of the political questions.

228. Memorandum of conversation, February 20, between President Kennedy and President Bentancourt and other U.S. and Venezuelan officials¹

February 20, 1963

SUBJECT

Second and Final Conversation between President Kennedy and President Betancourt of Venezuela—Flight of Capital from Venezuela (Part 6 of 6 Parts.)

PARTICIPANTS

For the United States:
President Kennedy
The Secretary of State
Edwin M. Martin, Assistant Secretary for Inter-American Affairs
Ambassador C.A. Stewart

¹ Flight of capital from Venezuela. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Venezuela, March–May 1963.

A.B. Duke, Chief of Protocol
D.F. Margolies, Deputy Director, Office of East Coast Affairs (State)
Ralph A. Dungan (White House)

For Venezuela:
President Betancourt
Ambassador Tejera Paris
Falcon-Briceño, Foreign Minister
Gonzalez, Minister of Development (and representative of COPEI)

1. Restoration of Confidence in Venezuela

President Kennedy referred to the flight of capital from Latin America and asked how this affected Venezuela. President Betancourt said that there had been considerable flight of capital from Venezuela, mainly from two causes. First, some capital had been attracted to Venezuela during the dictatorship which he characterized as piratical since it gained 20 to 40 percent interest. With the end of the dictatorship this capital had left Venezuela. Second, in the beginning years of his administration there had been uncertainty as to the political stability of his regime, and fear of military take-over. A spreading loss of confidence gave rise to a flight of capital of considerable proportions. He said that his government had since become more firmly established, as evidenced by the rapid suppression of the two military revolts, and confidence had been greatly restored.

His finance Minister told him that the flight of capital had come to an end by last year, and in fact there appeared to be some re-flux of capital into Venezuela. The improvement of reserves which reflected this situation was evidenced by the fact that recently GOV had paid off a commercial bank loan of $67 million in advance of the due date thereby saving $3 million interest.

2. Concluding remarks

President Kennedy expressed appreciation for the talk. President Betancourt said that he had hoped to have an opportunity of a sincere and frank exchange of views about hemisphere problems with the President and was deeply gratified by the way the meeting had worked out.

229. Circular airgram CA-10071 to Moscow, March 18¹

March 18, 1963

INFO

Amembassy CARACAS

SUBJECT

Cuban Propaganda and Subversive Activities Venezuela

Embassy may find useful in conversations Soviet officials draw upon following summary of terrorism and sabotage Venezuela since October in relation to overt Cuban inflammatory propaganda directed Venezuela during same period:

1. Following October 1962 bombing Creole oil fields Castro/Communist-led terrorist and extremist activity Venezuela continued at alarming rate despite increased efforts GOV halt them. These paramilitary acts reached highest point in weeks just prior President Betancourt's February 19–28 trip to US. Most colorful and best publicized effort was hijacking Venezuelan merchant ship Anzoategui in mid-February. Other major incidents include brazen January theft five valuable paintings on loan GOV, successful bombings several US business interests (Sears Roebuck and Dupont paint warehouses); and early March sabotage of a Creole pipeline. Minor acts of terrorism in Caracas and rural areas are almost daily occurrences. Principal organization carrying out this paramilitary activity is communist dominated, Castro-oriented FALN (Armed Forces of National Liberation). GOV convinced Castro and Communists are supporting and encouraging this activity in Venezuela.

2. Appeals for violent revolution in Venezuela have long occupied dominant place Castro-Cuba propaganda output. Calls for armed struggle have been particularly vehement in speeches by regime leaders since October–November 1962 missile crisis. Frequently, Havana sponsored meetings of hemispheric communists and leftists have provided forum from which to attack Betancourt government. In November a "week of solidarity with the Venezuelan people" (November 17–21) was officially declared. Cuban Education Minister Armando Hart closed this week of anti-Betancourt tirades with harangue in which he pledged Cuba's "solidarity with Venezuela is not a solidarity of words." Referring to Venezuelan communists and leftists in his January 2 speech, Castro said "The imperialists were given evidence of what revolutionary solidarity is—active solidarity of revolutionaries who do not sit in their doorways to wait for the corpse of their enemy to pass by, of revolutionaries who understand that the duty of all revolutionaries is to create the revolution.” Other Cuban leaders have spoken in similar vein. At the March 1 Venezuelan-Cuban solidarity meeting Larazo Pena, Secretary General of the Revolutionary Cuban Workers Organization, thanked Venezuelan people for striking at Venezuelan oil installations during missile crisis. Pena, like Hart, Castro, Roca, Guevara and others have urged Venezuelans to follow the Cuban example under the leadership of Venezuelan Communist Party and the MIR (Movimiento Izquierda Revolucionario).

¹ Cuban propaganda and subversive activities in Venezuela. Confidential. 2 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Venezuela, March–May 1963.

Ball
Acting

230. Memorandum from Gordon Chase to McGeorge Bundy, April 30¹

April 30, 1963

SUBJECT

Venezuela—General Lansdale's Report

I refer to your request that I brief the attached report by General Lansdale. The report, which the General wrote after a visit to CINCARIB and a nine-day visit to Venezuela, examines the Communist insurgency menace in that country. It concludes that while Venezuela is a tinder box and not a fire, there are enough sparks to make the situation dangerous; more should and can be done to counter the Communist threat.

The report is very interesting and conveys a good, colorful feel for the Venezuelan situation. It contains some suggestions for action which seem to me to be worthy of further study. The following are some of the highlights of the report:

¹ Highlights of General Lansdale's report on Communist insurgency in Venezuela. Secret. 4 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Venezuela, March–May 1963.

A. The Elements

1. The Threat—One of the two most vulnerable areas is Caracas. While the poor people living in the surrounding hills are the raw material for the rabble rousers, the explosive elements in the Caracas picture are the university students, who have immunity behind the Central University walls, and the legal Communist Party with its membership in Congress. University and high school students carry out countless acts of terrorism in Caracas—e.g. killings, bombings, disarming of police, telephone threats.

Where the threat in Caracas is politically significant, the threat in West Venezuela (the oil fields) is economically significant. The oil well operation at Maracaibo and the long pipeline leading to the refineries 125 miles away are very vulnerable to sabotage; there were a number of attacks in 1962. These attacks could really be catastrophic. For example, if some one set up mortars and bazookas and stopped the main power plant at La Salina (this is a feasible attack) the GOV would lose $2 million per day in oil revenues.

2. Communist Forces (FALN)—Estimates vary, but there are very roughly 300 to 500 men in the Communist paramilitary forces; probably about $\frac{1}{2}$ of these are in Caracas. While this is a small force (which tends to grow when the students are on vacation), it should be noted (1) that Castro's forces were small and (2) that it may be a relatively large force in view of the fractured missions of the GOV forces—i.e. nobody short of Betancourt is really charged with meeting the Communist threat.

The FALN appears to be a unified force (e.g. courier systems), and is quite effective in psychological warfare (reporting phony terrorist acts to stir up fruitless GOV activity) as well as in the more violent forms of terrorism. Its composition is indicated by the following breakdown of 177 FALN prisoners—44 students, 15 professional men, 23 laborers, 43 farmers, and 52 unknown.

3. Venezuelan Military—There are 9,000 men in the National Guard (FAC), which is a voluntary outfit; 14,000 men in the Army, which is composed of 2 year, largely illiterate draftees; 1,400 men in the obsolete and poorly repaired Air Force; and 2,900 men in the Navy which is supported by 2,700 politically suspect Marines. The General saw mostly the FAC and the Army.

The FAC is the best fighting force in Venezuela and has received counter-guerrilla training. However, it is primarily a stationery force which operates in battalion size throughout the country (e.g. guarding critical installations, highway patrols, game wardens); it does not have a real counter-guerrilla role. The Army, which is a second rate outfit, has the primary anti-guerrilla role in the countryside. They seem to be trying hard, but the FAC could perform the active counter-guerrilla role much more effectively.

4. Special Group (CI)—It is called the Unified Command in Venezuela and is made up of the Ministers of Defense, Interior, Justice, and Agriculture, the Commanders of the Armed Forces, and the Chief of Police; it also has an advisory Intelligence Committee. It is nominally a standing group but usually meets only in emergencies; reportedly it works efficiently and effectively in meeting emergencies.

5. Police—The police are ineffective (daily accounts of police being robbed, and of police being unable to stop thieves, terrorists, etc.) and it is illogical to depend on the police as the main protection against urban terrorists. Police functions are split up to a ridiculous extent; there are municipal, political, technical, traffic, and security police, all responsible to different organizations. When a car was blown up in the assassination attempt on Betancourt, different police had bits and pieces of the car and of the mechanism used in the explosion; all the bits and pieces were never brought together in one place for study.

6. Special Forces Mobile Training Teams (MTT)—This American team has done a fine job and the Venezuelans love them. The Venezuelans also seem interested in having a Special Air Warfare MTT; this would be a good thing.

7. Psychology of Terrorism—Americans on the scene receive threats constantly but their outlook remains cheery, almost abnormally so. The Country Team should keep record of these threats and press the GOV to take some action.

8. Repealing Parkinson's Law—The reporting requirements from Washington are becoming excessive. It is a good Country Team and Washington should let it run the show. Washington can spot check by brief visits. Washington can also help by sending in appropriate mobile training teams on a temporary basis. For example, a Public Safety MTT, bilingual in Spanish, would be very useful.

9. Talks with Minister of Defense and Ambassador Stewart—General Lansdale's talks with the Minister of Defense covered such subjects as the need for U.S. help; the moral reluctance of Venezuelans to take life; the virtues of using martial law under certain conditions; and troop information and education.

Ambassador Stewart pointed out to the General that the prestige and influence of the U.S. Military Group could be increased if military equipment deliveries were expedited.

B. Conclusions

1. Venezuela is not a fire but there are plenty of sparks.
2. The capabilities of the Communist paramilitary forces are growing.

3. The GOV assignment of forces against the guerrillas is not as effective as it could be.

4. There is need for serious U.S. effort to help Venezuelans understand their responsibilities as citizens.

5. Venezuela has many positive elements in the struggle to build a strong democracy—a growing middle class, a heavy infusion of hard-working U.S. citizens, tremendous natural resources.

6. The U.S. Country Team is impressive and is capable of undertaking a successful pilot project in which more independence of action would be given to the field.

7. Venezuelans look to the U.S. for support. 1963 is a critical year because of the Presidential electoral campaign and Communist blockage of budget support in Congress.

C. Suggestions

1. Students—Central University in Caracas is the Communist jugular vein. Get a group (20 to 100) of tough and resourceful American students to enroll at and be active in the University.

2. Peace Funds—The Venezuelan people need to get into the act. Start a 3 month campaign to raise funds which can be used as rewards to capture FALN leaders and saboteurs.

3. Psywar—Make an asset out of 2 year draftees in the Army. Give them an understanding of patriotism and their civic responsibilities. An MTT of psywar pros would be useful.

4. Veterans—Instead of “running scared” of the military, Venezuelan leaders should make use of the military virtues in strengthening democracy. Encourage veterans to form organizations with patriotic platforms; use veterans to cadre colonies in the hinterland.

Gordon Chase

231. Telegram 446 to Caracas, November 21¹

November 21, 1963

Embtels 572 and 573.

1. We believe Betancourt's plan for briefing LA chiefs on arms cache is excellent way surface evidence Cuban origin. We expect U.S. will be included in briefing to maintain hemispheric front. Would also be helpful have Canadian and West European chiefs present or briefed separately.

2. As indicated in message sent to you through other channels, we continue think that announcement of arms cache evidence provides excellent basis for reporting to OAS and making appeal for developing appropriate means for multilateral cooperation in surveillance under Resolution II of 8th MFM.

3. On reporting to OAS we gratified Betancourt has not closed door. We think it would be serious mistake, however, use forthcoming MFM forum to present evidence or raise question because of terms under which meeting convoked and disruptive effects likely to be produced by introduction Cuban subversion issue in specific terms. On other hand COAS is clearly indicated organ to receive report as result assignment given it by 8th MFM (Resolution II, paragraph 1). Furthermore, we think GOV would do OAS major disservice if it were to present evidence to diplomatic corps OAS countries and not follow-up with presentation to COAS because it might be misinterpreted as GOV lack of interest in role which OAS can play in meeting problem of Castro-Communist subversion in this hemisphere.

4. We disappointed Betancourt cool to idea of call for some form of multilateral cooperation in surveillance since intelligence reports indicate need for such action. Given his coolness and delicacy preelectoral situation, we of course do not rpt not intend push this further with him at this time. However, we would want to take advantage of any indication from him of reconsideration in order to pursue subject.

5. For your background only following is outline of tentative operation plan to interdict air and sea shipments of arms and men for purposes of Castro-Communist subversion which we had wanted you discuss with Betancourt in event he had reacted favorably to making appeal:

¹ President Betancourt's briefing of LA chiefs on Cuban arms cache. Top Secret. 6 pp. Kennedy Library, National Security Files, Countries Series, Venezuela, October-November 1963.

a. Whenever intelligence received of shipments of arms and men to any of countries in area, this information would be immediately relayed to the governments concerned including flag country of vessel or aircraft and, in cases of transshipment, countries of departure and destination.

b. To degree intelligence justifies such action, governments concerned (US and LA) would immediately alert internal security forces and contribute units to establish cooperative air and offshore surface surveillance. These land, sea and air units would work together in search for the ship or aircraft to identify, intercept it and prevent arms and men from reaching their destination. Direct means of communication between such units would be worked out to facilitate surveillance coordination.

c. With respect to sea shipment: (1) governments concerned including US would agree in advance to give reciprocal rights to intercept and search their respective flag vessels in international waters which conform to description of suspect vessel. If intercepted ship is found to be carrying arms and men it would be escorted to the nearest port of the participating powers and turned over to local consul of country whose flag the vessel flies; (2) governments concerned would agree in advance to allow units of countries participating in the cooperative surveillance effort to enter their territorial waters to intercept and search vessels of any flag suspected of carrying arms or men. If found to be carrying such arms or men, ship would be taken to nearest port of territorial country and turned over to local authorities.

d. With respect to air shipments, suspected aircraft would be shadowed to destination to assure search and apprehension upon landing or to prevent clandestine airdrops to Castro-Communist elements. Governments concerned would agree in advance to permit aircraft other cooperating governments to enter their national airspace for this purpose.

e. Governments concerned would agree in advance to give each other reciprocal use of port and airport facilities for units used in cooperative surveillance.

f. Implementing details of foregoing plan would be worked out through appropriate inter-governmental channels. In situation in Venezuela course of action along following lines, in three consecutive stages, would be considered on request: First stage: provision joint survey and mobile training team to provide training, assistance and advice in matters related surveillance and intercept operations and coordination of all Venezuelan military and para-military forces and US forces involved in the operation; limited number RC-121 aircraft for all-weather reconnaissance and intercept control; Second stage: provision mobile radar package; Third stage: provision fighter-interceptor aircraft to destroy intruder aircraft. Foregoing in addition to US air and sea forces to supplement Venezuelan surveillance capabilities.

In connection Betancourt's reaction to sea-air surveillance we note GOV agreement JOC MTT (COMUSMILGRUVEN 1919557ZEA). Would appreciate your assessment of further types of training and equipment they might want taking into consideration assistance outlined in part 1 of First Stage and Second Stage of paragraph (f) of operational plan. Second part of First Stage and Third Stage refer to US forces and equipment operating from Venezuelan bases. Under present circumstances we recognize Venezuela would not request it and we of course would not be prepared to execute these stages without an explicit, written and disclosable request by GOV.

Action requested: Please follow-up OAS aspects with Betancourt along lines paragraph 3. You should strongly urge that as minimum he submit evidence to COAS. You should be ready take advantage any indication he is reconsidering position on multilateral cooperative air-sea surveillance in order to explore this further with him to determine in what ways he would be willing to have us assist him. In this circumstance you may draw on all or part operational plan as illustrative of possible arrangement. We have discussed handling arms cache and surveillance problem with Tejera along general lines you have discussed with Betancourt and this message. Briceño ill and could not participate.

Ball

Cuba

November–December 1960

232. Briefing papers used to brief President-elect Kennedy, November 18¹

November 18, 1960

Briefing Papers used by Mr. Dulles and
Mr. Bissell—President-Elect Kennedy

COVERT OPERATIONS—CUBA

1. BACKGROUND

17 March 1960—President authorized Agency undertake covert action program to replace Castro government with one more devoted to true interests of Cuban people and more acceptable to U.S. in such manner avoid appearance of U.S. intervention.

2. PROGRAM PLANS

Four major courses:

- a. Creation of unified Cuban opposition.
- b. Creation of mass communication facilities for propaganda offensive.
- c. Creation of intelligence and action organization within Cuba.
- d. Development of paramilitary force with necessary logistical support for military operations on Island.

Instrumentality

Government-in-exile as cover and manpower source.
Developed under ostensible private U.S. interests. Unilateral operations to complement group activities.

¹ Covert action program to replace Castro government. Secret. 6 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 64–00352R, Box 4, US Govt—President, Memoranda, Letters, Reports re CIA Relations with President and Cabinet.

3. POLITICAL ACTION

We consider requests for support from any anti-Castro (and non-Communist non-Batista) group or individual inside or outside Cuba with demonstrable capability. On 22 June 1960 at Mexico City five prominent anti-Castro groups declared opposition to Castro. Group called Democratic Revolutionary Front (FRD).

4. PROPAGANDA

a. Radio

Major radio mechanism is Swan Island, medium and short-wave broadcasts, 6½ hours of each daily. Under commercial cover. Anti-Trujillo and anti-Castro. Conclusive evidence of effectiveness throughout Cuba, except central Havana, where jammed. Constitutes practically a "Radio Free Cuba."

b. Other Radio

WRUL: 30 minutes, week day on short wave.

Guatemala: 30 minutes daily on short wave.

WMIE (Miami): Two daily broadcasts on medium wave.

Nicaragua: Clandestine short-wave broadcasts to begin soon.

Seaborne: Irregular clandestine broadcasts.

c. Publications

[less than 1 line not declassified] tabloid from Florida, 17,000 copies weekly circulated in Latin America, including 5,500 mailed into Cuba.

[less than 1 line not declassified] magazine from U.S. resumed publication 7 October in 130,000 copies. ABC certified audit shows a second issue order of 150,000.

[less than 1 line not declassified] weekly newspaper from New York is being published in 7,000 copies.

[less than 1 line not declassified] weekly newspaper from Miami.

Other Propaganda Efforts

Assisted in stimulating riotous anti-Communist religious demonstrations on 17 July.

Assisted in issuance of [less than 1 line not declassified] condemning drift toward communism.

Three million leaflets awaiting air drop and sea infiltration.

Special operation in New York during UNGA, including "Caravan of Sorrow" from Miami, student demonstrations, and defection of a Castro agent.

5. PARAMILITARY

An instructor cadre of 25 was trained secretly in the Canal Zone and thereafter placed in Guatemala for instruction of up to 500 men in paramilitary operations.

Radio training—21 operators in training in Guatemala for use with paramilitary teams.

Air training—39 pilots for tactical air force at training base in Guatemala with B-26 and C-46 aircraft.

Dissident Groups

Checking and evaluating 12 groups inside Cuba for development unilateral assets. Two air drops of supplies and equipment.

6. PARAMILITARY PLAN OF OPERATIONS

The initial phase of paramilitary operations envisages the development, support and guidance of dissident groups principally in three provinces of Cuba: Pinar del Rio, Las Villas, and Oriente. These groups will be organized, trained, and led by Agency's Cuban assets for concerted guerrilla action against the regime. It does not now appear that such action alone will be successful in sparking a successful revolt.

The second phase would be initiated by a combined sea-air assault by FRD forces on Cuba coordinated with general guerrilla activity. This will establish a close-in staging base for future operations.

The last phase, if needed, would be air assault on the Havana area with the guerrilla forces on Cuba moving on the ground into the Havana area.

A contingency plan for overt U.S. military intervention includes planning for the coordinated use of Agency assets.

Maritime ex- and infiltrations started 28 September, with five successes to date.

7. COUNTER-INTELLIGENCE

[1 line not declassified]

[1 line not declassified]

Ten provocations identified and contained.

8. INTELLIGENCE COLLECTION

Staybehind acts—4 in Havana area completed, one used exclusively for ex- and infiltration duties. Two in place in Santiago de Cuba area.

Twenty-two W/T sets cached for staybehind.

[1 line not declassified]

[1 line not declassified]

233. Memorandum from Joseph W. Scott to Livingston Merchant, December 6¹

December 6, 1960

The first part of the attached paper recommends a program of action in the overt field designed to bring about the removal of the Castro regime.

We now need your reaction to Part One before meeting with Tracy Barnes in preparing the second part, which will recommend covert actions designed to supplement and reinforce the suggested overt program.

Tom Mann and Hugh Cumming have seen and concurred with Part One.

Joseph W. Scott
Special Assistant

Attachment

Tom Mann called last night and made the following four points regarding the attached draft, dated December 6, on Cuba.

1. The section on Basic Assumptions commits us to a short time table. I pointed out that this section was written in anticipation of a Special National Intelligence Estimate on the subject which is due Friday, December 9.

2. The last sentence of the Basic Assumptions section (page 2) may be a non-sequitur. I agreed that it might be and said I thought the sentence could be deleted.

3. On page 4, para 2a, Tom felt the training program should be spelled out, particularly with reference to drawing a distinction between training for overt and covert purposes. He agreed that this could be done by means of an additional tab.

4. With regard to para 2b on page 4, Tom estimates there may be 2 to 3 thousand "hard core" Americans who can't be encouraged to leave Cuba under any foreseeable circumstances and that appropriate account should be taken of this. We will pursue this further and see that it is included for consideration in subsequent drafts.

¹ Transmits memorandum recommending a program of covert action to remove the Castro regime. Top Secret. 9 pp. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, Cuba Program, Nov. 1960-Jan. 20, 1961.

Joseph W. Scott
Special Assistant

Attachment

SUBJECT

A Suggested Program for Cuba

Part One of this paper recommends a program of action in the overt [illegible in the original] the removal of the Castro regime. Part Two recommends covert actions designed to supplement and reinforce the suggested program.

PART ONE

I. Basic Assumptions

Time is running against us in the Cuban situation. In the foreseeable future (the next year to 15 months) the curve of effective totalitarian controls over the people in Cuba will rise at a faster rate than will the curve of dissatisfaction and potential resistance to the Castro regime (See Tab A). Economic dislocations will occur but will not lead to the collapse or significant weakening of the Castro regime. Political, social and psychological controls will facilitate any further belt-tightening required. In addition, the Soviet bloc can and will provide the assistance necessary to prevent serious deterioration in the Cuban economy in the short run and to permit an expansion of economic capabilities over the longer term. The Soviet Union will continue to support the military buildup in Cuba and will unstintingly exert its political and military influence—short of risking general war—to sustain the present regime in Cuba (See Tabs B and C).

The Castro regime will continue a course parallel or subservient to the policies of international Communism. It will continue its efforts to minimize the position of the United States and to spread the Castro revolution to other countries in the Western Hemisphere. Given the serious social and economic pressures building up in most countries of Latin America and the weaknesses of many of the present governments, the chances of the establishment of one or more Castro-like governments over the next year to 15 months are appreciable. Indefinite prolongation of the Castro empire and its present policies is intolerable from the standpoint of the internal security of the United States.

II. Suggested Solution

Back through a Meeting of Foreign Ministers commencing February 1, 1961, collective OAS action under the [illegible in the original] Treaty for severance of diplomatic relations with Cuba, application of economic sanctions, authorization for inter-American [illegible in the original] activity and increased measures by Member States to protect their borders and strengthen their internal security.

Failure to [illegible in the original] effective OAS action, and without prejudice to further multilateral effort, seek to persuade as many Latin American states as possible to accompany us in unilateral severance of relations with Cuba and a [illegible in the original] of the foregoing measures. Make known our readiness to respond favorably to requests for naval and air patrol action from governments threatened by Cuban-based aggression.

Promote the establishment of a government-in-exile with control over some portion of the territory of Cuba; seek to persuade other governments to join us in extending recognition thereto as soon as possible after collective or unilateral severance of relations with the Castro regime; and assist through personnel training and other material support the efforts of that group to expand the area under its control to include all of Cuba.

III. Measures to Implement Proposed Solution

1. Seek Collective Action Through the Organization of American States

The obligations and responsibilities undertaken by the United States or a member of the inter-American system require that every effort be used to bring about a solution of the Cuban problem without resort to [illegible in the original]. It is therefore incumbent upon us to attempt, in the first instance, to achieve such a solution through the mechanism and procedures of the OAS.

Ideally, we [illegible in the original] work to have some one or more Latin American governments take the initiative in calling the meeting of Foreign Ministers and [illegible in the original] the necessary resolutions aimed at Castro. Should this be impossible, however, the United States should itself take the lead and [illegible in the original] forcefully to have such a meeting on February 1, 1961 (Tab F).

At a meeting of Foreign Ministers, member states should be asked to sever diplomatic relations with Cuba until such time as its government and policies cease to represent a threat to the peace, tranquility, stability and security of the inter-American community. In addition to this, member states should be asked to apply thorough going economic sanctions both to imports from Cuba and exports thereto.

Finally, and without prejudice to the right of the United States to act in response to direct requests for assistance, stand-by authorization should be sought for inter-American patrol activity by air and surface craft of member states when necessary to impede movements of men, arms, supplies or other instruments of Cuban-sponsored aggression or subversion against another American state.

2. Initiate [illegible in the original] Action by the United States, to include:

a. [illegible in the original] Training Program

[illegible in the original] any future government in Cuba be competent [illegible in the original] with United States interests, we should begin now to select and train a group of Cubans in government operations and public and [illegible in the original]. This training, to begin without delay, should be [illegible in the original] of the new program to be mounted by a special representative of the President for the relief and rehabilitation [illegible in the original] of Cuban refugees now concentrated in the Florida [illegible in the original] financial from Mutual Security Act funds (Tabs D and E)

b. Severance of Diplomatic Relations

If collective action through the OAS to sever relations with Cuba [illegible in the original] and if more Latin American states refuse to join us in such action, the United States should unilaterally sever diplomatic relations with the Castro regime.

Prior to severing relations, we should take steps to encourage the departure of U.S. citizens from Cuba, and we should assume that it will not be possible or feasible to maintain consular offices in the country.

Full explanation of our action should be furnished promptly to our NATO allies and through our diplomatic missions to governments around the world. All instruments of diplomacy and propaganda should be focused on all-out effort to secure if not parallel action at least worldwide understanding and support of our step.

c. Economic Sanctions

Immediately following the severance of diplomatic relations, [illegible in the original] as against Cuba. Export controls already in place should be further [illegible in the original] by elimination of [illegible in the original] and medicines. Authorization should be [illegible in the original] to impede the flow of Cuban imports into this country; financial controls should be applied to all transactions involving Cuba; and our NATO allies should be [illegible in the original]-type controls against Cuba.

d. Recognition of Cuban Government-in-Exile

[illegible in the original] relations with the Castro [illegible in the original] recognize a government-in-exile. To this end, we should begin now [illegible in the original] to select a junta which would be qualified [illegible in the original] for an acceptable political alternative for the Cuban people and [illegible in the original] successor government (Tab G). It is [illegible in the original] that the junta be able to attract the support of large numbers of Cubans within Cuba as well as outside. In addition, it should be able to [illegible in the original] in support of military force able to establish a [illegible in the original] on the island of Cuba and hold it until outside aid is available. The junta should [illegible in the original] that when this point is reached, the United States would respond favorably to [illegible in the original] requests for help in the form of:

- (1) military supplies and equipment,
- (2) civilian emergency aid (of Red Cross type),
- (3) financial assistance,
- (4) diplomatic support, and
- (5) press and other news media support. (Tab H)

A centrally developed campaign should be started, as soon as an acceptable government-in-exile announces itself publicly, to build up [illegible in the original] of its leaders and to line up Latin American support for the government. Similar efforts ultimately will be necessary in the UN. (Tab F)

e. Overt Assistance to Government-in-Exile

[illegible in the original] extended recognition, the United States should approach other friendly governments to follow suit. It should maintain open [illegible in the original] of the government-in-exile and of [illegible in the original] assist them in their [illegible in the original] to other governments with appropriate requests for equipment, supplies, facilities, and financial assistance. Additionally, those Cuban refugees training or rehabilitated in this country prior to establishment of the government-in-exile should be encouraged to place themselves at its [illegible in the original] and to work with it in preparing for eventual return to Cuba and assumption of government responsibilities.

f. Prevention of Movement of Arms and Men from Cuba to OAS Member States and/or Naval Blockade of Cuba

Consideration should be given to the establishment of a cordon sanitaire around Cuba. The moral and legal position of the United States would be considerably better if we were to act in response to the request of other member states. Therefore, the United States should announce publicly its readiness to respond favorably to requests for naval and air [illegible in the original] governments threatened by Cuban-based aggression.

[illegible in the original] that may prove necessary and feasible and would consider the possibility of instituting a naval blockade (Tabs I and J). [illegible in the original]).

PART TWO

[illegible in the original] by Agency.)

IV. Recommendations

1. [illegible in the original] approval is obtained from the Secretary, a Special [illegible in the original], and the President for the course of action outlined herein. [illegible in the original] through collective action if possible and unilateral [illegible in the original] the replacement of the present Cuban Government with [illegible in the original] from the standpoint of United States interests.

2. That, if the above approval is obtained, the concurrence of the President-elect be sought.

234. Notes of a Special Group meeting, December 29¹

December 29, 1960

SPECIAL GROUP MEETINGS—CUBA

1. Mr. Bissell notified the Group of plans for five supply drops in the next three days.

2. Mr. Bissell gave the broad outlines of a two-pronged plan for proceeding with certain limited covert activities directed against the Trujillo regime. He emphasized that although support would be given to the Figueres group, there is no intention of establishing a paramilitary force as such, since this would be impractical in view of requirements for Cuba. He also emphasized that the proposed actions would not of themselves bring about the desired result in the near future, lacking some decisive stroke against Trujillo himself.

3. The Group agreed with the proposal as outlined and felt that it should be mentioned at the Tuesday meeting. It was noted that Mr. Pawley feels that overt intervention in the Dominican Republic should be mounted simultaneously with the Cuban operation. The consensus of the Group was that this would not be entirely consistent. However, it was agreed that the plan is worth beginning at this time no matter what the eventual decision on overt intervention may be.

4. Mr. Merchant reported a brief conversation he had had with Mr. Gray's associates this morning. The latter had made two points: (a) it would be desirable to obtain the cooperation and support of individual Latin American governments, (b) it would be desirable, if possible, for the U.S. to break relations with Cuba, in concert with other countries, some time before January 20th.

¹ Overall plan for covert actions in Cuba. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 82-00679R, Box 3, Special Group Meetings—Cuba.

5. Mr. Merchant also said that he had come to the firm conclusion that it would be impossible politically to carry out three days of pre-invasion bombing in Cuba. All members of the Group agreed; Mr. Bissell said the concept has been revised to include only one day before the invasion.

6. Mr. Douglas then outlined his understanding of the general outlines of the overall plan for Cuba. Mr. Bissell agreed that this understanding was an accurate one. Mr. Douglas questioned the possibility of expanding the initial beachhead into a full-scale takeover of the government. Mr. Bissell said that our thinking is that this will not be possible unless one or all of the following situations develops: (a) overt support, (b) a major revolutionary uprising, (c) massive use of air support.

7. It was agreed that care should be taken as far as possible to avoid any possibly-abortive uprising on a comparatively small scale, such as the proposal made by a group of internal dissidents to seize an airfield and port near Havana.

8. Mr. Douglas said that it should not be assumed that Defense could not move quickly in support of covert operations. He acknowledged the fact that various subordinate elements of the DOD structure can slow things down considerably, but said that the top Defense echelon could cut through this if necessary.

9. Mr. Dulles reminded the Group that the President of Mexico had expressed a desire to meet with him. He said he proposed to visit that country on a vacation in January and that he hoped at that time to arrange a secret meeting with the President. He said he would like to talk to Mr. Mann before the trip; Mr. Merchant thought this would be useful. Mr. Dulles pointed out that this contact might provide a means of obtaining facilities in Mexico for the Cuban operation.

10. Mr. Merchant suggested that Messrs. Willauer, Mann and Barnes might usefully be present at meetings of the Group which included discussion of Cuba.

January 1961

235. Paper prepared in the CIA, January 1961¹

January 1961

TRINIDAD (CONCEPT OF OPERATION)

1. MISSION. Commencing at H-hour on D-day, the Assault Force lands, seizes, occupies, and defends a lodgement in the TRINIDAD-CASILDA area in order to establish a base from which further land and air operations can be launched against the Castro government of CUBA.

2. CONCEPT OF OPERATION.

a. On D-day the Assault Force conducts an amphibious/airborne landing in the TRINIDAD area.

b. Prior to D-day, sabotage activities are directed at reducing and destroying the GCC ground, air and naval capability throughout CUBA, with particular emphasis on air, communications, transportation, armor, artillery and POL. Propaganda activities are intensified in order to obtain active support of the Cuban populace.

c. On D-1 tactical support aircraft attack major GOC air force installations in order to destroy aircraft on the ground and to inflict maximum damage to runways and control and communications facilities. Attacks are also launched against tank parks, artillery parks, motor transportation, and other military targets.

d. At about H-6 hours a tactical deception operation is conducted in the LA FE area of PINAR DEL RIC in order to cause movement of enemy forces away from the area of intended actual operations.

e. Immediately prior to and following H-hour on D-day, tactical support aircraft provide air support for the Assault Force in landing and seizure of objectives, with particular attention to enemy defensive installations and troop formation in the immediate objective area. Major rail and highway bridges west and northwest of TRINIDAD and along the coastal road toward CIENFUEGOS are bombed in order to isolate the objective area. Daily armed reconnaissance missions are continued in order to prevent movement of enemy forces against the lodgment.

f. Commencing at H-hour, the Assault Force lands by landing craft (LCVP and LCU) over designated beaches, (Beaches 1 and 2), and by parachute in designated drop zone, seizes objectives A, B, and C, and on order of Assault Force Commander, seizes Objectives E and F. (Annex D—Operation Overlay).

¹ Mission and concept of operation for action against Cuba. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 82-00679R, Box 3, Papers Furnished the Green Committee.

g. After seizure of initial objectives, the Assault Force attempts to obtain cooperation, assistance and good-will of the local populace in the TRINIDAD–CASILDA area. Combat inside the City of Trinidad is avoided. Facilities such as the hospital in TRINIDAD and the port facilities and petroleum supplies at CASILDA are converted to Brigade use.

h. After consolidation of the lodgment, Assault Force coordinates operations with local guerrilla leaders and civil leaders in the area making maximum efforts to organize, equip and employ additional forces and incorporate them under command of the Brigade Commander.

i. Upon seizure and preparation of the airfield at TRINIDAD, transport aircraft (C-46) utilize this base for supply and evacuation operations.

j. Follow-up logistic support is provided by air landing, air drop and seaborne means on a scheduled basis and in response to call of Brigade Commander.

k. In the event the TRINIDAD area cannot be held, the Assault Brigade, on order of the Brigade Commander, withdraws to the ESCAMBRAY MOUNTAINS in order to continue resistance operations against the Castro government. Support for these operations will be provided by aerial means.

236. Briefing paper for Secretary of State-designate Rusk,
January 1961¹

January 1961

Briefing of Secretary of State Designate Rusk

On 17 March 1960, the President authorized the Agency to undertake a program designed to replace the current Cuban government with one more suited to the democratic ideals of the Cuban people and compatible with long-range U.S. interests. Since that date we have conducted this program along five major lines, namely: Political Action, Propaganda, Paramilitary Action, Foreign Intelligence, and Counter-Intelligence. Each of these activities is summarized in the following sections of this paper, which concludes with a résumé of the principal currently pending policy questions.

¹ Presidentially authorized program to replace current Cuban Government with one suited to democratic ideals of Cuban people and compatible with long-range U.S. interests. Secret. 28 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 78-01450R, Box 5, Area Activity—Cuba Task Force.

I. POLITICAL ACTION

We have conducted our political activities under the following concepts:

Opposition to the CASTRO regime should have as its goals full restoration of the 1940 Constitution and return to the basic principles of the revolution as enunciated in the 1958 Caracas Declaration.

The opposition should be pro-Western, strongly anti-Communist, embrace factions ranging in political orientation from a little to the right of center to somewhat left of center, and be able to appeal to and muster the broadest possible support of the Cuban population as a whole.

In order to implement these concepts, it was found necessary to establish an exile central management group, which would be used as a cover for covert actions, a catalyst for the unification of approximately 184 different anti-CASTRO groups, and a possible nucleus for a Provisional Government of Cuba.

The Agency gave much consideration to the composition of this central management group. Since it was felt unwise to include individuals closely associated in the past with the BATISTA regime, our primary attention was focused on personalities and groups who had participated directly in the original government of CASTRO but had left it, or who had collaborated with CASTRO's revolutionary effort but—because of the failure of his government to uphold the basic principles of the revolution—had gone into early opposition.

A. Formation of the Frente Revolucionario Democrático (FRD)

As a result of the foregoing considerations, we were able to forge—in April/May 1960—five political groups into one anti-CASTRO organization, which adopted the name Democratic Revolutionary Front (FRD). The groups spearheading the campaign against the CASTRO regime, under the umbrella of the FRD, are:

1. The Autentico Party, headed by Manuel Antonio de VARONA;
2. The Monticristi Group, headed by Justo CARRILLO;
3. The Christian Democratic Movement, headed by Jose Ignacio RASCO;
4. The Movimiento Revolucionario Recuperadora (MRR), headed by Manuel ARTIME; and

5. The Movimiento Institucional Democratico (MID), headed by Ricardo Rafael SARDINA. (It might be mentioned that the AAA organization, headed by Aureliano SANCHEZ Arango, was a charter member of the FRD; SANCHEZ Arango chose, however, for reasons of his own, to leave the FRD and the MID organization was then brought into the FRD.)

The FRD has its ostensible headquarters in Cuba and branch offices in the U.S. (primarily Miami) and a number of Latin American countries. Its components consist of a 5-member Executive Committee (the policy-making body of the organization), a General Coordinator (Manuel Antonio de VARONA, who is the de facto general manager of the organization), and 10 action departments, such as Plans and Programming, Propaganda, Transport, and Military Affairs.

B. The Political Posture of the FRD

The political posture of the FRD, which is less homogeneous than we would like it to be, ranges from somewhat right of center (SARDINA) to a little left of center (Justo CARRILLO). The MRR and the Autenticos can be considered centrist, with the important difference that the MRR represents the young generation, while the Autenticos, under VARONA, are a somewhat up-dated and much cleaner version of the early PRIO era.

On 22 June 1960, the FRD issued its Manifesto in Mexico City. This Manifesto strongly condemns the dictatorial and communist nature of the CASTRO regime and calls upon the people of Cuba, other Latin American nations, and the world to help the FRD to overthrow Fidel CASTRO's dictatorship. The FRD is dedicated to re-establish in Cuba a representative, democratic system and full civil liberties under the 1940 Constitution. The FRD is pledged to hold free general elections within 18 months after the establishment of a Provisional Government. It desires to ban the Communist Party; it promises an extension of social gains for the working classes, and agrarian reform that will develop the national riches and raise the rural standard of living; it desires a true trade union movement and a maximum enlargement of Cuba's gross national product, and more equitable distribution thereof. In other words, the FRD favors political, social, and economic evolution in Cuba.

C. FRD Activities

1. Unification of Exile Groups: In view of the particularities of Cuban exile politics, complete unification of exile groups is an almost impossible task. The FRD, however, has succeeded in causing the coalescence of various exile elements and is in contact with the more significant ones. By its sheer presence inside and outside Cuba, the FRD has much contributed to mobilize public opinion against CASTRO and has induced individuals and groups to actively oppose the regime. We are in contact with other acceptable exile groups, and we are examining every operational proposal these groups make with the intent to support them on a unilateral basis if their proposals have merit.

2. Paramilitary Activities: The FRD originally fronted for the selection and establishment of training sites in Guatemala. Through the mechanisms of the FRD military department, recruitment activities were undertaken; the FRD has also furnished the military manpower for those actions on land, in the air, and on the seas, which have taken place so far.

3. Planning Activities: The FRD has prepared many papers on a variety of subjects designed to provide as orderly as possible transition from the CASTRO regime to a new government: an agrarian law, amendments to the Constitution, a labor code, a military code, a judicial code, and others.

4. FRD Branch Office Activities: There are FRD branch offices in 15 Latin American countries. These branch offices are engaged in destroying the CASTRO image in these areas by utilizing local press and radio contacts and by engaging—on appropriate levels—in behind-the-scenes lobbying activities among governmental circles. These branch offices also are distributing written material attributable to the FRD (see below). Until these branch offices appeared on the local scene in the various Latin American countries, there were no focal points for the expression of anti-CASTRO sentiment in these areas. FRD branch offices have filled this void.

5. FRD Affiliates: The FRD has several affiliated organizations undertaking tours of Latin America to present to those who are in danger of being swayed by CASTROISM the true picture of the Cuban Communist dictatorship and the plight of all classes in the country. Teams composed of Labor Representatives (FORD), Students (DRE), Women's Group (CFC), Teachers' Group (DFR), and Jurists (AFJ) have already been organized and several have embarked on propaganda tours of Latin America. One clandestine student propaganda team has been infiltrated into Cuba and recently effected a successful clandestine broadcast over a dormant TV channel.

The FRD "Affiliates" and the independent Crusada Feminina Cubana (CFC) have given excellent results, particularly with respect to their tours throughout Latin America. The excellent press and other media coverage of their activities during these trips attests to the favorable impact they have had.

II. PROPAGANDA

Starting with press conferences in June in New York, Mexico, and Miami, and the publishing of a Manifesto which has been widely distributed, the FRD propaganda efforts have now reached the point where the FRD is well known as the principal resistance coalition dedicated to the overthrow of the CASTRO Communist dictatorship. The FRD propaganda mechanism now has representatives in many Latin American countries; this mechanism is responsible for two radio programs beamed into Cuba (one of them from a boat broadcasting from international waters), facilities for the production of printed material for infiltration into Cuba, three regular weekly publications, and is preparing a study called "Listen, Mr. Mills", in reply to C. Wright Mills' book, "Listen Yankee".

Special propaganda operations undertaken by the FRD include the "Caravan of Sorrow". In September 1960, 62 Cuban women dressed in black and "mourning the death of freedom in Cuba" went from Miami to New York City in a protest against the visit of Fidel CASTRO to the United Nations. Reportorial coverage of this operation was excellent in Miami, New York, and Washington. During this same time in New York City, FRD student groups demonstrated against CASTRO and the Communist leaders. The effect of these demonstrations was evident in the press coverage and in the attempt by the 26th of July Movement in New York City to assassinate members of the student group on 22 September, which unfortunately resulted in the death of a Venezuelan child, an innocent bystander.

In addition to the FRD propaganda mechanisms, we have developed a great number of other propaganda operations to combat the CASTRO government and to generally support both the FRD and the United States' position in the Caribbean.

A. Primary Radio: The primary mechanism utilized is Radio SWAN. This station, owned ostensibly by a private company, started broadcasts to Cuba and the Dominican Republic in May 1960, and now broadcasts five hours nightly and four hours each morning, both short and medium wave. In addition to straight news reporting and a few general entertainment programs, the broadcasts include programs prepared by leading anti-CASTRO newspapers now in exile. There is every evidence that Radio SWAN broadcasts are hitting Cuba and that they are hurting CASTRO. CASTRO and the Cuban governmental propaganda organs have attacked the radio and the government is jamming it; we have received many letters from Cuban listeners, supplying useful evaluations of the broadcasts and an unexpected source of intelligence.

B. Other Radio: Daily short-wave broadcasts to Cuba are made over WRUL; these are repeated by SWAN on its medium wave transmission. A morning and evening broadcast is made over WMIE, Miami. We have just completed arrangements to start on 19 January two one-hour Spanish-language broadcasts daily over WGBS, Miami. These broadcasts will be sponsored by the Cuban Freedom Committee, which also utilizes Radio SWAN facilities; the programs, containing news, music and commentary, will endeavor to present the U.S. viewpoint in a calm, dignified manner.

C. Publications: We support financially three major exile newspapers:

[less than 1 line not declassified] This is a sensational tabloid-type newspaper published in Miami by [less than 1 line not declassified]. Beginning in June 1960, it has gradually increased its distribution to approximately 25,000, two-thirds of which go to Latin America or Cuba.

[less than 1 line not declassified]. A middle-of-the-road weekly newspaper produced in Miami by [less than 1 line not declassified] but published in Wilmington, Delaware. This first appeared on 5 October in 12,000 copies. It is being mailed into Cuba and throughout the hemisphere.

[less than 1 line not declassified] This conservative paper is published in Miami and control is exercised through [less than 1 line not declassified].

We also support:

[less than 1 line not declassified] This most widely-known Cuban weekly magazine, now with a Caracas dateline but published in Atlanta by [less than 1 line not declassified] first appeared on newsstands throughout Latin America on 7 October. Heralded as the "magazine which CASTRO could not kill," it is now receiving orders for 140,000 copies weekly (ABC Chicago guaranteed circulation). Beginning with the Christmas issue, a clandestine copy was printed in pocket-book size. The owners hope to have 40,000 copies smuggled into Cuba.

The Cuban Information Service Weekly Newsletter: Published in both English and Spanish in approximately 1,000 copies and mailed to editors and writers throughout Latin America. It summarizes the important news from and about Cuba and contains editorials which can be reproduced in other papers and used over the radio. It also contains a historical supplement which exposes Communist tactics, especially as regards Cuba.

D. Propaganda Air-Drop Operations: To date we have dropped the following Agency-produced leaflets over Cuba:

1. "A Call to the People of Cuba" asking for resistance to CASTRO and Communism. (About 4,000,000 during three different air operations)
2. "Land Title" addressed to the campesino audience (100,000 during two missions)
3. "Hungarian", comparing Communist control over Hungary and Cuba (300,000 on one mission)

In addition to further supplies of the above, we are printing supplies of a "Milicia" leaflet, targeted against the militia; a "Sabotage" leaflet, containing instructions; and a "Fish Symbol," a non-political sign of resistance; all of these will be used in future drops.

We have also dropped 700 pounds of clandestine-sized copies of Avance, El Mundo and Bohemia Libre, stamped "Compliments of the FRD" and we will continue to drop these publications.

Future leaflet operations will be in support of our paramilitary objectives. We plan to have "D-Day" leaflets asking the people to join the anti-CASTRO forces or engage in sabotage.

III. PARAMILITARY

A. Strike Concept: The concept envisages the seizure of a small lodgement on Cuban soil by an all-Cuban amphibious/airborne force of about 750 men. The landings in Cuba will be preceded by a tactical air preparation, beginning at dawn on D-1 Day. The primary purpose of the air preparation will be to destroy or neutralize all Cuban military aircraft and naval vessels constituting a threat to the invasion force. When this task is accomplished, attacks will then be directed against other military targets, including artillery parks, tank parks, military vehicles, supply dumps, etc. Close air support will be provided to the invasion force on D-Day and thereafter as long as the force is engaged in combat. The primary targets during this time will be opposing military formations in the field. Particular efforts will be made to interdict opposing troop movements against the lodgement.

The initial mission of the invasion force will be to seize and defend a small area, which under ideal conditions will include an airfield and access to the sea for logistic support. Plans must provide, however, for the eventuality that the force will be driven into a tight defensive formation which will preclude supply by sea or control of an airfield. Under such circumstances supply would have to be provided entirely by air drop. The primary objective of the force will be to survive and maintain its integrity on Cuban soil. There will be no early attempt to break out of the lodgement for further offensive operations unless and until there is a general uprising against the CASTRO regime or overt military intervention by United States forces has taken place.

It is expected that these operations will precipitate a general uprising throughout Cuba and cause the revolt of large segments of the Cuban Army and Militia. The lodgement, it is hoped, will serve as a rallying point for the thousands who are estimated to be ready for overt resistance to CASTRO but who hesitate to act until they can feel some assurance of success. A general revolt in Cuba, if one is successfully triggered by our operations, could serve to topple the CASTRO regime within a period of weeks.

If matters do not eventuate as predicted above, the lodgement established by our force can be used as the site for establishment of a provisional government which can be recognized by the United States, and hopefully by other American states, and given overt military assistance. The way will then be paved for United States military intervention aimed at pacification of Cuba, and this will result in the prompt overthrow of the CASTRO Government.

Other paramilitary programs are being intensified and accelerated. They include the supply by air and sea of guerrilla elements now in Cuba, the conduct of sabotage operations, the introduction of specially trained paramilitary teams, and the expansion of our agent networks throughout the island.

At the present time we have over a half-dozen Agency-trained agents with radio communication facilities conducting clandestine paramilitary operations inside Cuba. These activities range from simple sabotage acts to the organization, training and equipping, via our covert supply missions, of resistance groups.

To date we have delivered, via twelve maritime missions, over 15,000 pounds of arms, ammunition and demolition materials to resistance elements in Cuba. As of 13 January, we had dropped over 36,000 pounds of arms, leaflets and food on thirteen overflights. Some of the items dropped were seized by CASTRO forces but a sizeable amount of them were received by the resistance reception groups.

B. Status of Forces:

1. Air: The Project tactical air force includes ten B-26 aircraft currently based in Guatemala and at Eglin Air Force Base. However, there are only five Cuban B-26 pilots available at this time who are considered to be of high technical competence. Six additional Cuban pilots are available, but their proficiency is questionable.

It is planned that seven C-54 and four C-46 transports will be available for strike operations. Here again, the number of qualified Cuban crews is insufficient. There are two qualified C-54 crews on hand at this time, and three C-46 crews.

Aviation ordnance for conduct of strike operations is yet to be positioned at the strike base in Nicaragua. Necessary construction and repairs at this base have commenced, and there appears to be no obstacle to placing this facility in a state of readiness in time for operations as planned.

2. Maritime: Amphibious craft for the operation, including three LCU's and four LCVP's, are now at Vieques, Puerto Rico, where Cuban crew training is progressing satisfactorily. These craft with their crews will soon be ready for operations.

The BARBARA J (LCI), now returned to the United States from Puerto Rico, has undergone repairs and is ready for missions. Its sister ship, the BLAGAR, is outfitting in Miami, and its crew is being assembled.

3. Ground: There are 560 Cuban personnel now in training in Guatemala. All other recruits should shortly be available for at least four to six weeks of training prior to commitment.

The Assault Brigade has been formed into its basic organization (a quadrangular infantry battalion, including four rifle companies, and a weapon company). With the recent acquisition of 37 U.S. Army Special Forces instructors, training should be completed by our target date. Our plans call for the assault group to contain five tanks. These tanks are to be moved to Vieques, where Cuban crews will be trained to operate them. They will be loaded with other assault vehicles on the vessels departing from the Vieques area for the strike.

C. Timing of Paramilitary Operation: Since the military training teams are now in position, we feel that the Assault Brigade will achieve acceptable readiness for combat during the latter half of February 1961. All other required preparations can be made by that same time. The operation should be launched during this period. Any delay beyond 1 March 1961 would be inadvisable for the following reasons:

1. It is doubtful that Guatemala can accommodate the Cuban forces at our Guatemalan training base much beyond 1 March 1961.

2. Cuban trainees cannot be held in training for much longer. Many have been in the camp for months under most austere and restrictive conditions. They are becoming restive and if not committed to action soon there will probably be a general lowering of morale. Large-scale desertions could occur with attendant possibilities of surfacing the entire program.

3. While the support of the CASTRO Government by the Cuban populace is deteriorating and time is working in our favor in that sense, time is working to our disadvantage in a military sense. Cuban jet pilots are being trained in Czechoslovakia and the appearance of modern radar throughout Cuba indicates a strong possibility that CASTRO may soon have an all-weather jet intercept capability. His ground forces have received vast quantities of military equipment from the Bloc countries, including medium and heavy tanks, field artillery, heavy mortars, and anti-aircraft artillery. Bloc technicians are training his forces in the use of this formidable equipment. Within the near future CASTRO's hard core of loyal armed forces will undoubtedly achieve technical proficiency in the use of available modern weapons.

4. CASTRO is making rapid progress in establishing a Communist-style police state which will be difficult to unseat by any means short of all-out overt intervention of U.S. military forces.

IV. FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE

Primary emphasis has been placed on the collection of intelligence to support our paramilitary operations. The recent break in relations and the withdrawal of our staff personnel from Cuba will necessarily mean a reduction in the speed and volume of our collection, however, due to our preparations for this event, we do have staybehind networks active with radio and secret writing communications. In the Habana area we have one collection net and one propaganda distribution/collection net. In the Santiago de Cuba area we have two collection nets. In addition to the three radio sets being used by these active nets, we have 22 other radio sets cached throughout Cuba. We are also running collection operations from the United States and other countries utilizing Cuban and third-country nationals.

V. COUNTER-INTELLIGENCE

Our counter-intelligence effort has developed along the lines of attempting to protect our operations from CASTRO and other opposition infiltrations, to uncover other individuals who are a threat to our objectives, and to penetrate Cuban intelligence/security organizations. We have identified and neutralized several known Cuban agents and provocateurs who have penetrated our activities, and have identified and have under close observation several others who pose a potential threat. Efforts to penetrate Cuban services have been relatively unsuccessful, [less than 1 line not declassified]. An intensive study of the services is being made and all possible leads are being followed in the anticipation that we will have additional successes.

We are also actively engaged in organizing, training, and providing guidance to an FRD security and intelligence group. In the short time that this group has been operating, they have developed amazingly well. A greater part of our effort is now being channeled in this direction with the thought that this group will not only help us now, but will become more necessary during the action phase, and will be a durable asset after a successful displacement of the present Cuban Government.

VI. PENDING POLICY GUIDANCE AND DECISIONS

A. Composition of Provisional Government: A primary factor in our planning to date has been the assumption that an anti-CASTRO Cuban provisional government would be formed (and recognized by the U.S. and Latin America countries) during our paramilitary strike phase.

With reference to the composition of any future provisional government, we have received lists of suggested candidates from a number of responsible anti-CASTRO leaders or groups. We have checked and evaluated these lists and can provide them to the State Department for a decision on a provisional government which might be acceptable to a broad segment of the anti-CASTRO leaders and the U.S. Government.

Requirement: A decision by the State Department on the members of a future provisional government which would be acceptable within the political objectives of the U.S. Government.

B. Recognition and Support of Provisional Government: Even though a successful paramilitary lodgment with a provisional government is established, it may be necessary that the U.S. Government provide overt assistance to this government to enable it to overthrow the CASTRO regime. We should be able to assume that the U.S. will recognize a provisional government and also promptly extend support to maintain it and, if necessary, to enable it to extend its control to all of Cuba.

Requirement: A decision that the U.S. Government will recognize a provisional government and will provide the overt support that will enable that government to extend its control to all of Cuba.

(Concerning recognition of any future provisional government by Latin American countries, there appears to be some need for bilateral talks with these countries in order to assure that they take the action desired. The Agency is prepared to assist the Department in this action if desired.)

C. Policies of Future Cuban Government: Another factor closely related to any future provisional government is the policy to be followed by that government once established. An objective of our operation was to have a future Cuban government compatible with U.S. national interests. Today we are in contact—in varying degrees—with anti-CASTRO Cubans who range from right to extreme left in the political spectrum and their views will necessarily be reflected in any future government actions. Thus we should, at an early date, begin to influence and back—to a greater extent than heretofore—those elements which mostly are responsive to U.S. objectives. An acceptable solution, in light of the pragmatic facts facing us, would seem to be a middle-of-the-road complex, favoring an evolution of social, economic and political changes in Cuba under the 1940 Constitution.

Requirement: A decision regarding the acceptable political, social and economic governmental procedures and policies within which we may attempt to mold the future Cuban government.

D. Other policy decisions required concern our paramilitary effort against the target. The requirements involved and our recommendations are as follows:

1. Timing: As stated before, our plans for this operation are predicated on a strike date of not later than 1 March 1961, and we are conducting our training and developing our strike support preparations to meet this date.

Recommendation: Approval for the mounting of the strike operation in the latter half of February and not later than 1 March 1961.

2. Air Strikes: It is axiomatic in amphibious operations that control of air and sea in the objective area is absolutely required. The Cuban Air Force and naval vessels capable of opposing our landing must be knocked out or neutralized before our amphibious shipping makes its final run into the beach. If this is not done, we will be courting disaster. Although every effort will be made to select a landing area where our assault force will be unopposed by enemy ground forces, our invasion force is very small in comparison to forces which may be thrown against it, and we must compensate for numerical inferiority by effective tactical air support, not only during the landing but also thereafter for so long as the force remains in combat. It is essential that opposing military targets (such as artillery parks, tank parks, supply dumps, military convoys, and troops in the field) be brought under effective and continuing air attack. Psychological considerations also make such attacks essential. The spectacular aspects of air operations should go far toward producing the uprising in Cuba that we seek.

Recommendation: That the air preparation commence not later than dawn of D minus 1 Day.

3. Use of American Contract Pilots: The paragraph above outlines the requirement for precise and effective air strikes, while an earlier paragraph in our paramilitary section points up the shortage of qualified Cuban pilots. It is very questionable that the limited number of Cuban B-26 pilots available to us can produce the desired results unless augmented by highly skilled American contract pilots to serve as section and flight leaders in attacks against the more critical targets. The Cuban pilots are inexperienced in war and of limited technical competence in navigation and gunnery. There is reason also to suspect that they may lack the motivation to take the stern measures required against targets in their own country. It is considered that the success of the operation will be jeopardized unless a few American contract B-26 pilots are employed.

With regard to logistical air operations, the shortage of Cuban crews has already been mentioned. There is no prospect of producing sufficient Cuban C-54 crews to man the seven C-54 aircraft to be used in the operation. Our experience to date with the Cuban transport crews has left much to be desired. It is concluded that the only satisfactory solution to the problem of air logistical support of the strike force and other forces joining it will be to employ a number of American contract crews.

Recommendation: That policy approval be obtained for use of American contract crews for tactical and transport aircraft in augmentation of the inadequate number of Cuban crews available.

4. Use of Puerto Cabezas, Nicaragua: The airfield at Puerto Cabezas is essential for conduct of the strike operation unless strike base is made available in the United States. Our air base in Guatemala is 800 miles from central Cuba—too distant for B-26 operations and for air supply operations of the magnitude required, using the C-46 and C-54 aircraft. Puerto Cabezas is only 500 miles from central Cuba—acceptable, although too distant to be completely desirable, for B-26 and transport operations.

Puerto Cabezas will also serve as the staging area for loading assault troops into transports much more satisfactorily than Puerto Barrios, Guatemala, which is exposed to hostile observation and lacks security. It is planned that troops will be flown in increments from Guatemala to Puerto Cabezas, placed in covered trucks, loaded over the docks at night into amphibious shipping, which will then immediately retire to sea.

Recommendation: That firm policy be obtained for use of Puerto Cabezas as an air strike base and staging area.

5. Use of U.S. Air Base for Logistical Flights: An air base in southern Florida would be roughly twice as close to central Cuba as Puerto Cabezas. This means that the logistical capability of our limited number of transport aircraft would be almost doubled if operated from Florida rather than Puerto Cabezas. Logistical support of the strike force in the target would be much more certain and efficient if flown from Florida.

There is also a possibility that once the strike operations commence, conditions would develop which would force us out of the Nicaragua air base. Without some flexibility of operational capability including an additional logistical support air base with pre-positioned supplies in the United States, we would conceivably be confronted with a situation wherein the Assault Brigade would be left entirely without logistical air support. Supply by sea cannot be relied upon, for the Brigade may be driven by superior forces from the beach area. Such a situation could lead to complete defeat of the Brigade and failure of the mission.

It seems obvious that the only real estate which the United States can, without question, continue to employ once the operation commences is its own soil. Therefore, an air base for logistical support should be provided in the United States. This will offer the possibility of continued, flexible operations, if one or both of our bases in Guatemala and/or Nicaragua are lost to our use.

Recommendation: That policy be established to permit use of an air base in southern Florida (preferably Opalocka, which is now available to us and has storage facilities for supplies) for logistical support flights to Cuba.

237. Memorandum from C. Tracy Barnes to McCone, January 2¹

January 2, 1961

SUBJECT

Material for Policy Meeting on Cuba, 3 January 1961

1. The present [less than 1 line not declassified] preparations and activities are:

a. Propaganda. An extensive propaganda program involving the use of radio facilities (mainly Swan Island and WRUL); the publication of newspapers (exile editions of [less than 1 line not declassified] and [less than 1 line not declassified]); magazines ([less than 1 line not declassified]); and newsletters. Moreover, a boat has been equipped for radio broadcasts and leaflet drops have been made (one 3-plane drop and one 1-plane drop by us plus at least one leaflet drop by another anti-Castro group not aligned with us). Also, speaking tours throughout Latin America have been arranged and various opposition symbols (e.g., the fish) have and are being built up.

b. Political Action. Political action involving mainly an effort to unite the opposition, to build up the FRD, to consolidate views regarding a platform for a post-Castro regime and discussions with the State Department regarding the membership for and the appropriate procedure for designating a provisional government. A number of problems are involved in this connection (mentioned below) such as official recognition of a provisional government, aid that it will be granted, etc.

c. Economic Action: Economic action involving sabotage which it is hoped may be increased and discussions with the State Department and business interests regarding embargoes including the denial of important spare parts.

d. Paramilitary Action: Paramilitary action involving the introduction of communicators and specialist teams to support internal opposition plus air drops of matériel and infiltration of bodies and matériel by sea. It is also planned in the near future to return some political figures to encourage more active internal opposition. Meanwhile, additional teams and communicators are being held in Panama for later infiltration, approximately 500 men are being trained in Guatemala, a small air force is being established and some maritime assets developed. Additional recruitments are being made in an effort to raise the total trainees to 750. The readiness date for these trainees at present is mid February.

¹ Material for January 3 policy meeting on Cuba, Secret. 9 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 67-01083R, Box 1, C.T. Barnes—Chrono, Jan–Jul 1961.

The general paramilitary plan contemplates a landing at some point of the Cuban trainees in a single force of approximately 650 men which would leave a few trainees as reserves. It is hoped that this landing may establish some sort of a beachhead on Cuban soil into which representatives of a provisional government can be introduced. It is hoped at this stage that this government will then be recognized as the government of Cuba by at least the United States and hopefully the United States and a number of Latin American countries. Once this is done, it is further hoped that some reasonably overt assistance can be provided. Basic to the plan is the expectation that not only the paramilitary teams mentioned above but even more the landing in force will encourage and produce active internal opposition to Castro.

2. There are a number of important unsettled issues inherent in the above activities and planning and it is presumed that these points will provide the main basis for discussion at the 3 January meeting.

a. There have been some recent suggestions that a major effort should be made prior to 20 January. In the absence of substantial support from other elements of the Government, it would be impossible for the [less than 1 line not declassified] paramilitary plan to meet any such requirement. It is always possible, of course, that the present step-up of support to internal groups, including introduction of teams, may achieve a more substantial internal reaction than anticipated. If so, such a reaction should of course be given maximum support and could conceivably achieve the results planned for the subsequent more substantial landing. Unfortunately, however, this seems a rather remote possibility.

b. U.S. diplomatic efforts to obtain Latin American support. Pawley's recent trip to Argentina and Peru falls into this category. It would seem useful, however, to increase such efforts and to include a member of other countries particularly Colombia, Venezuela, Peru and possibly Costa Rica, Ecuador, Chile and Honduras. Mexico would, of course, be opposed. Nothing can be done in Brazil since Quadres has made himself unavailable until 1 February. Nicaragua will probably require some negotiating since we are still going ahead with preparations for a strike base at Puerto Cabezas. In view of the attitude of a number of Central American countries to the Samoans, however, it would seem better not to press the diplomatic approach too hard in Nicaragua. I believe that the State Department is willing and even anxious to pursue this general course on a bi-lateral basis as distinguished from the OAS but is holding back on the grounds that the policy, particularly from the new administration, is not clear. Moreover, in order to be successful with certain of the above countries, a more active anti-Trujillo position must be adopted by the U.S. In this connection, it is possible that some headway could be made with Betancourt and others with his point of view by offering later aid against Trujillo in return for present aid against Cuba. This may not be very persuasive since Betancourt, et al, are only interested in actions, having been given in their opinion words without action for much too long. This diplomatic effort should attempt to obtain a joint understanding regarding termination of relations with Cuba (where it has not already occurred) and the recognition of a Cuban provisional government at an appropriate moment and the support of this provisional government as required including some arms, hopefully some men, and some money although this is perhaps less important at the moment. We should push at the January 3 meeting to get this effort started immediately.

c. The questions as to how and when a provisional government should be named is wholly unresolved. Our position is that at least the top individuals should be selected by the State Department in consultation with us. When selected, we feel that the individuals should only be told immediately before being dispatched to some Cuban-held real estate. We believe that if it is done any sooner, the political battles within the Cuban emigres will be unmanageable. If, on the other hand, the selected leaders become the only ones on Cuban soil, their position is far less vulnerable. There is, of course, the question of their acceptance by the internal resistance which cannot be answered in advance. There should, of course, be some high positions for leaders emerging within the internal opposition. Tom Mann has argued that the provisional government should be named at an earlier date on the grounds that under such circumstances recognition might be obtained by some Latin American countries as well as by the U.S. For the reasons mentioned above, we cannot agree to this position and feel that the Latin American countries recognition must occur after the introduction of the provisional government into Cuba. It is hoped that the 3 January meeting will decide that immediate steps should be taken to determine or at least to screen thoroughly names for leaders of a provisional government as well as to prepare an agreed plan for how they should be named.

d. The economic aid which will be given to the provisional government is still unsettled. This involves determinations not only as to the extent of such aid but the proper time for its announcement. Moreover, decisions should be reached as to how much military aid can be given to help the provisional government overthrow the Castro regime. It may be that this latter will not be necessary but the planning should certainly assume that it will. Presumably, once the provisional government has been recognized, support similar to that recently given Guatemala and Nicaragua could be provided on request, i.e., protection from certain invasion or intervention. This would go a long way to secure the beachhead. The next question is to what extent aid can be provided to enable the provisional government to move out of its own beachhead in order to take the rest of Cuba. It is hoped that in addition to providing materiel arrangements can be made to give the provisional government thinly veiled volunteers. These volunteers will, hopefully, include some disguised soldiers from other Latin American countries (as a result of the negotiations mentioned above) plus some disguised Americans. Both the materiel and the man should be turned over within the beachhead.

e. Another unsettled point which needs deciding is the extent to which planning can go forward on the use of U.S. soil to support the [less than 1 line not declassified] invasion in its early phases. Both air strikes and air drops will be much more practical and effective if they can be run from the U.S. If not, Nicaragua is the only other available spot and this due to distance will be difficult though feasible. In this connection it is hoped that the beachhead acquired will have some air facilities to which at least some if not all of the FRD air force can be moved.

f. Another issue which may well be raised by Tom Mann is the possibility of transferring the [less than 1 line not declassified] trainees from Guatemala to the U.S. He will also possibly argue that the Nicaraguan strike base should not be used. His reasons for this are that the operation is essentially a U.S. one and as a matter of honor we should do what we can to protect the shaky governments of Nicaragua and Guatemala from having to take the rap. Our position on this is that we have no desire to move the trainees unless it is absolutely necessary since to do so will cause unquestionably a morale problem and equally certainly the presence of the trainees in the U.S. will become as well known as their presence in Guatemala is now known. This being true, the operation in effect becomes overt and official as well since the trainees will be occupying a U.S. base. If we are prepared to go this far, it would seem better to go the whole way and simply do the job with the Marines. On the other hand, we are prepared to bring the trainees to a staging area in the U.S., if one can be found, just prior to the landing. This would seem to take care of Tom Mann's problem and would not raise too many difficulties since the group could be closely contained for a period of 36 to 48 hours. Moreover, there would be no morale problem since a brief stop of this type could not be construed by the trainees as a further delay. As far as the Nicaraguan strike base is concerned, our position is merely that we must use it unless we can receive authority to use some other base within an acceptable range. On present facts, the only other bases fitting this requirement are in the U.S.

g. Further briefings of the new administration are being pushed by the Department. Our view on this is that since the operation cannot fail to continue into the new administration, it is important that appropriate officials are knowledgeable. Moreover, there are a few decisions regarding preparations on which it would be very useful to have their views. From our point of view these are:

(1) Approval of the general outline of the plan in order to justify expenditures now being made in preparations.

(2) Attitude toward possible use in the future of U.S. bases in order to permit selection and placing of inventories.

(3) Continuation of trainees in Guatemala and preparation of Nicaraguan strike base. These are only important in case there is any likelihood of a decision for sudden change after 20 January.

(4) Attitude regarding the diplomatic and provisional government points made above to the extent and only to the extent that the State Department refuses to proceed without an indication of the new attitude. In my opinion, the Department should proceed anyhow on the points indicated but since they have been hesitant to do so, there is a practical issue here.

h. The State Department may also raise the desirability of the U.S. breaking relations with Cuba in the near future, possibly within the next week or ten days. It seems to us that there are two aspects to this problem: one, the operational effect it may have on us; and the other the advantages which it might gain for the U.S. through favorable reactions from other Latin American countries. Although our [less than 1 line not declassified] is necessarily restricted, there are still definite benefits to be obtained from its presence. As far as other Latin American countries are concerned, it seems to me that these benefits can be equally obtained through the diplomatic discussions mentioned above which, of course, will include consideration of a break in relations and the proper time to do it. We would prefer, therefore, to have the U.S. delay an actual diplomatic break.

C. Tracy Barnes
A/DDP/A

238. Memorandum from Barnes to the Special Assistant to the Under Secretary for Political Affairs, January 17¹

January 17, 1961

SUBJECT

Joint Planning Committee—Cuba

As agreed at the 16 January meeting of the Joint Planning Committee, I am sending you some comments on the Staff Study presented by DOD at the meeting, on the working draft of the memorandum, dated January 16, submitted by Ambassador Willauer and on certain other related matters. I am addressing my memorandum to you as I felt that a number of Special Group matters were involved and that, consequently, you should be the focal point. I am, however, including a copy for Ambassador Willauer and an extra copy in case you might need it. I am also returning Ambassador Willauer's working draft.

A. DOD Staff Study

1. As indicated at the 16 January meeting, it is our opinion that the DOD draft paper, entitled "Evaluation of Possible Military Courses of Action in Cuba" is a useful document. I would like to point out, however, that there are a number of points which concern us about the paper unless, as agreed at the meeting, the premise on which the paper is written is strictly applied. This premise, as you know, has a number of alternatives which stated in my own language are: a) the present FRD strike force lands and is thoroughly defeated; b) attempts to land but utterly fails; or, c) prior to any landing attempt, a judgment is reached as to the extent of the opposition which results in a decision not to use the strike force at all. Any of these alternatives assume a sufficiently strong pro-Castro political situation within Cuba to make the DOD paper acceptable to us. Should there alternatives, however, not be basic to the paper, there are some points which in our opinion raise inferences with which we cannot agree. For example:

(a) It is quite clear that the entire DOD plan is written without any reference whatsoever to planning which has taken place to date in connection with the FRD and its strike force. As indicated, this is acceptable on a strict application of the premise but I want to make it clear that we cannot agree to any inference that the planning to date is not and has not been valid.

¹ Joint Planning Committee on Cuba. Secret. 3 pp. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, Cuba Program, Nov 1960–Jan 29, 1961.

(b) The DOD stated orally in connection with paragraph 15 of its paper that any force of less than 5,000 men would be foolish to consider. We do not accept any inference that this applies to present planning based as it is on different premises.

(c) Paragraph 17 concludes that only courses of action involving the overt use of U.S. forces can be successful. Again, we cannot accept any suggestion that such a conclusion applies to present planning.

2. Additional points could be made but do not seem necessary since we do not believe that there was any misunderstanding at the 16 January meeting. This conclusion is, in our opinion, established by General Gray's agreement that there is still a further area of planning which has not been covered, i.e. a plan now exists culminating in the use of the FRD strike force and the DOD paper presents a plan based on the complete elimination or failure to use this strike force. As yet unplanned are the possibilities that the strike force may be sufficiently successful to achieve a landing and establish itself on a piece of Cuban soil but it is unable without help to either advance any further or to hold its position beyond a given period of time. Joint planning between CIA and DOD is necessary in order to consider what can be done to cover these possibilities. In our opinion, these possibilities are the really practical ones and, therefore, the ones on which particular emphasis should be placed. As indicated, CIA proposes to proceed on these with DOD as suggested by General Gray.

3. A further possibility exists: namely, the landing or attempted landing of a strike force which fails. It is not felt that this possibility should be considered since there has been complete agreement by everyone from the start that no action should be undertaken unless it were quite clear that all steps necessary for success would be employed if required.

4. Although, perhaps, obvious, it is still important to point out that the planning discussed above is strictly limited to military or paramilitary problems and completely leaves out many intimately related issues of a political nature for which planning is essential and on which to date no decisions have been made. In this connection it might be said that although it is recognized that decisions may have to await the new administration, still there are not even firm recommendations available on many of these issues. Agreed recommendations, for example, are not presently available on urgent matters directly connected with the FRD strike plan, on many political aspects of the FRD plan and on the implications on certain possible courses of action vital to other planning. Examples are whether or not U.S. air bases can be used; how far the U.S. should go in recognition of a provisional government; what specific action will be taken to discuss with and discover attitudes of selected Latin American countries; and what the implications of recognition of a provisional government might be in terms of actual support of a strike force.

B. Ambassador Willauer's Draft Paper

Regarding Ambassador Willauer's draft paper, our opinion is that it states matters with which we are generally in agreement. On the other hand, we believe that it would be better to focus the attention of the Special Group to a few specific issues rather than to open at this time a number of problems which could lead the Group away from the main matters of concern. This seems particularly important since it is the Group's last meeting and the members, therefore, can only be expected to pass on a few items which preferably should be of an extremely precise nature. Perhaps Ambassador Willauer could submit his draft memorandum separately in which case we would be glad to submit our comments in detail, if desired. As far as the Group is concerned, it seems to us that we should concentrate on reporting to them the planning which has taken place since the last meeting, what additional planning must occur and our proposals on how this should be accomplished. The uncompleted planning should include both joint planning and any other planning required by each Department involved, i.e., State, DOD and CIA.

C. Tracy Barnes

cc: Ambassador Willauer

Attachment: Amb. Willauer's Working Draft Memo, dated 16 January 1961

239. Memorandum from Ambassador Willauer to Merchant,
January 18¹

January 18, 1961

SUBJECT

The suggested Program for Cuba contained in the Memorandum to you dated December 6, 1960

1. As instructed at the last meeting of the Group, DOD, CIA, and ARA (to a limited extent) under my chairmanship have done the following:

¹ December 6 plan to overthrow the Castro regime. Secret. 3 pp. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, Cuba Program, Nov 1960-Jan 20, 1961.

a. Fulfilled the desires of DOD to be updated on current thinking on the program for Cuba. This was done orally to General Gray and Captain Spore by myself and others.

b. After concluding this we assumed that the December 6 plan (updated in the light of developments since that time) might not succeed in the objective of overthrowing the Castro regime. We made it clear that we were not trying to pass judgment on this point. We stated that our principle reasons for not doing so were the absence of very important policy determinations which many of us feel must promptly be taken; and also in the light of our belief that the final judgment as to whether such a plan will have a reasonable chance of success will have to be made almost at the last minute in the light of the then existing evaluation of Castro's capabilities, the capabilities of internal opposition, etc.

c. We further assumed that final operations under the December 6 plan (i.e., air attack and "covert landing, etc.) would not be triggered unless the U.S. Government were prepared to do everything else needed overtly or covertly in the light of the existing evaluation in order to guarantee success. I and others pointed out in the meeting that this determination would undoubtedly have to be made in the light of the then existing political climate in the United States, in Latin America, and in the rest of the world.

I emphasized my own view, as set forth in my memo of January 16 to Secretary Herter through you, entitled "The Interconnection of the Cuban and Dominican Problems Politically," that so far as Latin American opinion was concerned, I feel that the key to a favorable opinion lies in the impact of whatever policy the new administration will adopt towards "dictators of the right as well as of the left." It is my current view that we will probably get support from many Latin American countries of democratic inclinations in direct proportion to the degree we are felt to be aiding in the overthrow of Trujillo and generally are "on the side of the angels" in the entire problem of dictatorships vs. free governments in the hemisphere.

d. Based on the foregoing assumptions and with guidance on State's and CIA's concepts of the situation we have obtained from DOD "An Evaluation of Possible Military Courses of Action in Cuba." This I conceive was the main objective of the work I was instructed to do.

2. From DOD's "Evaluation", which has been submitted to you, and from a paper submitted by Tracy Barnes to you dated 17 January, it seems to me that the following conclusions emerge:

a. The incoming administration should make the immediate policy decisions now lacking for the implementation of the December 6 plan. Some of the principle decisions of this nature are:

(1) Whether or not U.S. air bases can be used for supply and resupply, and for D-day minus 1 air strikes, and subsequent air support;

(2) Whether the staging of the "covert" Cuban strike force now principally located in Guatemala can at some point be transferred to the United States. It should be noted that this decision could be forced upon us very rapidly either by further disclosures or by events in Guatemala;

(3) What kind of specific action and when will it be taken to discuss with and discover the attitudes of selected American countries regarding support for our activities;

(4) How and when we will recognize a provisional government and whether this government will have to either have leaders within Cuba or occupy a specific piece of real estate therein. Implicit in this decision is the very difficult problem of the makeup of such a government in a form acceptable to us without directly dictating who shall be in it, and the techniques of bring it into action as a government;

(5) How far the decisions finally taken on recognition will permit more overt support to the strike force. Implicit in this is possibly a mutual assistance pact with the provisional government and the extent to which considerations of world opinion, international law, etc., will affect the extent of our support.

b. In the absence of these decisions, or at least most of them, there is a grave danger that the December 6 plan (updated) may have to be abandoned as an effective means of overthrowing Castro without more overt support, and that the only practical course of action for the physical overthrow of Castro will be either: (1) open U.S. war with Cuba, or (2) a seven-month overt training by the U.S. on United States soil of a Cuban-Latin American invasion force which will be planned to strike with at least overt U.S. logistical support.

It is conceivable but not probable that other non-U.S. bases in some acceptable Latin American countries could be used for this training, but obviously this will require a radically different Latin American political climate than now exists or which is now foreseen.

In our discussions we weighed without coming to a conclusion the advantages of rapid, effective action by direct war in terms of getting matters over with without a long buildup of world opinion vs. the inevitability of such a buildup under any seven-month program.

240. Memorandum from Ambassador Willauer to Rusk,
January 27¹

January 27, 1961

SUBJECT

Meeting of Task Force on Cuban Case

1. I chaired a meeting this morning attended by Mr. W.P. Bundy of Defense, Mr. Tracy Barnes of CIA, and General Gray and two other officers from the Joint Chiefs.

2. I fully briefed Mr. Bundy on the political problems as we now see them and their interrelationship with the operational problems.

3. Mr. Bundy advised that there is a meeting at the White House on the Cuban matter scheduled for 10 a.m. tomorrow. As of possible usefulness on this meeting, we prepared our task group's recommendation for Presidential orders or determinations now needed. They are as follows:

A. Formally reconstitute a special group, pursuant to NSC 5412. (Such a group has in the past consisted of appropriate senior officers of the Departments of State and Defense, the Director of Central Intelligence, and the President's Special Assistant for National Security Affairs.) Charge this group with urgent responsibility in the Cuban situation, and specifically to set up a Task Force to:

(1) Prepare plans on a national basis to get an acceptable new Cuban Government, including plans for use of US forces as necessary. Continue and expand existing activity under 5412 direction, and prepare fall-back plans to preserve existing assets. (An informal Task Force chaired by Ambassador Willauer has already done much preliminary work.)

(2) Prepare plans for accompanying political action. (Much has been done on this already.)

(3) Consider the degree to which action against the present Dominican Government can and should be combined with action in the Cuban situation.

B. Appoint a high-level Presidential emissary to explore at once the degree of support that can be obtained from other Latin American governments so that they might, in or out of OAS, support action to remove Castro, or at least reject any attempt to condemn such action. This emissary to report within one month, via the Secretary of State, to the Special Group.

¹ Recommendations from meeting on the Task Force on Cuba. Top Secret. 2 pp. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, Cuba Program, Jan 21, 1961.

C. Initiate action for an early Presidential speech, to prepare the way for Latin American support of necessary action, specifically by stating firm US opposition to aggressive dictatorships in Latin America, whether of the Right or Left; and most particularly when they are acting for, or in concert with, the International Communist Conspiracy, as is the case with both Castro and Trujillo.

241. Memorandum for the record, January 30¹

January 30, 1961

SUBJECT

[less than 1 line not declassified] PM Briefing

1. At 4:30 today, in the WH/4 war room, Colonel Hawkins and members of the [less than 1 line not declassified] PM Section gave a detailed briefing to the DDCI, Admiral Wright, General Bull, and General Barnes. This briefing was in preparation for the 31 January briefing of designees of the Chairman of the JCS, A/DDP/A and C/WH/4 were present.

2. For a ninety-minute period the senior Agency officials were given a description of the [less than 1 line not declassified] strike force, the tactical plan for its use, and intelligence on the target. It was emphasized that the proposed strike could be conducted with no overt U.S. military support other than the provision of one LSD, and that the force once committed would not have to be evacuated in the event of inability to hold the initial objective area as it could, if required, disperse and continue to survive. Concurrently it was emphasized that our estimate of the likelihood of success was very high in terms of staying in the initial objective area long enough and in sufficient control to permit the introduction of a "Provisional Government" and provide a rationale for the subsequent employment of overt military force, if desired.

3. The senior Agency officials critiqued the plan at some length. Several specific suggestions for improvement were made and will be reflected both in the plan itself and in the presentation of that plan to the JCS representatives. There was general agreement that the time schedule involved requires most prompt policy approval of the operation if it is to be undertaken as planned.

¹ Briefing on strike force in Cuba, tactical plan for its use, and intelligence on the target. Secret. 1 p. CIA Files: Job 85-0664R, Box 3, Vol 10, Chpts 5 & 6.

R.D. Drain
C/WH/4/P&P

February 1961

242. Memorandum from Chester L. Cooper to the US.
Intelligence Board, February 11¹

February 11, 1961

SUBJECT

Probable International Reactions to Certain Possible US Courses of Action
Against the Castro Regime

The attached Memorandum for the Director is forwarded for your information.

Chester L. Cooper
Deputy Assistant Director
National Estimates

Attachment

MEMORANDUM FOR THE DIRECTOR

SUBJECT

Probable International Reactions to Certain Possible US Courses of Action against the Castro Regime

Introduction

1. The purpose of this memorandum is to assess the principal international reactions to various types of action the US might take to bring down the Castro government in Cuba—especially the nature and magnitude of possible Bloc countermoves and the possibility of serious adverse reactions on the part of Latin American countries or others in the Free World. The possible actions here considered are: (a) provision of active support, of varying degrees of magnitude and overtness, to an attempt by Cuban opposition elements, internal or in exile, to overthrow Castro; (b) military invasion of Cuba with US forces; or (c) establishment of a naval blockade of Cuba in international waters.

¹ Transmits a memorandum from Abbot Smith to Allan Dulles on probable international reactions to certain U.S. courses of action against the Castro regime. Top Secret. 12 pp. CIA, DCI (McCone) Files: Job 80–B01285A, General Maxwell Taylor Committee on Cuba, 28 Jan–21 May 1961.

2. We must emphasize that actual international reactions might be greatly influenced by circumstances which cannot be accurately foreseen—by the precise nature of the US action; by the manner, speed, and success with which it was carried out; by the extent to which drastic US action might appear to be justified by possible new Cuban provocations; or by possible changes in Cuban relations with other Latin American countries. However, we believe that some valid generalizations can be made on the basis of the situation as it has developed so far and of the nature of the possible US actions considered.

Sino-Soviet Bloc Reactions

3. Bloc leaders from the start have recognized the value of a revolutionary, pro-Communist Cuba as a source of irritation and embarrassment to the US, as an example for revolutionary movements elsewhere in the hemisphere, and as a center for Communist as well as Cuban agitation and propaganda throughout Latin America. The Bloc has provided Castro with extensive political, economic, and military support.

4. Moreover, the Cuban example has assured increasing prominence in Communist assessments of the world situation. Cuba is being depicted as a prime example of the thesis that colonial regimes are inevitably toppling under the impact of revolutionary nationalism, and that Bloc strength can prevent the imperialists from intervening to reverse this process. In the Bloc's view the Castro regime is farther along toward the next stage—the advent of Communist power—than any other Free World country. While more recent Soviet pronouncements have tended to minimize specific military commitments to Cuba as well as Khrushchev's implied threat of last summer that Cuba was under the protection of Soviet missiles, the Soviets have if anything reinforced their political alignment with the Castro regime.

5. For these reasons, the Bloc would regard Castro's downfall as a substantial political defeat and would respond vigorously to any major US move—overt or covert and whether or not supported by others—to bring it about. Its efforts would probably be directed primarily at heading off the American threat to Cuba by political means, utilizing in the process all opportunities to arouse sympathy for Cuba as a victim of colonialist aggression, and to depict the US action as a threat to the peace. To this end, it would probably stimulate and support mass demonstrations against the US in various countries of Latin America and elsewhere. It would probably demand action by the UN to censure the US and preserve Castro, most likely through strong resolutions calling on the US to desist but possibly also through establishment of some sort of UN presence in Cuba. The USSR would firmly oppose any US move to establish a blockade and would use all diplomatic and legal means at its disposal to deny it international acceptance.

6. In the event of a prolonged military struggle between Castro and US-backed opposition forces, the Bloc would almost certainly seek to continue or even to increase its military aid to the Castro regime. However, we believe that the Bloc would avoid a direct military confrontation with US forces. The Communist leaders almost certainly recognize that they have little or no capability to counter US military power in the Cuban area and that US sensitivity regarding Cuba is very great. Certainly they would not wish to risk general war over this issue. Although the Soviets would probably seek to test a US blockade, for example, they would almost certainly do so with a merchant vessel, perhaps announcing that it was loaded with foodstuffs and other consumer requirements, rather than with a warship.

7. Even if the US succeeded in bringing Castro down, Bloc leaders probably believe that they could offset this defeat to some extent by depicting Castro as a martyr to American imperialism, which took advantage of Cuba's small size and closeness to the US. The Bloc leaders would probably also feel themselves impelled to increase pressures elsewhere in order to restore the image of Communist advance. A decision about what to do would depend on many factors, such as the local circumstances at whatever spot was under consideration and their appraisal of the new political situation created by the US action, including any reassessment of US willingness to resist Bloc moves elsewhere.

8. Especially if the US action were obvious or acknowledged, Khrushchev would be under pressure especially from Communist China to give up his present conciliatory line and to shift to a more militant policy. The atmosphere would make it difficult, for a time at least, to hold any US-Soviet discussions looking toward an improvement of relations.

Latin American Reactions

9. Castro's stature in Latin America has markedly declined over the last year, although he still commands a good deal of sympathy among lower income groups of the area. His dictatorial methods, his political meddling in other countries, and his close collaboration with world communism have progressively alienated many who initially felt that Castro was bringing a long needed social revolution to Cuba. Official opinion, at least privately, has generally crystallized against Castro, and the earlier tendency of many secretly to applaud his Yankee-baiting has subsided. The majority of Latin American governments apparently felt that the US economic embargo was justified and virtually all have at least privately sympathized with the US decision to break diplomatic relations. Peru and five lesser countries—among them the authoritarian regimes—have also broken or suspended diplomatic ties with Cuba, and four others have withdrawn their ambassadors from Havana.

10. Most Latin American leaders still are reluctant to take a public stand against Castro for fear of stirring up the vociferous and sometimes strategically placed minority of pro-Communists and other leftists who look to Castro as a symbol of their own revolutionary aspirations. Moreover, these leaders themselves continue to be influenced by traditional fears of US domination of the hemisphere. One or two Latin American governments (e.g., Ecuador and perhaps Mexico) are still inclined to work for a negotiated settlement between the US and Castro. The stand of Brazil's new president is uncertain. Thus, we see little likelihood as matters now stand that the OAS can be induced to participate in or officially sanction anti-Castro measures of the drastic nature considered in this memorandum. However, many Latin American leaders probably expect that the US by itself will sooner or later feel compelled to take increasingly strong measures against Castro. Indeed, some sectors of Latin American opinion already criticize the US for not dealing sufficiently forcefully with the Cuban regime.

11. Despite the likelihood of outcries from the far left, most Latin American governments would at least privately approve of unobtrusive US support for an opposition move against Castro which they believed likely to win broad popular support in Cuba. Perhaps a few governments such as those in Venezuela and Colombia would be more inclined to approve if they had been consulted by the US in advance. Some, indeed, would probably be willing to provide covert assistance of their own for such a move, particularly if they were assured that the US would participate in efforts to overthrow the Trujillo dictatorship in the Dominican Republic. This last issue is critical to Venezuelan President Betancourt, whose moderate leftist government is widely respected in the hemisphere. If Betancourt supported new US moves against Castro in return for US commitments regarding Trujillo, a number of other Latin American governments probably would fall in line.

12. Willingness to go along would be greatly weakened if the US role were such as to suggest that the US was imposing a new regime rather than assisting the Cubans themselves to settle their own destinies. Direct participation of US combat forces in overthrowing Castro within Cuba itself would cause a bitter reaction throughout the hemisphere, reflected in strong opposition in the OAS and UN. These reactions would be especially deep and lasting if it appeared that the US was attempting to install another reactionary Batista-type regime in Cuba; in the long run, the reactions would be somewhat mitigated if the new regime appeared clearly to be supported by a representative of the Cuban people.

13. The Latin American reaction would also be adverse if the US established a blockade of Cuba in international waters, though it would probably be less intense than in the case of US combat operations within Cuba. At least in the absence of new and persuasive Cuban provocations, most Latin American countries would condemn a blockade unless it were in support of an armed insurrection within Cuba of which they otherwise approved.

Reactions Elsewhere in the Free World

14. The other Free World nations have for the most part not been deeply involved with the Cuban issue. The Western Europeans have preferred to let the US handle Cuba as it sees fit, and the Afro-Asians have taken little note of Cuba, which is far from their sphere of interest. However, drastic US actions (and Soviet counteractions) might create strong opposition by stimulating fears of general war and by creating (especially for the Afro-Asians) an impression of rampant colonialism.

15. The reaction would be minimal in the case of unobtrusive US support for an opposition attempt against Castro. This might produce a good deal of cynicism throughout the world about the US role, but if quickly successful little other lasting reaction. However, an operation in which US participation was marked, or one which resulted in prolonged and inconclusive fighting, would probably generate widespread pressure for moves to internationalize and control the situation.

16. Actual US military intervention in Cuba would almost certainly evoke widespread and vehement political opposition, even if carried out so rapidly as to present the world with a fait accompli. It would remind many people of the Soviet intervention in Hungary. It would provoke a particularly unfavorable response among the Afro-Asian nations, who are, like the Latin Americans, extremely sensitive to what they consider great power disregard for the rights of smaller nations, particularly in colonial or former colonial areas. In some respects the US might be placed in a situation comparable to that of the British and French at the time of Suez, with even many of our NATO allies likely to take the position the US did at that time.

17. Although US imposition of a naval blockade in international waters would probably cause somewhat less international furor than an overt US military invasion of Cuba, there would be widespread receptivity, particularly in the Afro-Asian world, to the likely Castro argument that the US was trying to starve the Cuban people into submission. Since most trade with Cuba is carried on by ships of other nations, moreover, a blockade would pose the question of international acceptance in a particularly acute form. Even among these nations otherwise not particularly sympathetic to Castro, there would probably be widespread resentment at having their own ships halted and denial of the US right to do so. Although we would not expect military counteraction, even by the Bloc, there would be great pressure on the US, diplomatic and legal, to abandon the blockade.

FOR THE BOARD OF NATIONAL ESTIMATES

Abbot Smith
Acting Chairman

243. Memorandum from Thomas C. Mann to Rusk, February 16¹

February 16, 1961

SUBJECT

Proposed Transfer of Cuban Trainees from Panama Canal Zone to the United States

Discussion:

Central Intelligence Agency has requested the Department's clearance of the proposed transfer on Sunday, February 19, of 32 Cuban trainees plus approximately 18 Agency training personnel from a training site in the Canal Zone to a surplus military property, the Bell Chase Naval Ammunition Depot, in Louisiana. Mr. Berle and I feel that you should be aware of and make the decision in this matter.

The 32 Cubans are the remainder of a group, originally numbering approximately 50, being trained in radio and demolition techniques. CIA states that their transfer away from the Canal Zone has become necessary and that within a 60-day period following their arrival in this country it is contemplated that all would have completed their training and been re-exported, in staggered groups, to carry out missions assigned them.

For purposes of background and perspective, it should be noted in this context that some 50 Cubans are already being trained in landing-craft operation at Vieques, and 25 more are being given tank training at Fort Knox.

¹ Proposed transfer of Cuban trainees from Panama Canal Zone to the United States. Secret. 1 p. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, Cuba Program, Jan 21, 1961—.

RECOMMENDATION:

That you authorize me to inform CIA that the Department interposes no objection to the proposed transfer of personnel from the Canal Zone to the contemplated training site in the United States.

Approve DR

Disapprove _____

CONCURRENCE:

S—Mr. Berle

March 1961

244. Memorandum from Barnes to the Deputy Director (Plans), March 1¹

March 1, 1961

SUBJECT

Project [less than 1 line not declassified]

1. A number of recent events have brought into focus what we need to do vis-à-vis [less than 1 line not declassified] in the immediate future. These events are:

- a. Jake Esterline's talk with Senator Smathers.
- b. A comment by Paul Nitze to me on 23 February to the effect that as far as he was concerned, we should go ahead and do it.
- c. The diversionary effect of recent flurries in the [less than 1 line not declassified].
- d. The continuation of looseness as far as decision is concerned in the State Department.

2. In view of the above and in view of the passage of valuable time, I am convinced that we have got to make a very strong stand as to what we would like to have happen sometime next week. At that point the JCS visiting committee report will be in, which I understand is reasonably favorable though we may have to negotiate on one or two points: Berle will be back and I can only guess from the reports out of Brazil that his trip will tend to support Tom Mann; and we will have what I hope will be the benefits of the Alejos visit from Guatemala. He, as you know, reaches Washington on 2 March.

3. In view of the political difficulties involved in a favorable decision and in view of Tom Mann's continued opposition and apparent growing strength with the White House (see Smathers), there is no doubt in my mind that our only chance is to be very firm in our position and be very strong in urging the need for the proposed action. This means, as I see it, persuading the Boss that this must be done. I recognize the natural reluctance towards pushing for a policy conclusion but merely pushing does not mean that we are trying to assume the policy role but only that we are willing to stand up and be counted on what we consider the proper decision.

¹ Courses to take in immediate future in the Cuba project. Secret. 3 pp. CIA, DDO, DDP Files: Job 67-01083R, Box 1, C.T. Barnes—Chrono, Jan-Jul 1961.

4. In addition to the importance of being firm ourselves, I think that we should consider making the best possible use of potential supporters like Senator Smathers. What I have in mind here is either the Boss or you should get in touch personally with Smathers, discuss the whole problem on a personal basis, be candid about the difficulty of the decision that must be made, tell him quite frankly that we propose to push hard for approval and ask his advice as to what he could suggest to get the desired result. In the first place, there is no better way to obtain an ally than to ask him a favor. In the second place, Smathers is clearly strong in the White House. In the third place, Smathers can help us enormously on the Hill if we need some allies in the future should something go wrong.

5. In addition to the above, I think that before making the final pitch to the Summit, you should have a very frank talk with Mac Bundy, explaining not only the need for decision but laying it on hard as to why we feel a favorable decision for the Project is the best solution.

6. I would also hope that you would have an informal but very candid talk with Lemnitzer. This would, of course, depend to some extent on negotiating the points mentioned above which may come out of the JCS visiting committee report. I have no doubt, as I have already said, that we can do this. Strong support from Lemnitzer unquestionably will materially improve our prospects.

7. I recognize that one aspect of this whole problem is still unresolved, i.e., the Cuban Provisional Government. At the moment, I gather that this may not be going too well. Possibly a blow-up of this aspect would require us to change our approach. I am optimistic, however, that some sort of an acceptable result can be fashioned and, in the meantime, it should not affect our plans for trying to get approval.

8. Inherent in the foregoing is a recognition also that approval does not have to be exclusively to the original tactical plan. I still feel that it is a very good one but changes in facts, such as repositioning of the Cuban militia, can require variations. What I am really aiming at is approval for the best possible use of the Cubans now in Guatemala. This includes, of course, as a fall-back position, an effort to have the whole operation taken over by Ydigoras (with our "unofficial" help, of course) in case we receive an adamant refusal to continue as presently planned. I feel very strongly that dissolution, even if it is feasible, is not an acceptable solution. You know the reasons as well as I, so I will not go into them.

C. Tracy Barnes

245. Notes of a Special Group meeting, March 2¹

March 2, 1961

1. The DCI gave a summary of operations during the past week. He also told the Group that Alejos is in Washington with a letter from President Ydigoras addressed to President Kennedy, and that he is attempting through his brother, the Guatemalan Ambassador, to obtain an appointment with Mr. Kennedy. Mr. Dulles said that he understood the letter took a strong position on the necessity of early action vis-à-vis Cuba, but—in answer to a question—assured the Group that we had neither written nor inspired the letter.

2. Mr. Dulles also said that he thought we should discuss soon with the Special Group actions to be taken with respect to employment of the forces now in training in Guatemala.

¹ Guatemala involvement in Cuba project. Secret. 1 p. CIA, DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 82–00679R, Box 3, Special Group Mtgs—Cuba.

246. Notes of a Special Group meeting, March 8¹

March 8, 1961

1. Mr. Dulles noted that a meeting is scheduled for Saturday morning to discuss broad policy aspects of this operation with Mr. Bundy's associates. He told the Group, however, about operational developments during the past week, including the landing of the airplane in Jamaica and the arrival of its nine-man crew in Miami. Mr. Dulles also touched on the visit to the White House of the Guatemalan emissary, and the reported threat that Guatemala would proceed with its own anti-Castro activity if the U.S. did not move. He also reported some progress in developing a cohesive political organization among the Cuban exiles.

¹ Operational developments during the past week on the Cuba project. Secret 1 p. CIA, DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 82–00679R, Box 3, Special Group Mtgs—Cuba.

247. Memorandum from Barnes to Chief, WH-4, March 10¹

March 10, 1961

SUBJECT

DCI's [less than 1 line not declassified] Check List

I am attaching two copies of a check list prepared by the DCI covering points which he feels should be given consideration. You will note that they are not matters calling for immediate action but I think that it would be useful early next week (subject to Saturday's decision) to discuss our reactions. You will remember that General Cabell has shown an interest in pursuing Point II and will probably call a meeting on it sometime next week (again, subject to Saturday's decision).

C. Tracy BarnesAttachment

Although there is no question that we must show flexibility and willingness to examine any reasonable suggestions, I believe that we MUST at the same time transmit the following basic premises at some point. How and in just what language is obviously a matter of tactics and depends on the way the session is progressing.

1. Flexibility must be weighed against the past and also against an important present fact of life. As far as the past is concerned, we have varied the plan considerably and have also carefully examined a number of possibilities which were discarded as being inadequate (e.g. series of small landings, single night landing, taking of Isle of Pines, trying to capture airfield in Zapata, etc.) Consequently, there has been history of change and attempts at adjustment.

The applicable present circumstance is the Cuban Strike Force. The Cubans cannot be ordered to do anything. True they do not know the present plan but they do know their weapons, including planes and tanks, and they do know that a landing in full force is planned. Present plans No. 1 and No. 5 are within the scope of the action for which they volunteered. Anything else should be cleared with their leaders and might not be accepted, but surely should not be accepted until cleared.

¹ Transmits a checklist prepared by DCI on the Cuba project. Secret. 5 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files; Job 67-01083R, Box 1, C.T. Barnes—Chrono, Jan-Jul 1961.

2. The long process of analysis has brought forward two plans. These have been meticulously cleared with DOD. We are prepared to negotiate in connection with them any contingencies or conditions, laid down by the DOD. These plans are not necessarily the last word but they have been determined to have a good chance, to be effective and there should be some reasonable alternative put forward, not just a haphazard suggestion, to require full scale planning of something new. (This assumes that we have knocked down the Mann “slow build-up” scheme.)

3. There appear to be misconceptions about present plans:

a. Air activity is limited. Straffing of specific targets will be involved, not indiscriminate bombing and two aircraft is probably the most that will be seen at any one time. Moreover, there will probably never be more than four over the whole of Cuba at any one time.

b. It is NOT a U.S. operation. Surely there are and will be allegations and evidence of U.S. support. The operation, however, is by Cuban volunteer patriots, operating entirely from non-U.S. bases. These Cubans cannot be ordered to do anything (could be if a U.S. operation). They will be patriotically fighting to install a Cuban-selected provisional government. The only foreign government with any jurisdiction over them is the Guatemalan government and it cannot order them to invade, it can only attempt to impose rules or sanctions within Guatemala. The U.S. need not feel sorry for the governments of Guatemala and Nicaragua, they know what they are doing and the Ydigoras letter plus the Alejos trip do not indicate any hesitancy on the parts of the Guats. All equipment being used is easily purchasable and is in many countries already. Deniability, though tenuous, will exist. Moreover, any other form of action will be laid at the U.S. door and in the case of the Mann “slow build-up” approach will involve much more U.S. participation.

4. Despite foregoing, greater flexibility would be possible if it were not for the unavoidable time urgency. Cannot change rainy season, moon phase, post factors bearing on morale or fact that time generally running against us.

5. Nothing succeeds so much as success. Consequently, the plan most likely to succeed has many advantages in the long run over one which modifies this chance in order to gain temporary political benefits. Such temporary benefits would be of little value against the loss of the ultimate goal or even at the expense of unduly extending the conflict which will tend to force U.S. participation and offer opposition forces and efforts an opportunity to organize and accentuate their effect.

In conclusion, I believe that we must not undersell what we have carefully prepared and on which a favorable DOD reaction has been obtained after detailed review. It is easy for State to throw all sorts of wild or unanalyzed possibilities into the hopped on the theory that ANYTHING might conceivably work and the burden of proving impossibility is on us. In view of time and history, we should ask to be let out rather than be forced to review any new plan which doesn't on its face contain REAL possibilities and REAL advantages. It must be remembered that our two plans have been tested and passed as feasible by the authorities in government having the proper jurisdiction.

248. Memorandum prepared by Barnes, March 16¹

March 16, 1961

Although I fully agree with the conclusion which we unanimously reached after the 15 March meeting, i.e. that we would be happy to pursue either the original "E" Plan or the last created "Z" plan, I have decided after cogitation that I prefer the latter. In addition to the reasons listed in Jack Hawkins' presentation, I would add the following as being of importance.

1. An unopposed landing has tremendous benefits particularly for unblooded troops and even more so for unblooded Latin troops. An initial setback or indeed serious initial difficulties might be just enough to break an inexperienced outfit of this type even though well trained. On the other hand, the morale uplift from getting their feet firmly set on Cuban soil and from establishing a beach head without serious initial problems or losses could make real tigers out of them.

2. Another enormous advantage is the simplicity of defense. The few and narrow access routes should be easily maintained against highly superior troops almost indefinitely. This might not be so if the opposition had air, but it would be hoped that any opposing air would be eliminated reasonably soon.

3. Granting that break-out will not be easy, there is conversely the benefit of not having to rush due to the easy defensibility mentioned above. Consequently, there should be complete freedom of choice with regard to timing and if the beach head were to be maintained for sometime, there is the possible advantage of recognition of a provisional government with subsequent U.S. matériel support. Such recognition, however, is not a requirement of the plan.

¹ Reasons to pursue the "Z" plan versus the original "E" plan. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 67-01083R, Box 1, C.T. Barnes—Chrono, Jan-Jul 1961.

4. The advantage of having a usable air strip is enormous. Even though a limited number of aircraft should be based on it (say, two) still the time over target for planes as based would be so long as to permit extensive ranging over any part or parts of the island on each mission. Such air support will, in my opinion, do more than anything to bring out opposition elements wherever they may exist.

5. Control of the air plus tanks plus the other heavy firepower held by the strike force should be a combination that would make break-out comparatively simple.

In addition to the foregoing, sea supply should be easy to manage.

In addition to the above points, it would be extremely helpful, in my opinion, if we could cover the following points in some way:

1. Air cover for the strike force shipping as it approaches Cuba. Granted that it is unlikely that the Cubans would attack such shipping in international waters prior to their having taken any affirmative act themselves, still air cover could be very comforting. Possibly the USAF or the U.S. Navy would be willing to do this.

2. U.S. air fields should be selected and ready to receive aircraft post-strike in order to avoid, insofar as possible, return of aircraft to Latin America. The security problem here is significant particularly as support at a later date for allegations against the U.S. Nevertheless if, as suggested by the State Department, this is acceptable politically, we should certainly take advantage of it.

3. The U.S. should be poised and ready to fly in massive supplies as soon as recognition of a provisional government occurs, provided of course that this has received political clearance. Again, however, I understand that the State Department has no objection to such support under such circumstances.

4. Any reserve Cuban force, even though slightly trained, should be included in our plan for use as the circumstances may require, i.e., either to supplement the forces in the beach-head or to support possible uprisings elsewhere on the Island or, conceivably, as a surprise element to coordinate with a break-out.

5. A few small teams will presumably be held in reserve in order to be available for infiltration at appropriate points in support of internal opposition and to provide additional communication facilities.

C. Tracy Barnes

249. Memorandum from Barnes to Chief, WH-4, March 21¹

March 21, 1961

SUBJECT

[less than 1 line not declassified] Points Raised by the DCI

The following is the checklist of points raised by the DCI. You will remember that I mentioned these to you after they were given to me orally on 20 March. The DCI recognizes that many of these points are already being considered and did not mention them for any purpose other than to bring to your attention a number of points which occurred to him.

1. With regard to Puerto Cabezas, have we planned all possible steps with regard to security. This, of course, means not only the pattern of activity previously discussed but the need to place in the town some CI types to sound out local gossip, etc. I would hope that some sort of report on exactly what can be done with regard to both of these can be made to DD/P by the evening of 23 March or the morning of 24 March.

2. A number of points with regard to details of the initial portions of the tactical plan. Presumably, these will all be included at the time that DD/P receives a briefing on the plan as finally worked out but, for what it is worth, the points specifically mentioned were:

a. Command authority both over the entire convoy while in transit and at time of arrival and debarkation, plus command of each ship and craft. This should include a specific indication of the nationalities of the two or three top officers in each case, plus the number of contract Americans and the number of Staff personnel. As to the last, their duties throughout should be carefully detailed, and steps should be taken to "sheep dip" all such Staff personnel that might be used in order that they will be ready for use if necessary.

b. Has there been any further consideration of possible AA both on shipboard and on shore. In this connection it is felt that the Cuban pilots will be timid so that evidence of some kind of AA is more important than actual effectiveness. This point may have been resolved in a previous discussion but it is sufficiently important to justify some further consideration.

c. What overt steps, if any, might be suggested which could have a sensible explanation and yet which would act as a deterrent to Soviet action. For example, assume that the State Department were to declare the present Cuban Government to be outside the Inter-American structure because it is Communist dominated and that it intended to prevent this government from exporting revolution to the rest of the Hemisphere. It is recognized that as a practical matter little can be done effectively to prevent such action but quite aside from this, the placing of substantial elements of the U.S. fleet in the Caribbean could have a deterring effect in other ways. It could include a large carrier, plus air patrols, plus perhaps a few destroyers which seems to me might be quite healthy. Of course maneuvers is another obvious excuse but I am in no position to know whether it is a useful one. Another excuse would be to state that the shipment of further arms by the Soviets to Cuba would be considered unacceptable by the U.S. and the equivalent of formulating Hemisphere disruption. On this theory, it would seem to me that ships, plus possibly air cover, could be put on the Atlantic side of Cuba on the theory that they were planning to intercept any destroyers or other ships carrying cargo such as aircraft to Cuba. There are probably other and better possibilities.

¹ Checklist of points raised by DCI on Cuba project. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 67-01083R, Box 1, C.T. Barnes—Chrono, Jan-Jul 1961.

3. Finally, there are a few intelligence requirements which should be written up fairly soon. The first is the evidence now in hand of efforts by Castro to export revolution to the Hemisphere. In this connection, special efforts should be made to continue to collect evidence on this point. The second is what evidence exists as to shipment of armament to Cuba. This has recently been drawn together but should be kept current.

4. Evidence regarding the status of the training of Cubans by the Czechs. I am placing this requirement separately on [illegible in the original] through [less than 1 line not declassified] who has responsibility for the Czech [illegible in the original].

C. Tracy Barnes

250. Information report No. TDCS-3/469,582, March 27¹

March 27, 1961

COUNTRY

Cuba

SUBJECT

Government Action Against Opposition Forces in the Escambray Mountains

¹ Status report on opposition groups in Escambray region of Las Villas province. Secret. 2 pp. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, Cuba, Jan 1961—.

DATE OF INFO

January-1 March 1961

PLACE & DATE ACQ.

Cuba (24 March 1961)

SOURCE

Leader of an Opposition Group in Escambray Mountains (F)

1. Of the four or five opposition groups that had been fighting in the Escambray region of Las Villas province, only the one commanded by Evelio Duque is believed to be there still. Duque's main force is believed to have been divided into small bands, which are without communication with one another and are operating independently.

2. In late January the Castro government concentrated militiamen in the Escambray, mainly near Manicaragua, and began large-scale offensive operations. Armed with Czech submachine guns and R-2 (sic) rifles, Belgian FAL rifles, mortars, bazookas and artillery pieces, the militia units encircled isolated groups of opposition forces. The Cuban army used helicopters to pinpoint concentrations of opposition units, then launched artillery barrages, which were followed by an assault by specially-trained militia riflemen.

3. Although neither well trained nor greatly disposed to fight, the militiamen were usually effective because they greatly outnumbered the opposition. The majority of the militia units were under the command of communist officers of the rebel army. Although the government faced the constant threat of defection by the militia, mainly as a result of the discontent over the lack of food, this was minimized by the immediate arrest or transfer of malcontents.

4. The opposition forces have suffered setbacks because of a lack of supplies rather than because of the effectiveness of the attack by the government forces. Lacking both arms and food the opposition forces were constantly on the defensive and were forced to move from place to place at a moment's notice. Attempts to supply the opposition forces by air were ineffective, and even the wholehearted support from residents of the Escambray area was not enough. In addition to the lack of food and arms the opposition forces were handicapped by a lack of communications among the different groups.

5. Field dissem: CINCLANT.

End of message

April 1961

251. Telegram 3811 to the CIA from Agency personnel in Nicaragua, April 16¹

April 16, 1961

EMERG [less than 1 line not declassified]

[less than 1 line not declassified]

[less than 1 line not declassified]

[less than 1 line not declassified]

1. 10 B-265 scheduled for strategic targets D-Day per ref [illegible in the original] 4 of these have secondary mission to provide ground support 1100Z to 1200Z. Eleventh A/C has time over beach of 1200Z and can loiter until 1430 hours. Two A/C assigned Napalm (NDR4) mission will make quick turn around and with 230 cal bombay tank installation plus reinstalled externals will have capability loiter 3½ hours over beach. Estimated time over beach these two A/C 1315Z. This leaves no air cover over beach 1330Z to 1815Z (4-45 hrs).

2. Request guidance as to priority and which targets to postpone if support priority NBR 1.

End of message

¹ Strategic targets on D-day and timing of missions. Top Secret. 1 p. CIA Files: Job 85-00664R, Box 4, Vol. I.

252. Telegram 4681 from CIA to Balgar, April 17¹

April 17, 1961

Pass Emergency Blagar; Info OPIM Barbara J, Essex, LANT Puerto Cabezas.

¹ Instructions for ships participating in Bay of Pigs operation. Secret. 1 p. CIA, DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 82-00679R, Box 3, Gen Maxwell Taylor, Green Study Group, Vol II.

"1. Have Barbara J if practicable proceed immediately to Blue Beach offload as much as possible 1,000 man pack into LCVP and small boats in time permitting. Retire from area not later than 18070CZ towards point Zulu at best speed.

2. Blagar, Atlantics and Caribe with LCU proceed south of Point Zulu remain minimum 50 miles from Cuban territory.

3. Jet air cover being provided outside 15 mile from Cuban territory.

4. Air drops and strikes tonight and dawn.

5. Request latest situation report on all ships/LCU/LCVP."

End of message

J.D. Esterline, C/WH/4

J. Hawkins, C/WH/4/PM

253. Telegram 4292 to CIA from Agency personnel in Nicaragua, April 18¹

April 18, 1961

Emergency [illegible in the original] cite

[less than 1 line not declassified]

1. Believe all sea furies and T-335 hampering ground and air operations located San Antonio. Strikes early morning darkness 18 April unsuccessful due to low scud and haze and city blackout. Now plan max effort either sunset or predawn on this base using all ordnance available. Request approval.

2. Request approval use contract crews.

End of message

¹ Report of unsuccessful attacks; request for approval later attack and use of contract crews. Top Secret. 1 p. CIA Files: Job 85-00664R, Box 4, Vol I.

254. Telegram 7123 from CIA to Agency personnel in Nicaragua, April 18¹

April 18, 1961

OPIM [1 line not declassified]

RYBAT [1 line not declassified]

FOR [1 line not declassified]

1. Authority now granted for use cargo aircraft to deliver improvised napalm bombs to isolated airstrips. Targets should be in order San Julian AB, Santiago AB, San Antonio AB, Managua, Nueva Gerona AB, caution crews to avoid residential areas.

2. Dept. of the Air Force beach resupply to begin night 19 April thereby relieving your transports. Suggest Wimby begin improvising Napalm Bombs for use night 19 April. Drop time approx 20/0700Z.

3. NBR ACFT used and launch, your discretion.

End of message

S.W. Beerly, AC/DPD

¹ Approval of use of cargo aircraft to deliver napalm bombs and beach resupply schedule. Top Secret. 1 p. CIA Files: Job 85–00664R, Box 4, Vol I.

255. Telegram 4455 from Agency personnel in Nicaragua to CIA, April 19¹

April 19, 1961

CITE [less than 1 line not declassified]

[less than 1 line not declassified]

1. Concur, already under way. Two B–26's schedule out every two hours to work all roads leading into beachhead. C–54 being loaded with 55 gallon drums of napalm. Also to hit beachroads and MSR's (main supply roads) approaching beach.

¹ B–26 bombing schedule. Top Secret. 1 p. CIA Files: Job 85–00664R, Box 4, Vol I.

2. All above crews will be American. Cuban crews nearly broken without at least 12 to 24 hrs off.

3. Above efforts will continue through tomorrow but very concerned re lack of effective Navy air cover. Tonites B-26 mission were met at the 12 mile limit inbound and outbound. Beach repts enemy aircraft made passes on beach while Navy A/C remained at high altitude. If this procedure used in the morning Hqtrs can expect to lose some American crews.

End of message

256. Telegram 7237 from CIA to Agency personnel in Nicaragua, April 19¹

April 19, 1961

Flash. To Air Commander.

1. Positive aggressive Navy air support and cover granted for one hour 11:30Z to 12:30Z 19 April.

2. All enemy forces on approaches leading into Playa Giron Airfield should be attacked.

3. Supply aircraft will also receive escort for this period.

4. Main purpose is hope to catch enemy aircraft in area.

5. Follow on air strikes as indicated in your message tide 879 desired.

6. Please advise plan.

7. Essential make best use opportunity this one hour period.

8. Small boat will be resupplying beach avoid attack.

End message

S.W. Beerli
AC/DPD

¹ Navy air support and cover granted for 1 hour. Top Secret. 1 p. CIA, DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 82-00679R, Box 3, Gen Maxwell Taylor, Green Study Group, Vol II.

257. Telegram 7238 from CIA to Agency personnel in Nicaragua,
April 19¹

April 19, 1961

RYBAT [less than 1 line not declassified] COMMO.

Pass following EMERGENCY to brigade:

1. We can continue to furnish logistic support by air.
2. Cannot furnish jet air cover now.
3. We plan to provide T-33 jet fighter support within estimated two days.
4. If you feel you cannot hold position, let us know now so we can evacuate brigade tonight. Ships moving into position for possible evacuation, we await your decision.

(End of message)

J.D. Esterline
C/WH/4

J. Hawkins
C/WH/4/PM

¹ Message to brigade re U.S. logistic support. Secret. 1 p. CIA/DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 82-00679R, Box 3, Gen Maxwell Taylor, Green Study Group, Vol II.

258. Notes by General Eisenhower of April 22 meeting with President Kennedy¹

April 22, 1961

NOTES BY GENERAL EISENHOWER IN LUNCHEON MEETING, APRIL 22, 1961, WITH PRESIDENT KENNEDY AT CAMP DAVID

(I talked with Allen Dulles the previous day, at the President's suggestion.)

Mr. Kennedy met me when I landed from the helicopter at Camp David. We went to the terrace at Aspen Cottage to talk. He began by outlining the Cuban situation, including a description of the planning, the objectives and the anticipated results. This outline agreed exactly with that given me by Allen Dulles yesterday morning.

He explained in detail where things began to go awry and stated that the whole operation had become a complete failure. Apparently some men are still hiding in the "bosque" and possibly have made their way to the mountains. Apparently about 400 prisoners were taken.

The chief apparent causes of failure were gaps in our intelligence, plus what may have been some errors in ship loading, timing, and tactics.

It appears that too much specialized equipment was carried in a single ship and, when this ship was damaged, the troops on the beach were left fairly helpless. I inquired whether or not the troops had had the equipment immediately with them (in platoons and companies) to establish effective road blocks on the three avenues of entry into the swamp area. He was under the impression that this equipment was properly distributed and the troops well trained in its use. Therefore the reason for the quick penetration of the swamp into the vulnerable beachhead was unknown.

The press has mentioned a great deal about MIGs. The President is not certain, and neither was Allen Dulles, that these were MIGs. They could easily have been T-33s, equipped with rockets and guns; but, at least, they shot down a number of our airplanes and apparently operated effectively against our troops in the beachhead.

He is having General Taylor come to Washington to analyze all phases of the operation, including all of the planning and the methods so as to see whether there are lessons to be learned. He has the feeling that we can be faced with some similar situation over the next decade and thinks we should do our best to be prepared to meet it. (He did not say that this report would be made public—but I did get the impression that it would.)

¹ Failure of Bay of Pigs operation. Secret. 8 pp. Eisenhower Library, Post-Presidential Papers, 1961-69, Augusta-Walter Reed Series, Cuba (2), Box 1.

The next thing that he wanted to talk about were the direction and prospects for future action. I was unable to give him any detailed suggestions, but did say that I would support anything that had as its objective the prevention of Communist entry and solidification of bases in the Western hemisphere.

He believes that the two great powers have now neutralized each other in atomic weapons and inventories; but that in numbers of troops, and our exterior communications as opposed to the interior communications of the Communists, we are relatively weak. He did not seem to think that our great seapower counteracted this situation completely.

The only real suggestion I could give him regarding the Western Hemisphere was to do his very best to solidify the OAS against Communism, including a readiness to support, at least morally and politically, any necessary action to expel Communist penetration. I said that this was something that had to be worked on all the time. I told him, also, that I believed the American people would never approve direct military intervention, by their own forces, except under provocations against us so clear and so serious that everybody would understand the need for the move.

The President did not ask me for any specific advice. I contented myself with merely asking a few questions about the tactical action, including the timing of the support that I understood the Navy Air had given to the landings. He said that in the first instance they were so anxious to keep the United States hand concealed that they accorded no such support, and when they finally did get word of its need it was too late. This situation was complicated by the fact that all communications went out. I understood that the communication equipment was on the ship that sank, but this is hard to believe because each unit carries some light communication equipment, including the ability to send radiograms to a distance of some fifty to a hundred miles.

There are certainly factors, now unknown, that will finally come to light under searching scrutiny. The purpose of this scrutiny is not to find any scapegoat, because the President does seem to take full responsibility for his own decision, but rather to find and apply lessons for possible future action.

The President brought up Laos. He outlined the situation and said that the British were very reluctant to participate in any military intervention and of course the French positively refused to do so. He thinks that both the British and the French would like to see Souvanna Phouma brought back to power as the only man who could possibly maintain and sustain a neutral position in Laos. (As I remember, our own general opinion, which we had formed before January 20th, was that Souvanna Phouma had gone so far toward the Soviets that he could scarcely extract himself from their clutches.)

The President was quite sure that there was no possibility of saving Laos by unilateral military action. Consequently he looked forward to a ceasefire, which is promised for this coming Monday, the 24th. He remarked that he was not so much concerned about Laos as Thailand. I replied that, in that event, it would seem the part of wisdom to begin immediately the strengthening of the Thai forces and positions. My former reports led me to believe that the Thai might be very sturdy soldiers whereas obviously the Laotians didn't like to fight. I asked him whether the ICC was to be allowed, coincidentally with the ceasefire, to survey the whole country and see exactly what the situation was. He said our people would insist upon that.

Again I told him that from my own position I could not offer any advice—I could just say that as a generality in order to keep your position strong at the conference table you had constantly to let the enemy see that our country was not afraid. We believe in what is right and attempt to insist upon it.

Quite naturally a conversation such as this had no definite conclusion. We talked throughout most of the luncheon, and afterward strolled through the camp and continued discussing various aspects of each situation, but nothing of a dramatic character came up.

Finally we met with a group of newspaper reporters and photographers in front of Aspen Cottage. I enjoyed meeting so many of my old friends among the crowd. He made a very short statement and said that he had just outlined for me the situations in these two parts of the world and had asked for my counsel. Nothing else was said.

When the reporters turned to me I said that it was rather fun to be in the position of not having to make a statement and having nothing to say. They then asked me whether I supported him. I repeated a generalization that I had expressed on other occasions—that when it came to problems of foreign operations, then an American traditionally stands behind the Constitutional head, the President.

This of course was said with respect to purposes; no one outside government is committed to support details of timing, tactics, selection of operation sites and methods. These are not even yet known to outsiders.

After all this, he took me in his car to the heliport and suggested a golf game in the near future. Dick Flohr was driving and John Campion was riding in the front seat.

259. Chronology of Bay of Pigs operation from January 1960 to April 19, 1961, dated April 23¹

April 23, 1961

- 18 January 1960 Established Branch 4 within Western Hemisphere Division. Began period of organizing and acquiring personnel—established with 18 permanent positions at Headquarters—provision built in for handling additional personnel as needed for other Project installations.
- 18 January to 17 March 1960 (A) Began exploratory work on opening [less than 1 line not declassified] black area for training of small initial cadre to be used in training of greater force, which force to be used as teams introduced into Cuba to aid and assist the guerrilla units in the field.
- (B) Reconnoitered the Miami area for covert office space and safehouses, from which to initiate covert action operations into Cuba, including in/ exfiltration operations into Cuba of men and matériel, propaganda, and setting up recruiting offices.
- (C) Conducted active screening of Cuban political figures in conjunction with the Habana Station in view of setting up at the appropriate time (after policy approval) a Cuban front which would serve as the covert instrumentality through which clandestine operations, primarily propaganda and paramilitary, could be conducted.
- (D) Conducted map reconnaissance in the Caribbean area for territory on which to build a quasi-clandestine radio transmitter for broadcast into Cuba.
- (E) Conducted physical reconnaissance of Greater Miami area in view of locating suitable site for a major communications center.

¹ Top Secret. 12 pp. CIA, DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 82–00679R, Box 3, Papers Furnished the Green Committee.

-
- 17 February 1960 Paper on "Covert Action Operations Against Fidel Castro" (Sabotage Against Sugar) approved by Special Group (Designated Representatives under 5412), but disapproved by the President.
- 14 March 1960 Paper on "General Covert Action Plan for Cuba" approved by Special Group subject to preparation and submission of a rewritten proposal to the President.
- 17 March 1960 "A Program of Covert Action Against the Castro Regime" approved by the President.
- 17 May 1960 Radio Swan completed testing and was ready for regular, scheduled broadcasting.
- 21 July 1960 Approval granted by Special Group this date for sabotage actions against Cuba. Paper originally forwarded on 12 July. DCI made reservations (1) be non-attributable to U.S. and (2) no loss of life if possible.
- 18 August 1960 President and Cabinet briefed on Project progress and budget. Approval given to continue and budget of $13,287,611 for FY 1961 approved. As we understand it, DOD agreed to make available to the Agency the personnel and equipment needed to support training and logistical phases of the Project. [text not declassified]
- 7 September 1960 The DDP approved the reorganization of the FRD to institute the General Coordinator operation through his specialized action staffs.
- 8 September 1960 Approval granted by the Special Group for supply overflights over Cuba utilizing a Cuban crew with flight originating from Guatemala. Our requests for overflights were initiated in August, asking for permission to run a supply drop from U.S. bases with aircraft manned by Agency covert contract crews. This request was disapproved by the DDCI and DCI. On 1 September we submitted a request to run an overflight with the aircraft manned by a CAT crew. The flight idea seemed to receive agreement, but use of the CAT crew was denied. The approval finally received included the provision that we did not have to brief the Special Group formally before each supply

- flight, but that Mr. Parrott, DDP/EBM, would touch base by telephone with members of the Group on each drop.
- 13 September 1960 Department of State turned down the concept of use of foreign nationals in a PM Contingency Force (this according to note on routing sheet from C/WH/4 to Mr. Stanulis).
- 28 September 1960 We completed our first successful maritime operation, infiltrating 300 pounds of demolitions and exfiltrating two personnel from a rendezvous off the north coast of Cuba.
- 28/29 September 1960 First supply overflight mission over Cuba. C-54 dropped cargo in Escambrays but not on DZ. A/C landed in Mexico and is still being held by the Mexican Government.
- 6 October 1960 The Special Group approved the Agency's request to begin screening lists of potential volunteers (American) for use in Project operations with the understanding that none of these volunteers would be committed to action in Cuba without additional Special Group approval.
- 12 October 1960 The Special Group agreed that the Agency could run U-2 photographic mission over target country.
- 17 October 1960 At a meeting with the DDP it was agreed that, although we will continue to back the FRD, we will give aid to any other politically-acceptable groups which can provide evidence of Cuban assets worthy of support.
- 27 October 1960 DDP approved the spotting, recruiting and training of U.S. contract-type personnel for Project maritime operations. Utilization of these types in operations in Cuban waters will require further approval and must be under FRD cover.
- 3 November 1960 Special Group would not approve Agency suggestion that consideration be given to the use of U.S. bases for training and operations. (This request had been originated by the Agency because of Assistant Secretary of State Mann's opinion that attention focused on Guatemala in the U.N. made such a change necessary.)

- 3 November 1960 In light of the above, at a meeting with DDCI and DDP it was agreed that we would develop the proposed facility at Puerto Cabezas, Nicaragua, for a training, holding and staging area. It was agreed that a time loss was inevitable under this new arrangement.
- 16 November 1960 A new concept of paramilitary operations was discussed with the DDP. It envisaged landing a force of some 600 men by LST on beaches from which they would move inland and create a safe area in the mountains. This group and those joining it internally are to be resupplied by airdrop. D-Day to be 1 February. After discussion, it was agreed WH/4 would proceed on this plan, pending any further word from higher authorities.
- 29 November 1960 The President made it clear at a meeting with General Goodpaster, Messrs. Dillon, Merchant, Gates, Douglas, General Gray and Mr. Dulles and Mr. Bissell that he wanted all done that could be done on the Project with all possible urgency and nothing less on the part of any Department. There was general agreement that training in the U.S. was out of the question.
- 8 December 1960 Special Group, augmented by Messrs. Mann and Scott of State and General Lansdale from Defense were briefed on current status and proposed plan for PM operations with admittedly optimistic D-Day toward end of February. Approval was granted for concept of regular leaflet drop flights over Cuba with stipulation the Group be given customary advance notice of flights. Agreement reached later in the day with Mr. Mann to allow recruitment of U.S. contract types for maritime operations into Cuban waters. There was no firm decision on our request to fly supply drops from U.S. bases. In regard to protection of the U.S. Special Forces we plan to utilize as trainers in Guatemala, it was agreed that the Agency would negotiate a secret agreement with the Guatemalan Government outlining their status and rights.
- 11 December 1960 First propaganda leaflet drops made by three aircraft over Cuba.

- 15 December 1960 Special Group had no objection to the Project budget submitted; it was agreed that their function was not to examine details but simply to be aware of the general magnitude of and the principles on which the budget was based.
- 3 January 1961 At a meeting with the President, it was agreed that our PM forces should be increased to the greatest extent possible, but that U.S. bases could not be used for training.
- 3 January 1961 (2030 hours) Break in relations between U.S. and Cuba as direct result of Castro's demand Embassy staff be cut to eleven.
- 4 January 1961 DCS/OPS/DA consulted as to basis for DA's objections to our request to use FA teams for training in Guatemala.
- 6 January 1961 Mr. Esterline briefed M.G. Woodnough at DA's request for liaison with the Project in view of alert of 18th Corps.
- 10 January 1961 Mr. Esterline briefed General Cabell as to Project problems w/DOD so that General Cabell could raise these points with JCS members at the Puerto Rico meeting.
- 11 January 1961 DCI appeared at a closed session with the Foreign Relations Committee and provided material on the FRD.
- 12 January 1961 At the Special Group meeting, Mr. Willauer outlined a proposal to establish a task force consisting of representatives of State, Defense, the Joint Staff and the Agency to draw up contingency plans covering the possible use of overt U.S. forces. All members agreed that such planning is an essential step and a preliminary report was requested for 19 January.
- 13 January 1961 Proposed prop drop turned down by Mr. Barnes due to impending change of administration.
- 17 January 1961 DCI briefed Secretary of State designate Rusk on basic paper.
- 19 January 1961 Mr. Willauer presented to the Special Group the highlights of a paper on contingency planning. He concluded that several major aspects of the overall plan required clarification or further policy decisions, citing the following: (1) use of U.S. bases for air strikes before and after D-Day;

- (2) staging of invasion force (possibly from U.S.); (3) specific actions, including timing, to obtain support from other Latin American countries; (4) how and when to recognize a provisional government; (5) possibility of providing more overt support than originally planned. The Group agreed that our maritime missions could proceed, but that a high-level meeting, to include new Secretaries of Defense and State, should be set up as soon as possible to reaffirm basic concepts of projects.
- 22 January 1961 Mr. Barnes informed Col. King he had participated with Mr. Bissell and DCI in briefing Secretaries Rusk and McNamara, the Attorney General, and others at which Project generally endorsed and to proceed with steps now underway.
- 24 January 1961 CINCLANT planning meeting JCS to issue Admiral Dennison a planning directive to prepare to support Project with overt assistance.
- 25 January 1961 Mr. Barnes attempting to get State approval to train tankers at Fort Knox. Agreed with Mr. Bissell it was necessary that General Lemnitzer designate someone to receive full project briefing so that subsequent meetings with President can have a better informed DOD view.
- 27 January 1961 Met with DCI in preparation for 28 January meeting with President and State/Defense. Agreed to press for decision by 10 February and to abet that decision by giving JCS designees a full briefing as basis for joint planning.
- 28 January 1961 Meeting with President, Secretaries of Defense and State, General Lemnitzer and aides, Mr. Bundy and DCI. Decisions made were: (1) to continue our present propaganda and political action activities, sabotage, ex/infiltration and overflights; (2) to present the tactical PM plan as soon as possible to a limited number of senior officers designated by General Lemnitzer in order that a DOD position may be formulated.
- 30 January 1961 Col. Hawkins presented his plan in a detailed briefing of Generals Cabell and Bull and Admiral Wright.

- 31 January 1961 Col. Hawkins presented his plan in a detailed briefing of General Gray and party from JCS Staff.
- 1 February 1961 DOD indicated policy would not permit Armed Forces personnel in Nicaragua.
- 6 February 1961 General Lemnitzer forwarded to DCI the JCS favorable evaluation of Project strike plan, including a number of suggestions.
- 7 February 1961 Meeting with Mr. Berle at which Assistant Secretary Mann urged going slowly.
- 9 February 1961 Prepared paper for Mr. Berle at his request outlining bad effects of disbanding strike force.
- 9 February 1961 Prepared paper on alternatives to using strike force (i.e.—air and sea infiltration), and briefed Mr. Bundy thereon. He indicated there would be delay in Presidential decision.
- 11 February 1961 Reviewed General Gray's outline of field trip, and suggested Nicaragua base not be visited.
- 11 February 1961 Meeting with Mr. Bissell as to forming a Revolutionary Council.
- 15 February 1961 Met with Mr. Bissell to discuss Cuban civilian/military relations, composition of the Cuban political organization, and relations between the Project's PM section and the JCS Staff.
- 17 February 1961 DDP paper presented to President outlining several courses of action possible to the Agency.
- 20 February 1961 Understood from meeting with President it will be two weeks at least until a decision as to using force; decided not to expand up to 1,000 at this time, although that is possible.
- 25–27 February 1961 Three JCS officers visited Guatemalan and Nicaraguan sites for inspection of our forces in training.
- 1 March 1961 Meeting with Mr. Bissell to brief him on evaluation of force during JCS representatives' trip to the camps.
- 2 March 1961 Meeting in Assistant Secretary Mann's office to review JCS Staff's draft inter-agency plan.
- 3 March 1961 Assistant Secretary Mann asked that we not announce formation of Revolutionary Council or take any untoward act until after this 5–9 March Mexico City "Peace Conference".

3 March 1961	Began preparation of paper on military alternatives to the Trinidad plan for forthcoming meeting with President.
4 March 1961	C-54 drop flight down in Jamaica.
7 March 1961	Emissaries from President Ydigoras met with the President who stated a decision would be forthcoming.
7 March 1961	Noted we had 16 PM W/T men in target, 8 current in touch, and 48 agents geographically spread.
8 March 1961	Agreed to use Belle Chase facility for training of up to 200 of Nino Diaz PM group.
10 March 1961	First ship ("Atlantico") loads to depart for Nicaragua. Decision expected by noon 11 March. Meeting with Mr. Bissell to consider security necessary to achieve surprise.
11 March 1961	Meeting with President.
14 March 1961	DCI, General Gray, MacGeorge Bundy met and latter then briefed President.
15 March 1961	Morning meeting with Mr. Barnes to prepare revised military plans to meet limitations imposed.
15 March 1961	Afternoon meeting with Mr. Bissell to prepare for 1600 meeting with President. Reviewed paper as to political requirements last said to condition and limit the military plan.
15 March 1961	Met with President to present revised plan.
16 March 1961	DCI, DDCI, DDP briefed in war room.
17 March 1961	DDCI and party briefed Vice Admiral Beakley and party as to Navy support requirements in view of recent decisions regarding Project.
17 March 1961	Started intensive defection project.
17 March 1961	Started survey of trainees' knowledgeability of U.S. involvement.
27 March 1961	Revolutionary Council members visit Guatemala training camps.
27 March 1961	Sent representative to President Somoza.
28 March 1961	Decided not to use Sanchez Mosquera troops.
29 March 1961	Prepared papers on internal support to a landing and on the status of defection program for use at 1500 meeting in White House.
30 March 1961	Reviewed and prepared for release cables on 200 MIGS and on 4 Czech aircraft.

- 31 March 1961 Prepared contingency demobilization plan, and contingency plan for emergency evacuation.
- 1 April 1961 After meeting with Mr. Bissell and his inquiry to Mr. Bundy, informed bases there would be 24-hour delay in start of movement from Guatemala to Nicaragua.
- 3 April 1961 Briefed General Gray and Mr. Braddock on propaganda plan.
- 4 April 1961 Meeting with President, with decision promised for morning 6 April.
- 5 April 1961 Prepared B-26 "defection" plan.
- 5 April 1961 Agreed that if decision is not to use force, then we will move them until they get to sea, then divert on grounds of new intelligence.
- 6 April 1961 Prepared for U.S./U.N. a rebuttal of the New York Times preview of what Roa would charge (indicating what true and what not), and a collection of Castro's anti-U.S. statements.
- 7 April 1961 Agreed strike force briefing team to leave for Nicaragua 9 April.
- 8 April 1961 Briefed Mr. Bissell in war room on strike and on Diaz operation.
- 8 April 1961 Attended air briefing in 1717 H Street.
- 9 April 1961 Discussed with Nicaraguan representative back on 1-day consultation tightening up of Nicaraguan security.
- 10 April 1961 Reviewed agents' requests for drops in light of aircraft commitment to transporting troops.
- 11 April 1961 Received permission from Department of the Navy to move Diaz group this night from Belle Chase to Boca Chica for loading in ship.
- 12 April 1961 Sent CINCLANT plan to General Cabell.
- 12 April 1961 Meeting with President. Agreed Mr. Berle to tell Miro Cardona no overt U.S. support; we to close out U.S. training; take all steps necessary to divert to Vieques if necessary.
- 13 April 1961 All Headquarters sections on 24-hour duty.
- 14 April 1961 Briefing team returned from Nicaragua.
- 14 April 1961 U.N. Cuba question possibly today, probably 17 April.
- 14 April 1961 Consulted General Cabell, Mr. Bissell and Mr. Braddock in State re using sonic boom. Mr.

-
- Braddock said Acting Assistant Secretary Coerr could not approve as too obviously U.S.
- 14 April 1961 Composed open code for DCI to use in telephoning from Puerto Rico for progress report noon 17 April.
- 14 April 1961 Reinstated FBIS coverage of Radio Swan.
- 15 April 1961 Pilot deception operation.
- 15 April 1961 Reviewed photography and sent mission cable to air base.
- 16 April 1961 At 2200, General Cabell and Mr. Bissell to Secretary of State, following calls from Mr. Bundy re foregoing H-hour spoiling raids on airfields in favor close support of beach. At 2300 sent revised missions.
- 17 April 1961 (0130) meeting with General Gray to discuss additional military action.
- 17 April 1961 DCI met at 2340 at Friendship Airport on return from Puerto Rico and briefed as to situation as to that time (men ashore, supplies not, 2 ships sunk by enemy air).
- 18 April 1961 Revolutionary Council briefed in Miami safehouse on situation as of 1400: beachhead under attack by tanks and air.
- 18 April 1961 President asked at 1130 to authorize Navy air cover 19 April A.M.
- 19 April 1961 Discussed evacuation cable in DCI's office, and released at 1130. Held telecon with air base 1230-1315.

May 1961

260. Memorandum from Jacob D. Esterline to the Chief, WH/4/PM, May 2¹

May 2, 1961

SUBJECT

Straightening Out Dates of Strike Force Concept for the Taylor Committee

1. [less than 1 line not declassified] has in his notes instructions to write a paper straightening out in the Taylor Committee's mind when we actually became involved in strike operations. The need for this paper apparently arises from Lt. Col. Egan's statement to the effect that we always had a strike force concept. During his testimony he apparently made reference to a trip he took in June to one of the training camps, indicating at the time of trip the strike operation had already been decided upon. My recollection is that Lt. Col. Egan came to us about June 1960 and that he arrived with certain ideas which he carried from the Pentagon on how best to tackle the Cuban problem. This, however, did not constitute [less than 1 line not declassified] policy. I am sure you—or more particularly, members of your staff—will find that we had no approved philosophy of the operation within the Project until well in September. The training program [less than 1 line not declassified] was directed solely toward training an instructor cadre in small unit or "guerrilla-type" operations. This cadre when it arrived in Guatemala, in addition to working on building the camp [less than 1 line not declassified] continued to train the first recruits in the same kind of training they had received.

2. Another example of my positiveness that we were not, at Project level, thinking of a strike operation is the first conversation that we held in my office in Barton Hall wherein I referred to the fact that the PM staff had been talking about the development of a strike operation, but that I, myself, was not convinced of it at the time and that I preferred to put small teams into existing units at the appropriate time. As I recall, you had an open mind at that point although without positive study of Cuba you leaned toward the concept I outlined. It was at a somewhat later date, therefore (probably before the first of October), that we talked again and you stated your conviction that CASTRO could not be overthrown without a major or catalytic effort being made against him. After deliberation I came to the same conclusion and we then began to think in terms of expanding the force to the strength of a reinforced battalion more-or-less.

¹ Straightening out dates of strike force concept for the Taylor Committee. Secret. 2 pp. CIA Files: Job 85-00664R, Box 2, vol III, Part III.

3. The foregoing is important only because General Taylor is going into very fine points in his analysis of government policy. It is incumbent upon us, therefore, to get the record straight in this manner, and, although Lt. Col. Egan may have had in his own mind the idea of a strike operation—and I believe he came to us with some ideas on hitting the Isle of Pines—this nevertheless was not approved Project or Agency policy until quite a few months later. In point of fact, as I look back over that period I'm sure during that period I found myself drifting along devoting myself merely to creating basic capabilities in a variety of fields without any clear-cut idea of what national policy would permit us to do.

4. I hope the foregoing will be of some use to the PM staff in putting together the paper required by General Taylor. I will be available all day today; however, if further clarification is needed over and above that readily available within the PM staff, I suppose [less than 1 line not declassified] or [less than 1 line not declassified] would be in the best position to comment on this as they were, in fact, the only instructors on the scene at the time.

Jacob D. Esterline
C/WH/4

261. CIA memorandum, May 3¹

May 3, 1961

SUBJECT

Detailed Statement of all the Circumstances Surrounding the Cancellation of the D-Day Air Strike

REFERENCE

Memorandum Entitled, Additional Information Desired of CIA, dated 1 May 1961, paragraph 1

¹ Detailed statement of the circumstances surrounding the cancellation of the D-day air strike. Secret. 3 pp. CIA, DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 82-00679R, Box 3, Papers Furnished the Green Committee.

1. On D–1 (Sunday, 16 April 1961) at 2130 hours General Cabell was telephoned by Special Assistant to the President McGeorge Bundy. General Cabell received this call in Mr. Esterline's office. On completion of the call, General Cabell indicated that Mr. Bundy had stated it had been decided that there be no air activity until such activity could be conducted from the air strip in the beach area. Mr. Bundy had indicated that he had been in communication with the President. Mr. Bundy was leaving for New York to consult with Ambassador Stevenson. The President had directed that the Agency consult the Secretary of State.

2. General Cabell called Mr. Bissell. It was indicated that Mr. Bundy had also called Mr. Bissell. Mr. Bissell undertook to come immediately to Mr. Esterline's office.

3. At 2150 Mr. Barnes telephoned Mr. Esterline's office to say that Secretary Rusk had called to say that the President had suggested that there be no air activity until such activity could be conducted from the air strip in the beach area, but that that should not be the case if there were operational reasons against it.

4. Shortly after ten o'clock, General Cabell and Mr. Bissell went to see the Secretary of State. Shortly after General Cabell and Mr. Bissell left, Colonel Hawkins returned from dinner and was briefed by Mr. Esterline as to the above developments. Colonel Hawkins telephoned Mr. Bissell at Secretary Rusk's conference and advised that the results of a cancellation of the air strike could be disastrous. Colonel Hawkins requested that the matter be taken up again with the President in order to explain the seriousness of the situation and to request consideration.

5. When General Cabell and Mr. Bissell returned at approximately 2315, General Cabell stated that there had been a change in our orders and that air support would be limited to close support of the beachhead. They reported they had not seen the President, but that Secretary Rusk had telephoned the President and recommended there be no air strike, in view of political considerations.

6. Colonel Hawkins, Mr. Esterline and Mr. Drain all pointed out that this change came too late to divert the strike force; our most recent information indicated that, according to the strike plan, at that very moment the force was transferring to the smaller craft and proceeding towards the beach and therefore could not be recalled. The task force officers estimated that the failure to strike the aircraft, which Zip reports and actual photography had shown in place after the D–2 air strike, would be that our shipping would be attacked at dawn, or shortly thereafter, with a result that supplies would not be landed and some of the ships certainly sunk. It was put that the cancellation of the D-Day strike would probably mean failure of the mission. General Cabell replied that we had our "marching orders" and would comply.

7. General Cabell requested that Colonel Beerli, the Acting Chief of the Air Division, be called to send to the Puerto Cabezas Air Base a revised air order. Such a revision was transmitted at 0158 on 17 April and said, in part:

“Complete plan amended to place all B-26 aircraft at disposal of Brigade commander for Task Force protection: targets outlined in OPS Plan 200-1, attachment 1, appendix 2 to Annex B are cancelled. . . target restrictions are as follows: (1) only those armed vessels approaching task force or landing area; (2) no seaports to be attacked; (3) only those land targets that are called for by Brigade Commander for close in support; (4) no large cargo ships.”

8. A message received from the Puerto Cabezas Air Base at 0645 on the 17th indicated that the above message was received at that base 17 minutes after transmission. The Base’s reply read, in part:

“Refs received and reluctantly complied with. Complete plan amendment per refs received 170715Z with all pilots in cockpit ready for start engines. Needless to say this less than desirable operating procedure when 12 aircraft timed for take-off between 0730Z and 0800Z. Realize it desired give maximum protection to Brigade however believe change will not afford as much protection as original strike plan. The only real offensive danger to the Brigade is enemy fighters and bombers which are better hit on their home field—not repeat not over the beachhead. . . Pilots were in continual briefings today without sleep prior strike as a result late guidance and last minute changes.”

9. At approximately 0015 of the 17th, General Cabell telephoned Major General Gray at the latter’s home and requested that General Gray join General Cabell and Project officers in Mr. Esterline’s office. General Gray arrived at 0100. General Cabell informed General Gray as to the cancellation of the strategic strikes on the airfields and on the Managua Military Reservation and explored with General Gray what the JCS might do to compensate for this limitation. General Gray left at approximately 0145 to consult with JCS personnel. TS cable JCS 99422 was subsequently transmitted by General Gray to Admiral Clark and Admiral Denison. That cable, a warning order, indicated that the CEF aircraft would be limited on 17 April to defense of the beachhead from air and ground attack and that limited Cuban aircraft patrol activity was expected in the area. It also stated that the recipients should be prepared to execute on order the following missions “as soon after first light as practicable throughout daylight hours 17 April:

“a. Provide Air Cap for CEF shipping outside territorial waters. Rules of engagement as stated in your Op Plan apply as applicable.

“b. Provide EW for CEF ships to include LCI’s for purpose of warning ships of approaching aircraft. EW ships should remain maximum distance off shore consistent with capability to communicate with CEF ships.”

10. At 0525 Mr. Bissell called Colonel Shuler of the JCS Staff to advise him to implement General Gray’s warning order immediately, with the following amendments: paragraph a, negative; paragraph b, affirmative, with two provisos: (1) no support to be closer than 30 miles to the coast of Cuba, and (2) ships not to be too close to one another. Mr. Bissell had earlier received this advice in a telephone conversation with General Cabell and the Secretary of State.

262. Memorandum from C. Tracy Barnes to the Deputy Director (Plans), May 8¹

May 8, 1961

SUBJECT

Actions To Be Taken as a Result of Meeting, 6 May 1961 re NSC/Cuba Paper and a Separate Meeting with Mr. Richard Goodwin

PROPAGANDA:

1. Discussion with Henry [illegible in the original] re possibility of transferring Swan Island to USIA for use as an official U.S. station.

2. Discussion with John McKnight of USIA re questions of propaganda to Latin America, particularly:

- a. Obtaining and disseminating atrocity stories from Cuba.
- b. Obtaining and disseminating material establishing Communist/Dictatorship aspects of Castro regime.
- c. Obtaining better Latin American press for U.S. generally and particularly in relation to the loan programs which are about to begin. This would also include good build-up for the anticipated Foreign Ministers meeting and coverage of same.

3. Discuss with Arthur Schlesinger the question of including with Murrow's report on USIA Latin American activities a statement of our activities. Murrow's report is for the President and I feel that it would give a false picture of the U.S. effort unless our activities were also included.

PARAMILITARY:

Prepare as soon as possible a suggested program including any aspects which we wish to work out with [illegible in the original].

¹ Propaganda, paramilitary, political, intelligence and budget actions to be taken resulting from Cuban invasion. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 67-01083R, Box 1, C.T. Barnes—Chrono, Jan-Jul 1961.

When recommendations are ready they should be passed to the White House for consideration. This can be done either through the Special Group or directly to Goodwin's office. In this connection, [less than 1 line not declassified] should be put in touch with Ray as soon as possible to work up the points outlined in the suggested prospectus.

POLITICAL:

In order to work out satisfactory arrangements as to the proper channels for the Revolutionary Council, we have agreed to review all present RC (FRD)-U.S. relationships in order to determine how they should be continued for the future. It is understood that Dr. Miro Cardona and the Council will maintain a number of overt contacts, mainly with State (apparently, Morales-Carrisa will be named to do this) but to some extent with Defense and HEW. As soon as possible we should present our analysis of relationships to Goodwin for such discussion as he may want to have with the other Departments.

INTELLIGENCE:

1. Normal intelligence collection should continue and, to the extent possible, be increased with respect to receipt by Cuba of Communist aid and material. We might want to consider some U-2 flights from time to time in order to check for jets or destroyers.

2. [text not declassified]

3. On the propaganda side, we should increase our collection to obtain useable stories. I believe that this can be done to some extent through newspaper sources. We might consider the possibility of any intercepts plus, of course, some system of interrogating individuals leaving Cuba.

BUDGET:

We will have to budget activities pretty soon since the JMATE project will unquestionably have to terminate in the reasonably near future, presumably around the end of May at which time I believe the money will be pretty low anyhow.

C. Tracy Barnes
A/DDP/A

263. Memorandum, May 24¹

May 24, 1961

SUBJECT

Special Group Consideration of the Strike Force Concept

1. On 3 November 1960, CIA submitted a paper to the Special Group, Subject: "Support for Covert Paramilitary Operations." The Background Section of this paper indicated: "the heavy influx of foreign (including Sov, Sat) arms, equipment and tactical advisers, the increasing activity of the militia, the improved ability of the security forces and the rapid development of effective police state controls indicate that a sizeable strike force of up to 3000 men may be required to reinforce and support indigenous opposition elements. This strike force must be capable of seizing a beachhead and defeating opposing military forces. It would require sufficient tactical air and maritime assets to support the invading forces." The Recommendation Section read "that approval be granted for the utilization of bases in this country for the covert paramilitary training and holding of air, ground, and maritime indigenous groups." A copy of this paper is attached as Appendix A.

2. Minutes of the Special Group Meeting of 3 November 1960 indicate that Messrs. Merchant, Douglas, Gray, General Cabell, Parrott (Secretary) and General Lansdale attended. The pertinent comments on Cuban operations from this meeting are:

"Mr. Gray inquired once more as to the status of planning for problems which would arise post-Castro. Mr. Merchant said he would check into the progress of the State Department group which has been charged with developing recommendations on this matter.

"From this the Group launched into a far-ranging discussion of the entire concept of U.S. efforts against Castro. Mr. Douglas, supported by Mr. Gray and Mr. Merchant, expounded the idea that perhaps things have now progressed to a point where covert activities of the type originally envisaged for CIA to undertake will not be effective. Mr. Douglas referred to the extensive program of the militia, Mr. Gray cited the matter of arms from the Soviet bloc, and Mr. Merchant dwelt on the increasing effectiveness of Castro's measures to control the population in ways which the Communists have developed so well. The latter said that he and others in the State Department had originally thought that a popular rebellion would develop within Cuba and that this could be augmented by the comparatively small-scale efforts of exiles under CIA control. Now the same people are beginning to feel more and more that despite the numerous defections and the economic deprivations being experienced by the middle and upper classes, time is actually working on Castro's side. Mr. Merchant said that he foresaw that there would occur a point in time beyond which covert intervention would not do the job.

¹ Special Group consideration of the strike force concept. Secret. 12 pp. CIA, DDO/LA/COG Files: Job 82-99679R, Box 3, Gen Maxwell Taylor, Green Study Group, Vol II.

"Mr. Gray expressed the opinion that we will never be able to "clean up" the situation without the use of overt U.S. military force. He suggested the possibility of using the CIA-backed exiles to mount a simulated attack on Guantanamo in order to offer an excuse for overt intervention. This led to an involved discussion, the general conclusion of which was that such action on our part would not be desirable, but that should Castro be foolish enough actually to attack Guantanamo this would almost certainly mean war. Mr. Gray said that he had had the subject of Cuba inscribed on the NSC agenda for next Monday in order to be able to arrive at a top-level decision on this very point. He thought it essential that the policy of the U.S. should be completely understood by responsible officials, so that any overt Cuban act would be met with a previously-agreed-on response.

"Mr. Merchant stated that, apart from any attack on Guantanamo, he thought that some of the previous argumentation in today's meeting was faulty, in that we could not have it both ways. By this he meant that it is not logical to conclude that an indigenous uprising is impossible and yet that it is feasible for the U.S. to go in overtly and "clean up the mess." He pointed out that if Castro's support were such that an uprising was out of the question then an open invasion by the U.S. would be met by a hostile population and we would be plunged into a situation like Algeria.

"Turning to the immediate problem before the Group, General Cabell outlined the general proposal to establish bases in the U.S., with the reasons for coming to this conclusion. He cited specifically the possibility of U.N. investigation in Guatemala and the increased scope of the program, which has been brought about by the increased strength of the Castro regime. All members of the Group expressed serious doubts as to whether such activity could be kept at all secure. Mr. Merchant said at one point, that although this does not represent a final conclusion on his part, he is inclined to think that the proposal embodies the worst aspect of both worlds; that is, the choice should rest between continuing our operations entirely on foreign soil or preparing to make the best possible case for overt intervention.

"Mr. Gray suggested that the decision could be put up to his associates at the same time Tibet is discussed. Mr. Merchant agreed that this is where it should end up, but asserted that he is not prepared to move in that direction until a survey has been made of the possibilities of keeping operations in the U.S. unrevealed.

“In this connection General Cabell mentioned the possibility of using a refugee organization—either an existing one or a contrived one—to backstop the operations.

“Mr. Douglas said that in any case he would be prepared to have the Department of Defense investigate the availability of specific locations that would be suitable.”

3. CIA did not receive permission to utilize U.S. bases for training or holding as requested in this paper, but it was indicated here that we contemplated augmenting our GW activities with a sizeable paramilitary assault effort from outside Cuba.

4. Minutes of the Special Group meeting of 19 November 1960 indicate that Messrs. Merchant, Mann, Douglas, Gray, Dulles, Bissell, Parrott (Secretary) and General Lansdale were present and the following covers the discussion on Cuba:

“Mr. Merchant began by stating that in his opinion we were putting more burden on the Guatemalan government with our training base than that government can support for very long. He noted that Mr. Mann believes the solution is to move our training activities to the U.S., but Mr. Merchant does not think we can get away with this, particularly if an increase in numbers is contemplated. Therefore, the only solution would seem to be to move to another base or bases in other countries; this would involve the same burden on the other countries as now exists with respect to Guatemala. Although he has not discussed this point with Secretary Herter, Mr. Merchant believes that it is time to take another look at Cuba and if the U.S. attitude toward Castro remains unchanged then we should consider shifting our entire posture. This would involve a break in diplomatic relations, the support of a government in exile, and other activities mostly overt, including some training in the U.S.

“Mr. Mann commented that he thinks we cannot maintain training anywhere in Latin America indefinitely, although he does think we could maintain small airstrips without too much danger. He said that he believes everyone in Guatemala knows by now the true nature of our activities there, and that if they are going to be publicized before the world he would rather have them exposed in the U.S. rather than in Latin America. He recognized that this would be highly embarrassing for this country, but that for most Latin American governments it could be fatal. He spoke of the impending OAS investigation of Guatemala, and conceded that OAS support would be required to carry out training successfully in the U.S. To this, Mr. Merchant replied that he did not think exposure of such activities on American soil would be acceptable, particularly in the U.N.

"Mr. Bissell then said that he has agreed for some time with Mr. Mann's point as to the strain on Guatemala. He said that we have developed an evacuation plan to be used in the event of outside investigation, but that this is not a satisfactory answer to the problem. He said that within about four weeks an alternate site could be established in Nicaragua but that this would be very expensive, would tie us into the Somoza brothers, and would call attention to Nicaragua in the same way as Guatemala.

"Mr. Bissell said that he foresaw several possibilities for constructive change in the training operation, some for the immediate future and some over a period of longer range. They include:

"a. A sort of refugee camp in the U.S. ostensibly designed for temporary care of Cuban exiles. This story could be defended but it is difficult to say for how long or how effectively.

"b. A guarded military facility in the U.S. This could be handled more securely, but the existence of an area where peculiar things are going on could not be kept secret indefinitely. An alternative would be private property such as the King Ranch, but this would take longer to arrange than a military base.

"c. Vieques Island, off Puerto Rico. This is fairly remote, but the government of Puerto Rico is already trying to get the U.S. Marines out.

"d. The CIA site on [less than 1 line not declassified]. This would be very secure but would require a large amount of airlift.

"e. [less than 1 line not declassified]. At this location the trainees could be kept secure but would almost certainly know where they were.

"Mr. Douglas said that a military base could be made available, such as Laughlin Air Force Base near Del Rio, Texas. He said that the use of such real estate might be tied into some sort of cooperation with Tracy Voorhees' Committee on Cuban Refugees. He felt also that the U.S. capability for intervention in Cuba will probably not be effective enough unless there is more overt participation than has been contemplated to date. General Lansdale said that he and General Bonesteel were of the same opinion.

"Mr. Gray supported this general position, stating that when the current Cuban plan was approved, the situation in that country was different than it is now. Since then, the Cubans have received sizeable amounts of bloc arms and have organized a militia, and Mr. Gray wondered how effective a few hundred exiles could be. Mr. Dulles acknowledged that it would be necessary to have internal support if the Castro government were to be successfully overthrown; he felt that there is reason to believe such support might develop, perhaps within the militia itself.

"Mr. Mann expressed the opinion that the way to proceed is to seal Cuba off from the rest of Latin America and to settle down for a one or two year wait, presumably to see whether the tide might not turn in our favor. He said that in the meantime, we could infiltrate small groups of trained Cubans as a token, but that we should postpone a decision on a striking force for four or five months. In this general connection, Mr. Bissell said that even if it is finally decided that overt U.S. forces should be used, there still should be a nucleus of trained Cubans available. Therefore, our present activities should be continued in any case.

“Summing up, the Group decided that the possibility of splitting the present body of trainees into three or four groups should be examined urgently (particularly in view of Mr. Mann’s estimate that the OAS investigation might take place in two or three weeks). Alternate sites to be examined would include Vieques, Laughlin AFS and [less than 1 line not declassified]. The latter location should absorb no more than 200. Mr. Douglas cautioned that the use of DOD facilities should at the present time be considered as a holding operation rather than a continuation or stepping up of present training. The possibilities of establishing a kind of CCC under the Voorhees auspices should be examined.”

5. Minutes of the Special Group meeting of 23 November 1960 indicate that Messrs. Merchant, Gray, Dulles, Bissell, Parrott (Secretary) and General Lansdale were present and the following extract from the minutes covers the only reference to an assault concept:

“Mr. Bissell then spoke of the report of a possible attempt by Cuban dissidents to take over the Isle of Pines. He explained that we have nothing to do with the plan and would in fact be unable to give much support to it. He said that it is highly questionable whether this attempt will take place on the reported time schedule, or indeed at all, but emphasized that this illustrates how initiative might be taken by others, so that we could be presented with drastic requests for assistance on very short notice. Mr. Bissell also mentioned the report of possible major sabotage to be carried out in the very near future. In addition, he said that we now have six B-26s, plus eleven crews, available for combat, with other aircraft for supply. He noted that Nicaragua might be used for refueling in the event of actual operations, but that the immediate objective would be to obtain strips on the Isle of Pines. Mr. Dulles remarked that this would of course require an active revolt.”

6. The following are pertinent extracts on the strike force concept taken from a memorandum for the record by an officer from the Cuba Desk on discussions held with the DDP after a meeting with the President on 29 November 1960:

“1. The DDP briefed the participants as to the President’s meeting with Department and Agency representatives, and reviewed the Project’s budget and staff paper in preparation for the Special Group’s 30 November meeting.

"2. Following a session with Mr. Pawley, the President had called a conference with Messrs. Dillon, Merchant, Gates, Douglas, Gray, Goodpaster, Dulles and Bissell.

"a. The President made it clear he wanted all done that could be done with all possible urgency and nothing less on the part of any Department.

"b. The Director outlined the Project's paramilitary concept and timing, emphasizing that our first choice for training continued to be Guatemala but that it seemed feasible to use [less than 1 line not declassified] if necessary. There was general agreement that training in the U.S. was out of the question."

3. For the next Special Group meeting, the DDP proposed to stress the following:

"a. We will train an absolute minimum of 600 in Guatemala, taking up the San Jose finca, moving out 60 to [less than 1 line not declassified], and building up to the 600 number as fast as recruiting and additional construction will permit.

"b. [text not declassified]

"c. Our budget is high, but a sizeable portion of the cost represents reimbursements to the DOD.

"4. The DDP stressed the unanimous belief of the other Departments and of the Agency's leadership that we must set our strength goals higher than 600. To train substantially more will involve an additional site and other considerations which can perhaps best be seen after we are farther along with the 600. Accordingly, it was agreed not to conclude as to additional strength for several weeks, and to keep the [less than 1 line not declassified] facility on a contingency basis."

7. Minutes of the Special Group meeting of 30 November 1960 indicate that Messrs. Merchant, Mann, Douglas, Gray, Dulles, Bissell and Parrott (Secretary) were present. The following extracts cover references to our paramilitary activities and plans:

"Mr. Gray solicited the Group's assistance in arriving at a consensus of views as to what exactly had been decided as a result of the high-level meeting of the day before. The following points were agreed:

"a. Mr. Gray's associates stand ready to deny U.S. activity based in Guatemala, even though it may become blown (Mr. Douglas urged that every effort be made to make it possible to deny plausibly).

"b. If the program is enlarged, additional facilities may be obtained, but at this stage not in the U.S. No training of Cubans will be conducted in the U.S. under present circumstances. (Mr. Bissell told the Group of the possibility of an additional finca in Guatemala.)

"c. Evacuation plans should be kept in readiness. (Mr. Mann said that he thought he could arrange a week's notice before any OAS committee actually visited Guatemala and that it might be possible even then to avoid actual investigation on the spot. Mr. Bissell said that if we do have a week, evacuation could be carried out by Agency aircraft; if more speed is required, DOD assistance might be necessary. Mr. Douglas, with Mr. Dulles and Mr. Bissell concurring, felt that the possibility of emergency evacuation to Florida under the guise of ordinary refugees should be kept in mind.)"

8. On 8 December 1960, the Special Group members were briefed on the Cuban force existent at the time and the strike force concept which had been developed. A copy of the minutes of this meeting indicating members present and items discussed is attached as Appendix B. There is no indication in these minutes that an explicit approval was given by the group on the strike force concept as proposed.

9. Minutes of the Special Group Meeting of 15 December 1960 indicate that Messrs. Hare, Douglas, Gray, Dulles, Barnes, Parrott (Secretary) and General Lansdale were present. The following are pertinent extracts from the minutes regarding the strike force concept:

"Mr. Dulles and Mr. Barnes outlined the salient points of the Cuba budget for the rest of FY 61. Mr. Barnes mentioned particularly the items for ordnance costs and for maintenance, stating that the figures were calculated on the assumption of continuing support from the Air Force on these aspects. Mr. Douglas appeared to accept this assumption. Mr. Barnes also pointed out that the budget is based on holding the strike group until approximately March 15th.

"The Group had no objection to the budget as presented. Mr. Hare commented, and the rest agreed, that their function was not to examine details but simply to be aware of the general magnitude and principles on which the budget was based.

"Mr. Douglas said he understood that there is an outstanding request for Air Force personnel in addition to the 38 Special Forces people. Mr. Barnes confirmed that a request has been made for 9 to 11 specialists, who will be required in connection with the Nicaragua base. Mr. Douglas said he thought it would be very desirable to have these individuals protected in the same way as the Army personnel destined for Guatemala; Mr. Barnes confirmed that this could be done.

"This led to a brief discussion of the arrangements for the Army people. It was agreed that it would be useful for Mr. Barnes and General Lansdale to talk to Assistant Secretary of the Army Roderick after it becomes clear what results Mr. Esterline has obtained in his interview with President Ydigoras.

"Mr. Douglas also asked that he be informed whenever non-official contract Americans are to be used "in or over" Cuba. It was agreed that, since other members were also interested, this could be handled at Group meetings as it may come up. Mr. Douglas wanted confirmation of his understanding that no U.S. official personnel would be used in this manner, and he was given this assurance. Mr. Gray said that his associates would view this in the same way as Mr. Douglas."

10. Minutes of the Special Group meeting of 29 December 1960 indicate that Messrs. Merchant, Douglas, Gray, Dulles, Bissell and Parrott (Secretary) were present. The following extract from the minutes is the discussion held on Cuba:

"Mr. Merchant reported a brief conversation he had had with Mr. Gray's associates this morning. The latter had made two points: (a) it would be desirable to obtain the cooperation and support of individual Latin American governments, (b) it would be desirable, if possible, for the U.S. to break relations with Cuba, in concert with other countries, some time before January 20th.

"Mr. Merchant also said that he had come to the firm conclusion that it would be impossible politically to carry out three days of pre-invasion bombing in Cuba. All members of the Group agreed; Mr. Bissell said the concept has been revised to include only one day before the invasion.

"Mr. Douglas then outlined his understanding of the general outlines of the overall plan for Cuba. Mr. Bissell agreed that this understanding was an accurate one. Mr. Douglas questioned the possibility of expanding the initial beachhead into a full-scale takeover of the government. Mr. Bissell said that our thinking is that this will not be possible unless one or all of the following situations develops: (a) overt support, (b) a major revolutionary uprising, (c) massive use of air support.

"It was agreed that care should be taken as far as possible to avoid any possibly-abortive uprising on a comparatively small scale, such as the proposal made by a group of internal dissidents to seize an airfield and port near Havana."

11. On 3 January 1961 a meeting was held on Cuba which was attended by the following: Secretaries Herter, Gates, Anderson, Messrs. Dulles, Merchant, Douglas, Gray, Bissell, Barnes, Mann and General Goodpaster. The following are pertinent extracts on paramilitary actions against Cuba taken from a Memorandum for the Record prepared by Mr. Barnes:

"There was considerable discussion of the situation in Cuba with general agreement on its seriousness and on the need for action. It again was made clear that action would be taken immediately should the Cubans provoke it in any aggressive way. Even without such provocation, it was clear that the meeting felt that pretty rigorous action should be taken and obviously could successfully be taken—the danger, however, being that if it went too far it might rupture the structure of the OAS which, of course, is undesirable.

"As to present preparations, there was some discussion about the use of U.S. soil for training. The consensus of the meeting was against this although it was agreed that efforts should be made to try and increase the number of trainees, possibly up to 1500, which if done would require additional training sites. In this connection it was felt that perhaps some additional trainees might be spread around in relatively small groups and given some training. The cover story could be that enlistment in these small cadres was the best way to keep them together, cover the language problems, provide them with some sustenance and keep them occupied. Another possibility suggested was some military training in refugee camps, some of which have already been created. The conclusion, however, was clear that preparations should proceed and that to the extent possible the size of the force should be increased."

12. Minutes of the Special Group meeting of 5 January 1961 indicate that Messrs. Merchant, Douglas, Gray, Dulles, Bissell, Barnes and Parrott (Secretary) were present. The following is a copy from the minutes of the discussion on Cuba:

"Mr. Douglas felt that Defense (Colonel Prouty) was now in a position to iron out all the difficulties in connection with the Special Forces personnel for Guatemala. It was agreed that State concurrence in the arrangements should be obtained, but Mr. Douglas said Defense would not slow down its activities awaiting this.

"Mr. Douglas then read from a paper left with him by General Lemnitzer. This indicated a schedule of training time, if training were conducted under Army auspices, which would approximate 24 weeks or—on a sketchier basis—12–16 weeks. The memo also referred to numerous difficulties which might arise, such as medical care pay, etc., as well as problems of cover, political orientation and the like. All agreed that a training schedule of this kind is totally impractical in current circumstances. The members appeared to agree that this constituted a good argument for a reexamination of basic concepts, particularly as to the need for overt intervention and early recognition of an exile government.

"Mr. Barnes pointed out that due to the different political colorations of the emigres, if for no other reason, it would be difficult to name a government before members of it are physically on Cuban soil.

"It was agreed that in any case a decision as to ultimate overt intervention is required, but that will probably not be practicable to obtain this in the next fifteen days. Mr. Gray undertook to pass on the word that the Army plans, as outlined in the paper read by Mr. Douglas, were not responsive to the need. Mr. Bissell said that one alternative action that can be taken is to obtain Cubans who have already had military experience and to train them in the U.S. He recognized that this would constitute essentially an overt act.

"Mr. Barnes pointed out the desirability, in the course of bilateral discussions with other Latin American countries, of attempting to obtain commitments for limited personnel support at an appropriate time. In answer to a question, Mr. Merchant said that he did not foresee the necessity for a temporary evacuation of the Guatemala base."

13. Minutes of the Special Group meeting of 19 January 1961 indicate that Messrs. Merchant, Douglas, Gray, Dulles, Willauer, Barnes, Parrott (Secretary) and General Lansdale were present for discussions on Cuba. The pertinent extracts from the minutes on paramilitary actions against Cuba are:

"Mr. Willauer presented the highlights of a paper which he had prepared following meetings of the special contingency planning group. He concluded that several major aspects of the overall plan require clarification or further decision, citing the following: (a) the use of U.S. air bases for strikes before and after D-Day, (b) staging of the invasion force, possibly from the U.S., (c) specific action, including timing, to get support of other Latin American countries, (c) how and when to recognize a provisional government, (e) the possibility of having to provide considerably more overt support than originally planned.

"Mr. Dulles noted that the next ten-day period poses a number of problems from the standpoint of policy approval. In answer to a question. Mr. Barnes said we are not planning specific overflights in the immediate future but urged that we be in a position to service requests as quickly as possible. The Group agreed that dispatches by sea can be continued without further approval at this time. It was also agreed that a high level meeting, to include the new Secretaries of State and of Defense should be arranged as soon as possible to reaffirm basic concepts."

14. After the change in Administration in January 1961, briefings on our proposed operations were given to the President and representatives of the Departments of State and Defense. Special Group meetings were resumed in February 1961, and the Group was briefed at various meetings as to the progress of CIA operations against Cuba, but there is no indication in the minutes of their meetings as to any position taken by the Special Group on the ultimate launching of the strike force.

264. Memorandum for the record, May 26¹

JMG-0399

May 26, 1961

SUBJECT

Post-D Day Supply Drops from [less than 1 line not declassified]

1. General Cabell called the afternoon of 25 May, requesting information on the number of supply drops flown from [less than 1 line not declassified] following D-Day, 17 April 1961. I debriefed [less than 1 line not declassified] and Major Skinner on this subject and called General Cabell back with the following facts:

a. The night of 18 April a total of seven C-54 loads were rigged and launched from [less than 1 line not declassified] to the Blue Beach and Red Beach areas. Each aircraft carried approximately 12,000 pounds of brigade ammunition including grenades, tank ammunition, mortar shells, and small and heavy weapon support items. The loads of three of these were kicked out at the Blue Beach, while one went on to the Red Beach region. Three aircraft did not complete the mission due to the presence of early morning daylight and enemy aircraft activity. These loads were returned to [less than 1 line not declassified].

b. Additionally, one C-46, with between eight and ten thousand pounds of the same cargo, discharged its load the morning of 18 April at the Playa Giron Airfield. A second C-46, similarly loaded, did not land because of enemy aircraft but returned to [less than 1 line not declassified].

c. Additionally, a single C-46 had attempted to land at the airfield the previous afternoon, but while on route to the target area was in radio communication with two B-26's returning to [less than 1 line not declassified] who informed him that enemy aircraft were active in the area and the chances of a successful landing were small. This aircraft then returned to [less than 1 line not declassified].

2. General Cabell also had asked me about why we had been unable to load and dispatch the four C-130 aircraft from Kelly Air Force Base on 18 April. I told him that there had not been time to rig the approximately 90,000 pounds of cargo in the time allotted with the insufficient number of riggers on hand. I did advise him that [less than 1 line not declassified] and six PDO's/riggers had flown from Missoula, Montana, to the Depot in a chartered airplane, and had the beach not been lost the afternoon of the 19th, the C-130's would have been ready to go that night.

¹ Post D-day supply drops review. Secret. 2 pp. CIA Files: Job 85-00664R, Box 4, Vol I.

[name not declassified]
Acting Chief, DPD-DD/P

Distribution:

- 1—C/DPD/ASB
- 2—ASST CH/DPD
- 3—AC/DPD
- 4—EO/DPD
- 5—DPD/MAT
- 6—DPD/SO
- 7—DPD/RI

DPD-DD/P: [name not declassified]

June 1961

265. Memorandum from Allen Dulles to General Taylor, June 1¹

June 1, 1961

On Friday, November 18, 1960, Mr. Bissell and I briefed the President-elect at Palm Beach, Florida. This briefing included a status report with respect to certain important covert operations and in particular the Cuban Operation. The particular purpose of the briefing was to bring the President-elect up to date with regard to the policy paper on Cuba which had been approved by the President on March 16, 1960 and to outline the progress which had been made towards accomplishing the aforementioned objectives set out in that paper, all of which called for action in the covert field.

It seemed important to advise the President-elect of these facts since he was receiving a large number of suggestions and was under considerable pressure from certain Congressional leaders who were not aware of the action programs which were being developed in the Cuban situation.

The purpose of the briefing was not to solicit the President-elect's approval or disapproval of the program but merely to acquaint him of its existence.

Allen W. Dulles
Director

¹ Summary of November 18, 1960, briefing of President-elect Kennedy on planned covert actions in Cuba. No classification marking. CIA, DCI (Dulles) Files: Job 80-B01285A, General Maxwell Taylor committee on Cuba, 28 Jan-21 May 1961.

266. Intelligence Note from Hilsman to Rusk, June 26¹

June 26, 1961

SUBJECT*Intelligence Note: Implications of Delivery of Soviet MIG Aircraft to Cuba*

Shipment of Soviet Jets Arrives in Cuba. Reliable intelligence reports indicate that Cuba has recently received a shipment of 23 crates containing MIG jet aircraft, perhaps including some MIG-19's, from the Soviet Union; that this shipment was probably preceded by an earlier delivery of a number of MIG-15's or 17's; and that some 60 Cubans have either returned or will soon return from military training, presumably flight training, in Czechoslovakia.

Cuba Will Have Greatly Increased Air Capability. The Cuban Air Force, which has relied principally on several US T-33 subsonic jet trainers, a few Sea Fury propeller-driven fighters, a small number of B-26's, and a few poorly trained, politically unreliable pilots, must, when the new jets become operational, be considered to have a substantially improved air strength. Additional plane deliveries (which are likely), the return of more flight trainees from the Bloc, the presence of Bloc instructors in Cuba, and further training within the country will serve to increase this capability.

Fear of Cuban Aggressive Moves in Caribbean Will Increase. The possibilities are increased that Castro will feel himself in a better position to take advantage of underlying tensions in the Caribbean, heightened since the assassination of Dominican dictator Trujillo. Use of the jets to support Cuban-sponsored invasions or pro-Castro uprisings in these countries, although still highly unlikely because of probable US or OAS reaction, cannot be discounted. The countries of the area will almost surely feel themselves threatened by Cuba's possession of MIG's and may well react with an avalanche of requests for modern US jets.

Invasion of Cuba Without Heavy Air Support Impossible. The acquisition of MIG aircraft and the return of Bloc-trained pilots makes any invasion of Cuba a virtual impossibility without strong air support from modern jet fighters flown by well-trained pilots. It will no longer be possible for a small number of obsolescent aircraft to provide adequate air cover for an invasion force.

Soviets Apparently Discount Possibility of US Intervention. The MIG deliveries apparently indicate that the Soviet Union does not believe the presence of such aircraft in Cuba will be viewed by the United States as sufficient provocation to warrant direct US intervention.

¹ "Implications of Delivery of Soviet MIG Aircraft to Cuba." Secret. 3 pp. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, Cuba, May 1961—.

Implications for US Policy. The possession of jet aircraft by the Castro regime does not appear to introduce any new factors requiring a major reorientation of US policy. It may, however, provide grounds for the imposition of further restrictive measures against Cuba, such as application of the Trading with the Enemy Act. It may also serve to make Latin American governments more aware of the dangers of Cuban ties with the Bloc, and to arouse greater hemisphere support for US policies toward Cuba.

7/5/61

Mr Hilsman

Roger,

On Friday, June 30, Lt. Gen. Robert Wood told me that his command (U.S. Army Air Defense Command) had recommended a 4 phase program to the Joint Chiefs with the objective of preventing any irrational sorties of the MIGS over the Miami area. The Chiefs approved the first two of the 4 phases of the recommended program, i.e., the deployment of interceptors and radar in the area.

Joe

July 1961

267. Memorandum from C. Tracy Barnes to the Chief, Covert Action Staff, July 3¹

July 3, 1961

SUBJECT

Possible Funding of Cuban Revolutionary Council

1. At a recent meeting called by Mr. Goodwin and attended by State, HEW, Bureau of the Budget, and ourselves (Jake Esterline and me), there was a long discussion as to what should or should not be done by the U.S. Government in relation to the Cuban Revolutionary Council. The major problem is created by the question of support (i.e., money) which arises due to the historic fact that support has been provided for the maintenance of the CRC/FRD political organization for some months. Consequently, support must be either continued or broken off which makes the problem much more difficult than if it were merely a decision regarding support in the first instance.

2. It was, I believe, the general consensus of the meeting that the present Council in all likelihood does not represent the political "wave of the future" as far as Cuba is concerned. Moreover, it was felt that the post-Castro political leaders may not even be visible as yet, since in all probability, as pointed out by Dr. Morales-Carrion, they will emerge from the ranks of those now living in Cuba who are being forced into the opposition as a result of their experience of life in a police state.

3. In view of this, the meeting agreed that someone (preferably Goodwin's boss) should have a candid talk with Miro Cardona advising him of these views and urging him to broaden the base of the Council in an effort to make it more representative and saying that the matter will again be discussed at the end of July or early August. It should be noted in this connection that Miro's illness may make this schedule difficult.

4. Conceivably, Miro may be unable to expand the Council and it may very well fall apart as a result of its inability to provide representative leadership. In many ways, this result has some advantages, i.e. it clears the decks of any Cuban political group with special privileges and the breakdown of the Council would have been the result of failure on the part of the Cubans rather than something which could be blamed on the Americans such as refusal to provide support. On the other hand, if Miro should produce a more effective and representative Council, it is then conceivable that the U.S. should try to produce support but on a clandestine basis. It is this last point on which I would like your help. How can such support be best achieved without being blown at an early date to the U.S. press or elsewhere? Rich contributors, a foundation, plus some additional cash slipped on the side are obvious possibilities. Could you, however, give this matter some thought and see what you can work out in the way of suggestions? Jake Esterline has asked for your help and hopes to get it. Although the problem will not arise for about a month or so, it is not going to be easy to solve and it will unquestionably take a fair amount of preparation even when a system has been adopted.

¹ Possible funding of Cuban Revolutionary Council. Secret. 2 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 67-01083R, Box 1, C.T. Barnes—Chrono, Jan-Jul 1961.

C. Tracy Barnes
A/DDP/A

268. Draft memorandum for the files, July 17¹

July 17, 1961

SUBJECT

Salient Points of Mr. Woodward's Report to Mr. Scott (7/14/61) on Meeting at White House on July 12, 1961, with Mr. Bowles, Mr. Dulles, and Mr. Goodwin

Mr. Bissell and Barnes were also reported to have been present

Mr. Woodward said the matter under discussion was the Agency's May 2, 1961, proposal to cost $12,000,000 for a further program for Cuba. It was in three parts, namely: intelligence collection, propaganda and sabotage and other disruptive activities. This third category of activity was not related in the presentation to specific Cuban political groups.

Mr. Woodward reported that after the discussion, there was unanimous agreement that any paramilitary activities should be undertaken only through political groups and not as separate independent activities.

¹ Salient points of Woodward's July 14 report to Scott on a July 12 meeting at the White House. Secret. 1 p. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, Cuba Program, Jan 21, 1961—.

A new paper is being drafted by Messrs. Bissel and Barnes.

In response to Mr. Scott's question, Mr. Woodward said that there was no mention made of any consideration being given to the use of B-26's, C-46's or any air base in conjunction with sabotage activities.

There was some discussion of the desirability of obtaining fast sea-going vessels for use in moving people into and out of Cuba.

269. Memorandum from Woodward to Bowles, July 20¹

July 20, 1961

SUBJECT

Cuban Program Paper

I suggest that you concur in the recommendations contained in the Cuban Program Paper. This bureau is, of course, unable to determine the exact amounts needed for the fields specified, but approves of the activities contained in the proposed program.

It is hoped, in fact, that, consistent with careful planning, all of these activities will vigorously and promptly be promoted as a means of generating a renewed hope within the Cuban people.

I will wish to be informed in more detail with respect to individual activities contemplated and especially with regard to those which might have an impact upon foreign relations with other countries. Under the latter might be included plans for forward operating bases, training sites, and communications facilities. I think it extremely important that plausible cover protect all of these activities.

Approved _____

Disapproved _____

¹ Transmits memorandum for the Special Group on the program of covert action directed at the Castro regime. Secret. 12 pp. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, S.G. 2, July 20, 1961.

Attachment

MEMORANDUM FOR

The Special Group

SUBJECT

Cuban Program Paper

The attached paper replaces the Cuban Program Paper discussed at the 29 June Special Group Meeting except for Annex A which remains unchanged and is, therefore, not resubmitted.

Attachment

1. SUBJECT:

Program of Covert Action Directed at the Castro Regime

2. OBJECTIVES OF AND ESTIMATES UNDERLYING THE PROGRAM

a. The basic objective of the program is to provide support to a U.S. program to develop Cuban political leadership in opposition to Castro and to help bring about a regime acceptable to the U.S. which one achieve sufficient strength to overthrow the Castro regime and take its place.

b. It is estimated that at the moment the Castro regime is strong politically, is steadily increasing its military strength (e.g., receipt of jets), has an active and reasonably efficient internal police system and is prepared to enforce Soviet type methods to stay in power. Consequently, the objective stated above will be very difficult to attain, will take a considerable period of time, and will involve both activities within Cuba and support of such activities from outside Cuba.

c. Although invasion by U.S. forces could achieve the destruction of the Castro regime, it is assumed that there is no present intention to undertake such an invasion and, in the absence of some substantial and unexpected change in the situation, some to do as in the foreseeable future. Similarly it is assumed that there is no present U.S. intention to support any attempted large scale landing by Cubans or other non-Americans or even to authorize or encourage training outside of Cuba of any substantial groups for the possibility of such an invasion. Moreover, there is no present U.S. belief that opposition elements within Cuba can be developed to the point where they can overthrow the Castro regime by military or paramilitary action absent some significant change in Cuban attitudes resulting in a large disaffection of potentially controlling elements, such as important political leaders (e.g., Che Guevara) or large segments of the militia.

d. Despite the foregoing, it is believed that limited, carefully and cautiously planned acts of a paramilitary nature can be helpful to the overall program as contributions to political results. Unless circumstances change, paramilitary acts as such are probably undesirable but they can be very helpful and constructive in bolstering morale; aiding the opposition in its recruitment; giving evidence to the regime and the populace of active opposition; and providing confirmation to outside support with respect to a capability for action (this is particularly persuasive if it can be demonstrated as action susceptible of coordination through responsiveness to some outside control). The incentives and encouragement provided by this type of activity is especially effective and important in a police state where it is the only outlet for opposition expression in an otherwise clandestine and unobtrusive existence. Moreover, it is quite possible that circumstances may arise in Cuba which would justify sabotage against selected targets (e.g. oil refineries and sugar mills) with a view to causing economic difficulties for the Castro regime.

e. In view of the foregoing, the initial goal of a covert action program is to collect all possible intelligence with regard to the situation within Cuba, the attitude of the Cuban people and particularly the existence of actual or potential elements in opposition to the Castro regime. Such information will be sought through independent U.S. assets or through assets belonging to existing Cuban political groups. As to the latter, there are a number which have a political philosophy acceptable to the U.S. and which appear to have usable assets within Cuba. None of these groups, at least for the moment, appears to have sufficiently strong leadership or programs to justify its selection as a potential successor government to Castro. Consequently, any of these groups having assets in Cuba and in no way representing a Communist or Batista-type extremist political attitude will be worked with and supported from the operational (as distinct from the political) point of view.

f. A second immediate goal of a covert action program must be to try to identify political leadership that might with proper aid develop strength in Cuba adequate to overthrow and succeed Castro. As soon as such leadership can be identified, decisions will have to be taken with regard to focusing U.S. support behind such leadership and doing everything possible to accentuate its influence.

g. The budget (Annex A) requested for the covert program is of necessity an estimate. Moreover, since the period involved extends over a fairly substantial period of time (i.e. through FY 1962), the estimates have necessarily been formulated on assumptions that may never materialize, e.g., support of guerrilla groups has been budgeted on the basis of the development of such groups, activity on their part plus the desirability of providing support. In order to adjust to the actual facts as they develop, it is proposed, if the budget is approved, to request initially only 50% of the total budget and to review the situation carefully prior to further withdrawals.

3. PROPOSED PROGRAM

The activities budgeted in Annex A fall into the following categories, each of which will be briefly discussed below:

- a. Intelligence and Counter-Intelligence
- b. Political Action
- c. Propaganda
- d. Paramilitary (more appropriately identified as special activities in support of a political result).

a. Intelligence and Counter-Intelligence: It is proposed to salvage these elements of the intelligence networks and agents within Cuba which survived the recent Castro security operations and to expand the number and scope of intelligence collection activities. In addition, we plan to utilize Cuban exiles on intelligence operations, either unilaterally as Agency assets or as assets of Cuban groups with which they are associated; to expand our use of third country nationals in an operational or support capacity; and to induce defection of selected individuals in the Cuban government. Our counter-intelligence activities will concentrate on efforts to penetrate the Cuban Security Services and Communist Party and to prevent detection of our operations by the Cuban Security Services. Estimate of Fiscal Year 1962 funds required: $739,132.

b. Political Action: These operations will be devoted to exploiting those opportunities which may arise within Latin America for clandestine political actions utilizing either the Cuban Revolutionary Council (CRC) or other Cuban political groups or unilateral assets designed to further U.S. national policies or to combat Cuban subversive efforts. Moreover, particular efforts will be made to identify and support, if and when found, any opposition group with real potential given appropriate support for overthrowing Castro's regime and succeeding it. The question of how much support will be necessary and whether or not it should be provided will have to be decided at the time. Estimate of Fiscal Year 1962 funds required: $200,000.

c. Propaganda: Operations will be planned and executed with the purpose of destroying the image of Castro as a true revolutionary interested in the welfare of his people and the replacement of that image with one of the ruthless dictator who, under the false banners of revolutionary reform, has deprived his people of their basic liberties and turned their country into a Soviet satellite. This will require continued use of existing covert press, radio (including Radio Swan) and other media assets outside of Cuba as well as strengthening clandestine propaganda mechanisms inside Cuba, including underground printed propaganda, clandestine radio broadcasting station, radio and TV intrusion operations.

In addition to those activities directed at the Cuban people, we will utilize media assets and exile Cuban political and professional groups to combat Castro's propaganda efforts, to create insofar as possible a militant opposition to Castro, and to encourage a climate of support for future action against Cuba throughout Latin America.

The general breakdown of the funds required for propaganda activities is:

Regular Publications	[text not declassified]
Other Publication Activities	[text not declassified]
Radio Swan	[text not declassified]
Other Radio	[text not declassified]
Internal Clandestine Operations	[text not declassified]
Western Hemisphere and other operations	[text not declassified]

Estimate of Fiscal Year 1962 Funds Required $4,204,000

d. Paramilitary: Activities of this nature will be cautiously undertaken and will only be approved if they contribute to some desired political result, e.g., the improvement of morale or the strengthening of some political group in Cuba. Initially, emphasis will be on training of personnel (always in very small groups), building up inventories of supplies and acquisition of needed assets (e.g., boats for infiltration/exfiltration of men and matériel). The program has been estimated on the possibility of recruiting up to 100 agents during FY 1962 of whom 50 (including 10 radio operators) will be selected for possible infiltration and the remainder employed in support and operational capacities externally. The main effort in these activities will be to work with and through Cuban political groups or exiles with internal affiliations of potential political consequence.

It is contemplated that the Agency will repair and retain its present maritime assets and acquire two additional vessels with greater range in order to provide the capability for adequate support of planned activities. These vessels have been budgeted at a fairly substantial, though considered reasonable, figure. If cheaper purchases can be achieved they, of course, will be. Present maritime assets consist of one long-range vessel, three medium-range 55 to 85 foot vessels, and nine small boats suitable for deck loading on a mother ship and for fast runs in and out. These assets will be utilized in the infiltration of personnel, supplies and funds into Cuba and to exfiltrate agents, agent prospects and defectors from Cuba.

Sabotage planning will be undertaken against a small number of key and industrial targets as well as against targets of political or propaganda significance. Actual sabotage operations will be carried out only where some of the advantages mentioned in para. 2.d. above can be realized or reasonably anticipated.

Although the program does not contemplate significant direct encouragement of guerrilla bands during FY 1962, the Agency will maintain equipment to provide modest support, if requested and approved, to those guerrilla elements which might arise, either spontaneously or as an effort on the part of Cuban or Agency assets to survive.

In order to provide for the support of operations proposed by existing or emerging anti-Castro Cuban groups, we have included what we consider a reasonable amount of funds according to experience factors.

We have also concluded that it is advisable to maintain a limited air capability for possible resupply, leaflet and deception operations. Support of these activities will involve the cost of aircraft storage, readying the aircraft for operational use, crew costs and expenses for missions actually mounted. Estimate of Fiscal Year 1962 funds required: $4,610,000.

4. SUPPORT:

The primary financial need is for salaries, travel, and related expenses for personnel assigned to Cuban operations. In addition, we must provide funds for the maintenance and logistical support of a forward operating base, a maritime base, small operational or training sites, and communications facilities and equipment. These costs have not been [illegible in the original] in regular Agency budget estimates. Estimate of Fiscal Year 1962 funds required: $4,025,000.

N.B. The foregoing activities, as indicated, (particularly in connection with paramilitary operations) will be carried out in part through Cuban political groups having a political viewpoint or "platform" acceptable to the U.S. In working with these groups, the Agency will not attempt to dominate them but will give them some freedom of action. This attitude is prompted by the fact that the best political leadership often is the least willing to accept controls and may easily be lost if too restricted. Some controls, however, are necessary in order to have a sensible and businesslike arrangement. For example, any group receiving support will be required to submit a statement of its intended program, showing the type of activities it proposes to undertake, the amount of money it intends to devote to various activities, the kind of assets which it wishes to receive and how it proposes to use them. In addition, such group will be expected to keep the U.S. fully apprised of the results of its activities and to disseminate to the U.S. all intelligence obtained. On the other hand, such a group will normally not be required specifically to identify individual agents and will be given considerable freedom in the planning of proposed operations. Moreover, a group with a proven record of successful operations will, as would be expected, be granted more and more autonomy.

In view of the publicity engendered by the Agency's past operations in the Florida area, we are planning to change the physical location and cover of our primary operations bases in Florida, to utilize personnel not contaminated by exposure or relations with the former operation, and to employ cutouts and other security measures in order to assure, to the maximum extent possible, that our present operations in the area remain covert.

In addition, the above facilities and personnel will be available for the support of stay behind operations to be developed in certain other critical areas of the Western Hemisphere and not part of the Cuban program.

5. RECOMMENDATION:

It is recommended that approval be granted for the above covert action program against Cuba and that a maximum of $13,778,132 be authorized for the implementation of this program. Only 50% of this total will be withdrawn initially. Later withdrawals will depend on how the program develops.

270. Memorandum from Woodward to Johnson, July 26¹

July 26, 1961

SUBJECT

Policy Recommendations with respect to Paramilitary-Type Operations for Cuba

REFERENCE

Memorandum for Special Group of July 25, 1961, entitled "Internal Action Operations Against Cuba"

ARA agrees with the proposals contained in the memorandum of July 25, 1961, entitled "Internal Action Operations Against Cuba."

¹ Transmits a memorandum for the Special Group on internal action operations against Cuba. Secret. 8 pp. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 67-01083R, Box 1, C.T. Barnes—Chrono, Jan-Jul 1961.

This Bureau wishes to emphasize particularly its agreement with the types of minimum paramilitary actions contemplated for the immediate future while attempts will be made to assist the consolidation and expansion of opposition political action groups. The reason for this is that ARA has the general impression that sabotage or terrorism—which goes beyond the political objective of annoying the Castro Government and making its officials appear ridiculous—may have a counter-productive effect until such time as there has clearly developed a coherent opposition within Cuba.

Likewise, ARA is in agreement with the belief that any expanded operations of a paramilitary nature should follow and be the outgrowth of the development of genuine political opposition movements or increased opposition sentiment.

Consistent with these views, ARA is inclined to the view that unilateral paramilitary-type actions which are not related to any Cuban political movement are likely to be useless or even counter-productive.

ARA likewise wishes to express the hope that covert activities can be as deeply cloaked as possible in order to make it as difficult as possible to attribute these activities to the United States.

It would be greatly appreciated if ARA could be consulted with regard to any planning beyond the stage visualized in the memorandum of July 25, 1961.

Attachment

MEMORANDUM FOR

The Special Group

1. SUBJECT: Internal Action Operations Against Cuba

2. INTERNAL Situation:

a. Agency Assets. Despite the severe repressive measures instituted by the Castro regime during the April invasion period, the Agency still has in Cuba:

11 general purpose agents (active) with 3 radios.

2 general purpose agents (inactive at present).

[illegible in the original] trained propaganda agents (could be used as general purpose)

In addition the Agency has available in the U.S. ready for immediate dispatch 8 trained radio operators. Based on very recent debriefings of members of the Cuban underground opposition, we have ascertained that approximately 17 tons of arms, ammunition and miscellaneous equipment is still intact and in the hands of resistance elements in various parts of Cuba, mainly in Oriente Province and in Pinar del Rio. Apparently, there is little or no sabotage equipment (e.g. plastic detonators) so that the underground is unable to conduct such operations until some of this matériel is introduced into the island.

b. Resistant Elements Active in Cuba: A number of leaders of some of the principal internal resistance groups have recently come to the U.S. either legally or black from Cuba and have presented their estimates of internal resistance and outlined their plans. The impression which they gave was that they were being conservative in their estimates and realistic in their assessment of the availability of individuals for active work. In fact, although matters of this sort are always subject to proof, it is our present impression that they have presented a reasonably accurate picture. There is only one group of approximately 100 men located in the Encambray which is operating as a guerrilla force. The remainder of the individuals are living ostensibly normal lives in their homes and at their regular employment. They are, however, willing and able to find time for organization work and, if necessary, for small sabotage operations. The groups with their estimated militant strength are:

MRR (Artime's old group—left of center)	150
MRP (Ray's party—left).....	150
MDC (Catholic Labor Group).....	100
DRE (student organization)	75
UR (a mixed group covering a broad political area).....	75
30th of November (Labor group)	50
Rescate (remnants of Tony Varona's Authentico group).....	25
TOTAL	625

The plan presented by these leaders was based on the understanding that a movement to unify the above groups into a single opposition will, in fact, occur. Apparently, the internal opposition has recognized that its only possible salvation is unity at least until the removal of the Castro regime. Internal unity apparently has been worked out without regard for external Cuban political elements who, as it might be suspected, are not highly considered on the inside and who, according to the leaders contacted, have little political following on the inside. Specifically, the Cuban Revolutionary Council was mentioned as being unacceptable as a leadership element and, in addition, Ray was removed as the MRP leader by the MRP internal executive committee and another individual has been sent to the U.S. to take his place as the MRP U.S. representative.

Unity having been achieved, the leaders proposed a clandestine organization program to cover the entire island with the idea of uli-mately achieving an organization with a maximum of 3,000 members. All the leaders asserted that 8,000 is a perfectly feasible maximum and can be achieved by accepting for membership only solid, stable members of the opposition. The reason for limiting the numbers is that it is believed that this is a manageable membership but still sufficiently large to provide the basis for supporting any ultimate moves that might be attempted. Part of the organization effort will include the establishment of communications, both internally and from Cuba to the U.S.

All the leaders were of the opinion that gives the present situation in Cuba, some outward evidence of opposition is essential for morale purposes and as an aid to recruitment. In their unanimous opinion, this evidence is best provided by small acts of sabotage. The type of actions which they contemplate are disruption of transportation facilities through insertion of additives in gas tanks and tacks on highways; small bombings for nuisance value at political rallies and public meetings (not involving personal injury); harassment of public figures to make them and the regime appear ridiculous; and propaganda to exploit and publicize these opposition actions. The function of the internal organization, in addition to increasing its membership and forming compartmented note as indicated above, will be to collect intelligence, carry on propaganda activity, provide mechanisms for the dispatch and reception of exfiltration and infiltration of men and matériel; and to achieve the types of sabotage described above.

Although a central leader has not yet been selected, it is believed that one of the men with whom we recently had contact has a very good chance of being the individual chosen. There will, of course, be a liaison relationship between the internal groups and the Cubans in the U.S. even though the latter are not acceptable for leadership. They can, however, provide aid and advice. Moreover, assuming that they wish to infiltrate themselves at some point, it is quite possible that they can over a period of time attain a more prominent position.

3. RECOMMENDATIONS:

Based on the foregoing, it is our belief that there is a good chance of achieving the internal unification of a substantial portion of the internal Cuban opposition and an equally good chance of helping the unified party expand its membership. It is not, of course, clear how successful this expansion can be or to what extent it can evade the internal security forces. On the other hand, a failure to provide any support at this stage particularly in the light of existing specific requests would inevitably be interpreted as an affirmative decision by the U.S. to the effect that internal opposition can have no place in U.S. plans. This will surely result in either a disbanding of existing groups plus the possibility of many of them joining the other side. It will surely mean that any future effort to find opposition will be enormously increased. Since the organization period, which it is expected must last a minimum of three months and may well extend over a period of six to eight months, will be one of minimal overt activity, it will not involve the U.S. in binding commitments. Consequently, should the organization fail in its purpose, there will be no real problem in terminating support. If on the other hand, the organization period succeeds, there is no commitment to undertake further activity although it will be possible, based on the new facts, to contemplate the advisability of sterner measures.

There are rumors to the effect that considerable dissatisfaction exists in Cuba and there has even been one report from Mexico to the effect that Castro is rather rapidly losing his popular appeal. It is not our belief that these are accurate conclusions. Assuming, however, that they are, it could be argued that the U.S. policy should permit this dissatisfaction to increase on its own and not take active measures to augment it. Such a course would, it is believed, be short-sighted since, even if dissatisfaction were substantially to increase, it would be very much to the advantage of the U.S. for the future to have some association with the opposition. Moreover, the U.S. participation during the organization and build-up period should not be of such a nature as to interfere with any spontaneous dissatisfaction.

It is, therefore, recommended that:

A. The CIA be authorized to provide support to the internal opposition particularly with a view to enabling it to consolidate the proposed unity and to enlarge its membership. This support will involve money, communications, transportation (maritime) and sufficient sabotage matériel to enable the opposition to carry out small operations of the types indicated above. Authority should also be given to provide training which will undoubtedly be necessary in a number of categories such as communications, organization and intelligence work and use of sabotage equipment.

B. The CIA be authorized to continue to work with such of the Cuban elements outside of Cuba as appear to have assets available for increasing internal opposition. It is understood that care must be taken to avoid competition and conflict which could be damaging to the overall effort. In this connection it will be important to determine whether any particular movement begins to emerge as the primary and most forceful leader. If so, it will be important to decide whether or not support should be focused more directly to it. Since this is a political issue, CIA will maintain close liaison with State in analyzing its progress.

C. CIA be authorized to plan more elaborate sabotage activities as well as potential guerrilla support activities with the understanding, however, that these plans are not to be put into effect prior to their approval by the Special Group.

As the Special Group is aware, CIA is presently paying a civilian budget for the Cuban Revolutionary Council. Nothing has been said in this paper about the future of this support as it is understood that it is to be considered by the State Department in the near future. It might be said, however, that it is the CIA position that these payments should very soon be reduced in size and very probably should be terminated soon thereafter.

August 1961

271. Memorandum from Coerr to Johnson, August 2¹

August 2, 1961

SUBJECT

Program of Covert Action Directed at the Castro Regime

I recommend that you concur in the program of covert action directed at the Castro regime as described in the Agency's memorandum of August 1, 1961.

This Bureau has previously commented upon the two Agency papers which have been combined in that of August 1, and feels that the latter takes these comments into consideration. It is hoped that the internal plan of action can be fully implemented as soon as possible in the hope that the Cuban opposition can be revived and encouraged.

One consideration not noted in the memorandum is the wish of ARA to be kept fully informed of the development of the operations and fully consulted at every stage.

It is noted that the two previous papers were approved with comments by Mr. Woodward.

Attachment

1. SUBJECT:

Program of Covert Action Directed at the Castro Regime.

2. OBJECTIVE:

The basic objective of the program is to provide support to a U.S. program to develop opposition to Castro and to help bring about a regime acceptable to the U.S.

3. PROPOSED PLAN:

a. Agency Assets in Cuba: The Agency assets in Cuba which survived the recent severe repressive measures of the Castro regime consist of:

¹ Transmits a memorandum for the Special Group on program of covert action directed at the Castro regime. Secret. 13 pp. DOS, INR/IL Historical Files, S.G. 4, August 3, 1961.

[less than 1 line not declassified] intelligence agents with one radio plus several secret writing systems. (Remainder of previous stay-behind net.)

[less than 1 line not declassified] CIA singleton agents each with a secret writing system.

[less than 1 line not declassified] general purpose* agents (active) with 3 radios.

[less than 1 line not declassified] general purpose* agents (inactive at present).

[less than 1 line not declassified] trained propaganda agents (could be used as general purpose*)

b. Agency Assets outside of Cuba: Agency assets outside of Cuba but ready for use consist of:

[less than 1 line not declassified] trained intelligence and counter-intelligence agents.

[less than 1 line not declassified] trained general purpose* agents.

[less than 1 line not declassified] trained radio operators.

(*—General purpose agents are agents who in addition to intelligence collection have been trained in paramilitary activities.)

c. In addition to the foregoing, recent reports from Cuban exfilitrees justify conservative estimates of a guerrilla group of about 100 men active in the Escambray plus approximately 625 members of leading opposition parties presently living normal lives but willing to participate in organising and militant action. These individuals are distributed in various provinces and are believed to have the following party associations:

MRR (Artime's old group—left of center)	150
MRP (Ray's party—left).....	150
MDC (Catholic Labor Group).....	100
DRE (student organization)	75
UR (a mixed group covering a broad political area)	75
30th of November (labor group).....	50
Rescate (remnants of Tony Varena's Authentics group).....	25
TOTAL	625

d. The internal Cuban opposition which is presently agreed to attempt to achieve a unification of the main elements (i.e. the parties listed above) has access to caches totalling about 17 tons of arms and equipment previously infiltrated by CIA. In addition, the Agency either owns or has access to several vessels adequate for maritime operations and has continued to maintain a potential for mounting air operations. There is a complete propaganda apparatus, including weekly magazines and newspapers, newsletters, and production and placement of radio shows, covering all of Latin America. There is also Radio Swan, covering the Caribbean basin, and contacts with national and international press for exploitation of themes. Moreover, CIA is prepared to continue its present contacts with the Cuban Revolutionary Council, other politically-acceptable Cuban groups and any individuals who appear to play a key part in internal exposition activities.

e. Operational Concept: The primary objectives of the present plan are to increase insofar as possible the collection of intelligence on the internal Cuban situation and the attitude of the Cuban people particularly with regard to opposition elements; the identification of political leadership; and the recruitment of additional members of opposition groups together with the organisation of these groups into the most effective anti-Castro opposition. There is no intention to undertake for the present any paramilitary activities except insofar as they may contribute to the strengthening of the opposition. In this connection it is believed that some outside manifestation is essential for morale purposes and as an aid to recruitment. This manifestation is considered to be best provided by minor acts of sabotage such as additives in gas leaks, lacks on highways, small nuisance bombings to disrupt public meetings with no intention to injure, and harassment of public officials. Such acts should, of course, be exploited by propaganda.

No prognosis as to the success of the effort to build up the internal opposition is possible. Conversely, however, a failure to provide support to such an effort, particularly in the light of existing specific requests, would inevitably be interpreted as an affirmative U.S. decision that internal opposition has no place in U.S. planning. Such a conclusion would surely disrupt if not destroy anti-Castro elements. Should the expansion effort fail, support can always be withdrawn. Should it succeed, additional support is in no sense committed but such success would at least provide the U.S. with the opportunity to continue encouragement if it should so choose.

f. FY 1962 Operational Budget (Annex A Attached). The funds requested in the budget for each activity outlined below of the covert program are necessarily estimates and they do not contain any funds for support of political groups for the administrative support of their organizations nor for continued payments to dependents of Cubans who participated in the April invasion. A general outline of the budgeted activities follows:

(1) Intelligence: In addition to the targets mentioned above, every effort will be made to improve and expand our collection of operational intelligence on Castro's plans, intentions, and capabilities; our counter intelligence activities will concentrate on penetrating the Cuban Security Services and preventing detection of our operations by these Services.

(2) Political Action: In the political action field we will endeavor to foster support for U.S. national policies on Cuba throughout Latin America, to combat Castro's subversive efforts in that area, and to assist, where possible, in strengthening a unified opposition to Castro among the Cubans inside and outside Cuba. Particular effort will be made to identify and support, if found, any opposition group with a real potential for overthrowing and replacing Castro's regime.

(3) Propaganda: As already stated, a number of previously created propaganda assets are being supported. Consequently, the budget is fairly high without undertaking anything new. Although these existing assets are considered good, they are being reviewed to determine if any should be terminated. Meanwhile, our propaganda activities will be devoted to destroying the popular image of Castro in Cuba, and combatting Castro's propaganda efforts, creating a militant opposition to Castro, and developing a climate of support for future action against Castro throughout Latin America.

(4) Paramilitary: Our primary task will be to expand our present personnel and support assets both inside and outside Cuba, for use in working with or through Cuban groups in developing an underground organization or several such which, hopefully, will achieve island-wide coverage. After secure reorganization, this mechanism could be used in exfiltration/infiltration of personnel, supplies and matériel, intelligence collection and propaganda operations as well as in a low-key sabotage and resistance program against Castro designed to harass the regime and to maintain and mobilise the spirit of resistance among the people of Cuba. We propose to develop more elaborate large-scale sabotage activities to be performed after approval by the Special Group. Although the program does not contemplate significant direct encouragement of guerrilla hands during FY 1962, the Agency will maintain equipment to provide modest support, if requested and approved, to those guerrilla elements which might arise, either spontaneously or as an effort on the part of Cuban or Agency assets to survive. We have also budgeted funds to maintain a limited air capability for possible resupply, leaflet and deception operations.

(5) Support: The primary financial need is for salaries, travel, and related expenses for personnel assigned to Cuban operations. In addition, we must provide funds for the maintenance and logistical support of a forward operating base, a maritime base, operational or training sites, and communications facilities and equipment.

4. RECOMMENDATION:

It is recommended that approval be granted for the above covert action program against Cuba and that a maximum of $12,738,132 be authorized for the implementation of this program. Only fifty percent of this total will be withdrawn initially from the Bureau of the Budget, with later withdrawals to be dependent on a review, within six months, of the operational progress made.

Annex A

DETAILED BREAKDOWN OF FUNDS REQUIRED FOR FY 1961 FOR CUBAN OPERATIONS

Intelligence and Counter-Intelligence Operations—Total [illegible in the original]

Intelligence Collection		[text not declassified]
Collection Networks in Cuba		[text not declassified]
Agent Salaries (20 on board)	[text not declassified]
Agent Salaries (20 planned)	[text not declassified]
Courier Operations	[text not declassified]
Training, Equipment and Other Expenses	[text not declassified]
Singleton Legal Travel and Resident Agents		[text not declassified]
Agent Salaries (64 on board)	[text not declassified]
Agent Salaries (37 planned)	[text not declassified]
Principal Agents & Cutout Salaries	[text not declassified]
Training, travel & other expenses	[text not declassified]
Third Country Operations		[text not declassified]
Agent Salaries (20 planned)	[text not declassified]
Travel and Expenses	[text not declassified]
Other Operational Activity		[text not declassified]
Counter-Intelligence		[text not declassified]

Penetration Operations	[text not declassified]
Detention Operations	[text not declassified]
Other Operational Expenses	[text not declassified]
Political Action Oppositions—Total [illegible in the original]
Support for covert contacts with political leaders in third countries to influence their National policies against Castro	$ [text not declassified]
Support for covert actions in third countries to bring about support for a unified anti-Castro organization and its objectives.	[text not declassified]
Propaganda Operations—Total $[illegible in the original]
[illegible in the original] Publications	[text not declassified]
[text not declassified] (weekly)	[text not declassified]
Newspaper (daily)	[text not declassified]
News Bulletin (weekly)	[text not declassified]
Other Publication Activities	[text not declassified]
Leaflet, pamphlet production	[text not declassified]
Book and article production	[text not declassified]
Mailing Operations	[text not declassified]
Radio Swan	[text not declassified]
Other Radio	[text not declassified]
Cuban Freedom Committee cover for Swan and production of programs for broadcast from Florida Station	[text not declassified]

Maintenance and planned use of vessel for broadcasting off Cuba	[text not declassified]
Radio Equipment for use inside Cuba	[text not declassified]
Preparation and distribution of radio tapes throughout Latin America	[text not declassified]
[illegible in the original] Clandestine Operations		[text not declassified]
[illegible in the original] into Cuba for clandestine propaganda and harassment operations [text not declassified]	[text not declassified]
Western Hemisphere and Other Operations		[text not declassified]
Maintenance of selected exile Cuban groups (students, labor, lawyers) and companies for anti- Castro propaganda tours by these groups throughout Latin America	[text not declassified]
Tours of above groups to other areas of world	[text not declassified]
Operations, including placement of selected motion picture and TV footage, throughout Latin America to create opposition to Castro	[text not declassified]
Black operations (exposure of arms ostensibly from Castro for subversive actions, decreased manipulation) throughout Latin America	[text not declassified]
Funds for development of new operations or one-	[text not declassified] time propaganda

operations

Cost of personnel involved are included in the estimates for the various activities above.

Paramilitary Operations—Total $7,370,000

Recruitment, training, emplacement and support of paramilitary agents

[text not declassified]

Fee agents at $_____

[illegible in the original]
(including compensation and death benefits, etc.)

[text not
declassified]

Communications
 equipment, facilities, and special training

[text not
declassified]

Development and maintenance of maritime capabilities

[text not
declassified]

Repair of present craft

[text not
declassified]

Operating costs for one year (include crews' salaries)

[text not declassified]

Infiltration-exfiltration operations (includes infiltration of personnel, supplies, funds, and exfiltration of agents, defectors, and agent prospects)

[text not declassified]

Conduct of sabotage operations

[text not declassified]

Training and operational
 [illegible in the original], safehousing and other operational support

[text not declassified]

[text not
declassified]

Technical services and special equipment

[text not
declassified]

Raiding operations-establishment and operation of training sites

[text not
declassified]

Support of guerrilla activity	[text not declassified]
Operation control of ten [illegible in the original] or equivalent	[text not declassified]
Purchase of special devices and equipment	[text not declassified]
Support of operations as proposed by emerging Cuban groups	[text not declassified]
Development and maintenance of air capability	[text not declassified]
Support Operations—Total $4,325,000
Personnel	[text not declassified]
Salary (265) and related charges	[text not declassified]
Travel and [illegible in the original]	[text not declassified]
Other charges	[text not declassified]
Safe Establishment and Maintenance	[text not declassified]
Forward Operating Base	[text not declassified]
Maritime Base	[text not declassified]
Training and/or operational safehouses and alias	[text not declassified]
Communication Base	[text not declassified]
Support from other U.S. agencies for security, [illegible in the original], etc.	[text not declassified]
Logistics support	[text not declassified]
Logistical support or bases, safehouses, alias, (transportation, security, etc.)	[text not declassified]

Other	[text not declassified]
Legal fees, cover companies, etc.	[text not declassified]
Communication equipment and maintenance	[text not declassified]
TOTAL RECRUITMENT	$12,735,132

September 1961

272. Memorandum, September 6¹

September 6, 1961

MEMORANDUM FOR

[name not declassified]

SUBJECT

Castro's Instructions to Dorticos Before Belgrade Conference

According to sources considered reliable, Dorticos had absolute instructions from Fidel Castro and Che Guevara to have secret contact with the American Embassy in Belgrade at some time during the conference. According to these sources, there was a meeting in Castro's private apartment in Havana, attended by Castro, Guevara, Carlos Rafael Rodriguez, Roa, and Dorticos, at which it was explained that Cuba was desperate for getting some contact with the United States, and that, in order to do so, it was willing to release three or four thousand political prisoners and even hold sham elections to elect something similar to a congress. The main purpose of the attempted contact is to get back the bulk of the sugar quota.

[name not declassified]

¹ Report on Castro's instructions to Dorticos re contact with American Embassy in Belgrade during Belgrade Conference. Secret. 1 p. DOS, INR/IL Historical files, Cuba, August 1961—.

273. Memorandum for the record, September 8¹

September 8, 1961

SUBJECT

Meeting in the Office of the Under Secretary of State Ball on 8 September 1961 to Discuss Policy with Respect to the CRC

PARTICIPANTS

Under Secretary Ball, Assistant Secretary of State for Latin American Affairs, Mr.
Robert Woodward, Mr. Richard Bissell, Mr. Richard Goodwin, Mr. Park
Wollam, Mr. Robert Hurwitch, Mr. Paul Vallen and [name not declassified]

1. Mr. Woodward opened the meeting by referring to the attached document that he had written directed to Mr. Ball on the subject of U.S. relationships with Cuban exile groups. After discussing this document it was agreed to recommend approval of all recommendations with one slight change on recommendation No. 3. That recommendation would be changed from saying that U.S. assistance would be coordinated under the strictest terms of secrecy with a select small group of Cubans to saying it would be coordinated with Mr. Miro Cardona and that Miro would have full responsibility for the security of such information. It was also agreed to add a recommendation that the contacts of CIA with Miro Cardona be stepped up to a higher level in order to keep him happy and to utilize him to the greatest extent possible. It was agreed that the disbanding of the Council would be a loss and an effort should be made to work more effectively with Miro Cardona to try to maintain and increase his usefulness. It was agreed also that a budget would be worked out with Miro Cardona on the $75,000 per month level and that it would probably be more effective to work out an annual rather than a monthly budget. If special operations were proposed by the Council they would be considered for approval by CIA and upon CIA concurrence would be funded apart from the normal budget.

2. Concerning the payments of pensions to dependents of veterans of the invasion force that participated in the 17 April invasion of Cuba, the only ruling that there has been is that the President had informed Mr. Goodwin that payments should be continued for a certain amount of time. It was agreed that it is not yet time to consider cutting off these payments. Mention was made of the fact that trials of certain members of the invasion force were now just beginning in Cuba and will probably continue for just as long as they are useful to whip up revolutionary fervor in Cuba. Psychologically this would be a bad time to consider cutting off the support we are now giving to dependents of the veterans.

¹ Meeting among Ball, Woodward, Bissell, Goodwin, et al., re policy with respect to the Cuban Revolutionary Council. Secret. 1 p. CIA, DDO/DDP Files: Job 78-01450R, Box 5, Area Activity—Cuba.

[name not declassified]

DC/WHD

October 1961

273A. Survey Report by CIA Inspector General Kirkpatrick, October 1961¹

October 1961

INSPECTOR GENERAL'S SURVEY of the
CUBAN OPERATION
October 1961
TABLE OF CONTENTS

- A. Introduction
- B. History of the Project
- C. Summary of Evaluation
- D. Evaluation of Organization and Command Structure
- E. Evaluation of Staffing
- F. Evaluation of Planning
- G. The Miami Operating Base
- H. Intelligence Support
- I. The Political Front and the Relation of Cubans to the Project
- J. Clandestine Paramilitary Operations—Air
- K. Clandestine Paramilitary Operations—Maritime
- L. Clandestine Paramilitary Operations—Training Underground Leaders
- M. Security
- N. Americans in Combat
- O. Conclusions and Recommendations

ANNEXES

- A. Basic Policy Plan of 17 March 1960
- B. Briefing Paper of 17 February 1961
- C. Operational Plan of 11 March 1961

¹ Survey of the Cuban Operation with Annexes. 216 pp. Top Secret. CIA, DCI Files, History Staff Files, Job 85-00664R.

D. Operational Plan of 16 March 1961

E. Operational Plan of 12 April 1961

A. INTRODUCTION

1. This is the Inspector General's report on the Central Intelligence Agency's ill-fated attempt to implement national policy by overthrowing the Fidel Castro regime in Cuba by means of a covert paramilitary operation.

2. The purpose of the report is to evaluate selected aspects of the Agency's performance of this task, to describe weaknesses and failures disclosed by the study, and to make recommendations for their correction and avoidance in the future.

3. The report concentrates on the organization, staffing and planning of the project and on the conduct of the covert paramilitary phase of the operation, including comments on intelligence support, training, and security. It does not describe or analyze in detail the purely military phase of the effort.

4. The supporting annexes have been chosen to illustrate the evolution of national policy as outlined in Section F of the body of the report. Annex A is the basic policy paper approved by President Eisenhower on 17 March 1960. Annex B is a paper prepared by the project's operating chiefs for the briefing of President Kennedy in February 1961. Annexes C, D, and E are the planning papers successively prepared during March and April 1961 in the last few weeks before the invasion.

5. The report includes references to the roles played by Agency officials in Presidential conferences and interdepartmental meetings at which policy decisions affecting the course of the operation were taken, but it contains no evaluation of or judgment on any decision or action taken by any official not employed by the Agency.

6. In preparing the survey the Inspector General and his representatives interviewed about 125 Agency employees of all levels and studied a large quantity of documentary material.

B. HISTORY OF THE PROJECT

1. The history of the Cuban project begins in 1959 and for the purposes of the survey ends with the invasion of Cuba by the Agency-supported Cuban brigade on 17 April 1961 and its defeat and capture by Castro's forces in the next two days.

2. Formal U.S. Government adoption of the project occurred on 17 March 1960, when, after preliminary preparations by the Agency, President Eisenhower approved an Agency paper titled "A Program of Covert Action Against the Castro Regime" (Annex A) and thereby authorized the Agency to undertake this program:

a. Formation of a Cuban exile organization to attract Cuban loyalties, to direct opposition activities, and to provide cover for Agency operations.

b. A propaganda offensive in the name of the opposition.

c. Creation inside Cuba of a clandestine intelligence collection and action apparatus to be responsive to the direction of the exile organization.

d. Development outside Cuba of a small paramilitary force to be introduced into Cuba to organize, train and lead resistance groups.

3. The budget for this activity was estimated at $4,400,000. The breakdown was: Political action, $950,000; propaganda, $1,700,000; paramilitary, $1,500,000; intelligence collection, $250,000.

4. This document, providing for the nourishment of a powerful internal resistance program through clandestine external assistance, was the basic and indeed the only U.S. Government policy paper issued throughout the life of the project. The concept was classic. The Cuban exile council would serve as cover for action which became publicly known. Agency personnel in contact with Cuban exiles would be documented as representatives of a group of private American businessmen. The hand of the U.S. Government would not appear.

Preparatory Action

5. Some months of preparation had preceded presentation of this paper to the President. In August 1959 the Chief of the Agency's Paramilitary Group attended a meeting [less than 1 line not declassified] to discuss the creation of a paramilitary capability to be used in Latin American crisis situations. At this time Cuba was only one of a number of possible targets, all of which appeared equally explosive. The Chief of the Paramilitary Group prepared a series of staff studies for the Western Hemisphere (WH) Division on various aspects of covert limited warfare and urged the creation of a division paramilitary staff. He also set up a small proprietary airline in [less than 1 line not declassified] for eventual support use.

6. In September 1959 the WH Division assigned an officer to plan potential Agency action for contingencies which might develop in a number of Latin American countries. There was a lack of sufficient readily available operational information on potential target areas, so a requirement, with special emphasis on Cuba, whose Communist control was now becoming more and more apparent, was sent throughout the intelligence community, and resulted in a three-volume operational study.

7. By December 1959 these studies had produced a plan for training a small cadre of Cuban exiles as paramilitary instructors, these in turn to be used for training other Cuban recruits, in a Latin American country, for clandestine infiltration into Cuba to provide leadership for anti-Castro dissidents.

Organization of Branch

8. On 18 January 1960 the WH Division organized Branch 4 (WH/4) as an expandable task force to run the proposed Cuban operation. The initial Table of Organization totaled 40 persons, with 18 at Headquarters, 20 at Havana Station, and two at Santiago Base.

9. The branch also began negotiations for a Panama training site. Its officers reconnoitered the area of Miami, Florida, in search of suitable installations for office space, warehouses, safe sites, recruiting centers, communications center, and bases for the movement of persons, matériel, and propaganda into or out of Cuba.

10. At the same time Headquarters and the Havana Station were conducting a study of Cuban opposition leaders to prepare for the formation of a unified political front to serve as the cover instrument for clandestine operations and as a rallying point for anti-Castro Cubans. They were also making a map reconnaissance of the Caribbean, seeking a site for a powerful medium-wave and short-wave radio station.

Preliminary Progress

11. As a result of this intensive activity over a relatively brief period the Agency was able to report considerable preliminary progress and to predict early performance in a number of respects, when it carried its request for policy approval to the President in mid-March of 1960.

12. Among the facts so reported (Annex A) were: That the Agency was in close touch with leaders of three major and reputable anti-Castro groups of Cubans whose representatives, possibly together with others, would form a unified opposition council within 30 days; that the Agency was already supporting opposition broadcasts from Miami, had arranged for additional radio outlets in Massachusetts, [less than 1 line not declassified] and [less than 1 line not declassified], and that a powerful "gray" station, probably on Swan Island, could be made ready in two months; that publication of an exile edition of a confiscated Cuban newspaper had been arranged; that a controlled action group was distributing propaganda inside Cuba, and that anti-Castro lecturers were being sent on Latin American tours.

13. The President was further informed that an effective intelligence and action organization inside Cuba, responsive to direction by the exile opposition, could probably be created within 60 days and that preparations for the development of an adequate paramilitary force would require "a minimum of six months and probably closer to eight."

Policy Discussions

14. Discussion at high policy levels of the Government had preceded submission of this program to the President. In the last months of 1959 the Special Group, composed of representatives of several departments and agencies and charged by NSC 5412 with responsibility for policy approval of major covert action operations, considered several Agency proposals for exile broadcasts to Cuba. During January and February of 1960 the Director of Central Intelligence informed the Special Group of Agency planning with regard to Cuba, and on 14 March an entire meeting was devoted to discussion of the Agency's program. Concern was expressed over the length of time required to get trained Cuban exiles into action, and there was discussion of U.S. capabilities for immediate overt action if required. The Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff is reported to have said that forces totaling 50,000 men were ready if needed and that the first of them could be airborne within four hours after receipt of orders. Members of the group urged early formation of an exile junta. The Agency announced its intention of requesting funds to pursue the program, and no objections were raised by the group.

15. The project to unseat Castro had thus become a major Agency activity with the highest policy sanction, engaging the full-time activity of the personnel of a rapidly expanding operating branch, requiring a great amount of detailed day-to-day attention in higher Agency echelons and entailing frequent liaison with other agencies and departments of the Government.

16. The activities described to the President continued at an accelerated rate, but the financial approach to the project was relatively cautious in the early weeks.

Financial Preparations

17. On 24 March 1960 the project was approved by the Director of Central Intelligence in the initial amount of $900,000 for the rest of Fiscal Year 1960. However, only two weeks later, on 7 April, WH/4 Branch reported that 85% of the $900,000 had been obligated. By 30 June an additional $1,000,000 was obligated.

18. In April the Director of Central Intelligence told a meeting of WH/4 personnel that he would recall people from anywhere in the world if they were needed on the project. From January 1960, when it had 40 people, the branch expanded to 588 by 16 April 1961, becoming one of the largest branches in the Clandestine Services, larger than some divisions. Its Table of Organization did not include the large number of air operations personnel who worked on the project and who were administered by their own unit, the Development Projects Division (DPD), nor did it include the many people engaged in support activities or in services of common concern, who, though not assigned to the project, nevertheless devoted many hours to it.

19. In the early months of the project there were intensive efforts to organize an exile front group, to get a broad and varied propaganda program under way, to begin a paramilitary program, and to acquire sites in Florida and elsewhere for training and recruiting activities and for office space.

20. The so-called "Bender Group", composed of project political action officers, was set up as a notional organization of American businessmen to provide cover for dealing with the Cubans. After a series of meetings in New York and Miami a nominally unified Frente Revolucionario Democrático (FRD), composed of several Cuban factions, was agreed upon on 11 May 1960.

Propaganda Activity

21. Radio broadcasts from Miami into Cuba were continued under the sponsorship of a Cuban group. Preparations were made for exile publication of Avance, whose Havana plant had been seized by Castro. Anti-Castro propaganda operations were intensified throughout Latin America, and a boat for marine broadcasts was purchased. The Swan Island radio station, on which the President had been briefed, was completed and on the air with test signals by 17 May.

22. The action-cadre instruction training program was being prepared, and $25,000 worth of sterile arms were being sent to the Panama training base, which was activated 11 May. At the same time Useppa Island, Florida, was acquired as a site for assessment and holding of Cuban paramilitary candidates and for training radio operators. Screening of paramilitary recruits had begun in Miami in April, and the training in Panama began in June.

23. The Miami Base was opened on 25 May in the Coral Gables business district under cover of a New York career development and placement firm, backstopped by a Department of Defense contract, and on 15 June a communications site, with Army cover, was opened at the former Richmond Naval Air Station, which was held under lease by the University of Miami. Safe houses were also acquired in the Miami area for various operational uses. The use of other sites for project activities, in the United States and other countries, was acquired for varying periods as time went on.

24. Project officers were engaged in liaison on numerous matters. In April they reached an agreement with the Immigration and Naturalization Service on special entry procedure for Cubans of interest to the operation. They consulted with Voice of America and the United States Information Agency on propaganda operations. There were many discussions with the Federal Communications Commission on the licensing of Radio Swan and with the Defense Department concerning its cover. The State Department was regularly consulted on political matters.

Uneasy Front

25. Although Cuban leaders had formed a “front” at Agency urging, it was an uneasy one. They were by no means in agreement, either among themselves or with Agency case officers, on politics or on operations.

26. Power struggles developed early in the life of the FRD. The Cuban leaders wanted something to say about the course of paramilitary operations. As early as May 1960 one of the more prominent leaders was urging an invasion on a fairly large scale from a third country.

27. By June the American press was beginning to nibble at the operation, principally at Radio Swan, some of the stories implying that it was not a completely legitimate commercial venture. Another indication that operational security was less than perfect was a statement by a defected Cuban naval attaché that it was common knowledge among exiles in Miami that a certain Cuban leader was backed by the Agency and that “there were entirely too many Americans running around the area waving money.”

28. On 22 June the Deputy Director of Central Intelligence briefed the National Security Council on the project. Ultimate objective of the training program, according to the paper prepared for this briefing, was a minimum force of 500 men split into approximately 25 teams skilled in organizing, training and leading indigenous dissident groups, each team to be provided with a radio operator. Preparations were under way for creating an exile Cuban air force, and attempts were being made to develop maritime capabilities for support of paramilitary groups.

29. This briefing contained an expression of doubt that a purely clandestine effort would be able to cope with Castro’s increasing military capability, pointing out that implementation of the paramilitary phase of operations would be contingent upon the existence of dissident forces who were willing to resist and that such groups had not as yet emerged in strength.

Training in Panama

30. The air training program began to get under way in July 1960 with the screening of Cuban pilot recruits and negotiations with Defense for 12 AD–5s and the Navy being asked to supply 75 instruction and maintenance personnel.

31. In mid-June 29 Cubans had arrived in Panama to begin training in small-unit infiltration.

32. The FRD was resisting Agency attempts to persuade it to move its headquarters to Mexico and was demanding direct contact with the State Department or with some high government official in order to argue its case. It also showed reluctance to become involved in the recruiting of Cuban pilots. It presented a budget for $500,000 a month, excluding paramilitary costs, but was told it would have to get along on $131,000 and would get this only if it agreed to move to Mexico. It did agree to furnish 500 paramilitary candidates and finally gave in on the issue of moving to Mexico. It remained there only a few weeks because of harassment by the Mexican Government, in spite of prior agreements to the contrary. It appears that one reason why the FRD leaders were so reluctant to be based in a third country is that they desired to establish a direct, official channel to the U.S. Government.

Emphasis on Resistance

33. In August WH/4 Branch prepared papers for use in briefing the President and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, respectively. By about 1 November it was expected to have 500 paramilitary trainees and 37 radio operators ready for action. It was stated that this group would be available for use as infiltration teams or as an invasion force. The briefing paper for the Joint Chiefs made the point that "obviously the successful implementation of any large-scale paramilitary operations is dependent upon widespread guerrilla resistance throughout the area."

34. The paper prepared for the President's briefing identified 11 groups or individuals with whom the Agency had some sort of contact and who claimed to have assets in Cuba. The paper for the Joint Chiefs spoke of the problems of obtaining support bases and trained manpower and warned that an exile invasion force might have to be backed up by a contingency force, augmented by U.S. Army Special Forces personnel.

35. The terms "invasion", "strike", and "assault" were used in these documents although the strike force concept does not seem to have been given any sort of policy sanction until the Special Group meetings which took place toward the end of 1960.

Plan of Operations

36. The Presidential briefing paper of August 1960 outlined the plan of operations as follows:

"The initial phase of paramilitary operations envisages the development, support and guidance of dissident groups in three areas of Cuba: Pinar del Rio, Escambray and Sierra Maestra. These groups will be organized for concerted guerrilla action against the regime.

"The second phase will be initiated by a combined sea-air assault by FRD forces on the Isle of Pines coordinated with general guerrilla activity on the main island of Cuba. This will establish a close-in staging base for future operations.

"The last phase will be air assault on the Havana area with the guerrilla forces in Cuba moving on the ground from these areas into the Havana area also."

37. Expenditures were rapidly running beyond the original estimates. The WH Division estimated operating costs for four weeks starting 1 July at $1,700,000 and for the fiscal year at approximately $25,000,000. On 19 August an additional $10,000,000 was requested and obtained. About half of this figure was the estimated cost of paramilitary activities, with about another $2,000,000 estimated for propaganda.

Anti-Castro Broadcasts

38. Propaganda activity had gotten off to an early start and had developed rapidly. After an initial shakedown period Radio Swan had gone on the air first with anti-Trujillo, then with anti-Castro broadcasts. Radio programs were also originating in Miami and [less than 1 line not declassified]. The newspaper Avance in Exile was being published by the end of the summer, and a second paper and a weekly magazine were planned. There had also been some successful black operations. Most such operations had thus far been conducted without participation by the FRD.

39. By the end of August the FRD had a lawyer team set for a Latin American propaganda tour and was ready with its first broadcast on Radio Swan, which was reported to be getting world-wide reception with many listeners in Cuba. An anti-Castro comic book was being reprinted, and a Spanish-language television program was being prepared in Miami.

40. At the end of August WH/4 Branch was reporting that a machine run search had failed to find any bilingual Agency employee suitable as a Radio Swan announcer. (This search went on for some time. On 28 December the branch reported finding a candidate, but on 18 January 1961 that he had backed out.)

41. Late September 1960 saw the almost simultaneous occurrence of the first maritime operation and the first air drop over Cuba. The former was successful. The latter, the first of a series of failures, resulted in the capture and execution of a paramilitary agent on whom the project had set great store.

Maritime Operations

42. Several successful maritime operations took place during the latter months of 1960 before severe winter weather began to make them almost impossible. But the project had only one boat regularly available during this period, and the process of supplying and building up a resistance movement through clandestine means began to seem intolerably slow, especially since during this same period Castro's army was reported to have been strengthened with 30 to 40 thousand tons of Bloc arms, and Cuban internal security was being tightened.

43. The strike force concept which, as noted, had already begun to be associated with the project as early as July, began to play an ever greater role in WH/4 planning. This role became dominant in September 1960 with the assignment to the project, as chief of its Paramilitary Staff, of a Marine Corps colonel experienced in amphibious operations.

44. In late October the Nicaraguan Government offered the Agency the use of an air strip and docking facilities at Puerto Cabezas, some 250 miles closer to Cuba than the facilities in Guatemala. At about the same time, the Agency requested the Army to supply 38 Special Forces personnel as instructors. Due to prolonged policy negotiations, these trainers did not arrive in Guatemala until 12 January 1961.

Switch in Concept

45. On 4 November 1960 WH/4 took formal action to change the course of the project by greatly expanding the size of the Cuban paramilitary unit and redirecting its training along more conventional military lines. Appropriate orders were sent to the Guatemala Base, which had 475 air and ground trainees on 10 November, and to Miami where recruiting efforts were increased.

46. By this time Miami Base, through liaison with the FRD military staff, had already recruited and dispatched to Guatemala 101 air and 370 paramilitary trainees, plus six specialists (doctors, dentists, and chaplains). The base had also recruited 124 maritime personnel for manning the invasion fleet that was being acquired.

47. By 28 January 1961 the strike force strength was 644, on 3 February it was 685, by 10 March it had risen to 826, by 22 March to 973. On 6 April 1961 brigade strength was reported at 1,390.

48. On 3 November 1960 WH/4 reported it had only $2,250,000 left for the rest of Fiscal Year 1961, and by 16 December this was almost gone. A supplementary budget estimate was prepared, and an additional $28,200,000 was obtained from the Bureau of the Budget.

Freedom Fund Campaign

49. There were also financial problems on a smaller scale. To publicize Radio Swan, and perhaps to enhance its cover, the Cuban Freedom Fund Campaign was organized in November to solicit donations through newspaper advertisements. The radio station, which was budgeted at $900,000 for Fiscal Year 1961, received $330 in gifts during the next few weeks.

50. Bohemia Libre, a handsome weekly magazine, budgeted at $300,000 but actually costing about $35,000 an issue, had bad luck from the start in seeking advertising and once missed an issue on that account. Additional funds had to be sought for it several times. Yet it developed an audited circulation of 126,000, said to be second only to the Reader's Digest in the Spanish-language field.

51. While the project moved forward, acquiring boats, planes and bases, training men, negotiating with foreign governments, seeking policy clarification, training an FRD security service, publishing magazines and newspapers, putting out radio broadcasts, and attempting to move arms, men and propaganda into Cuba by sea or air, the FRD, in whose name most of this activity was being carried on, was making little progress toward unity.

52. Members would resign in a huff and have to be wheedled back. Each faction wanted supplies to be sent only to its own followers in Cuba, while groups inside were reluctant to receive infiltrates sent in the name of the FRD. The FRD coordinator had his own radio boat which made unauthorized broadcasts until halted by the Federal Communications Commission and the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Provisional Government Plans

53. Tentative plans for a provisional government were first discussed with FRD leaders in December, and this set off a flurry of intrigue and bickering which delayed the recruiting process and did nothing to advance the cause of unity. In mid-January Miami Base reported that "the over-all problem is simply to maintain the Frente (FRD) as an operational facade until military action intervenes and a provisional government can be established." Until the question of how and by whom such a government was to be selected could be answered, the base reported, "we are at political dead center."

54. This dead center remained until very near the target date and was only resolved by an ultimatum to the FRD Executive Committee directing its members to agree on the chairman for a Revolutionary Council or risk the loss of all further support.

55. However, in selective ways the FRD proved to be a responsive and useful instrument. An example of this was the counterintelligence and security service which, under close project control, developed into an efficient and valuable unit in support of the FRD, Miami Base, and the project program.

56. By mid-March 1961 this security organization comprised 86 employees of whom 37 were trained case officers, the service having graduated four classes from its own training center, whose chief instructor was a [less than 1 line not declassified] police officer.

Security Activities

57. The FRD's service ran operations into Cuba, many of them successful. It built up a voluminous set of card files on Cuban personalities. One of its most helpful services was reporting on meetings of FRD committees and other anti-Castro groups and on political maneuvering within the FRD hierarchy. It also helped in recruiting for the strike force at a time when the political leaders were sabotaging this effort. Security and counterintelligence teams were also trained for integration with the strike force. These had the primary mission of securing vital records and documents during the invasion and a secondary mission of assisting in establishing and maintaining martial law.

58. The service also carried on radio monitoring and conducted interrogations and debriefings. An indication of its alertness and efficiency is the fact that it supplied Miami Base with its first information on the location of a C-54 plane which was forced down in Jamaica after a mission over Cuba. The chief of the service was largely responsible for personally persuading the crew of the downed plane to return to the training camp.

59. In the first three months of 1961 the problems faced by the project were many and complex. Although the Army Special Forces instructors had finally arrived in Guatemala the brigade trainee quota was still only half fulfilled and a call went to the training camps for special recruiting teams to be sent to Miami. Meanwhile trainees who had been in the camp for several months had had no contact with the political front and were wondering what sort of a Cuban future they were expected to fight for. Disturbances broke out, and the project leaders persuaded three FRD figures to visit the camp and mollify the men.

Training in the U.S.

60. During this period the Nicaraguan air strip which had been placed at the project's disposal was being made ready for use and two new training sites were activated. Although a definite policy determination on the training of Cubans in the U.S. had never been made, 25 tank operators were successfully trained for the strike force at Fort Knox. Another eleventh-hour training requirement was fulfilled when the project acquired the use of Belle Chase Ammunition Depot near New Orleans. This was used for the training of a company-sized unit hurriedly recruited for a diversion landing and of an underwater demolition team.

61. During the period between the U.S. national elections and the inauguration of President Kennedy the Government's policymaking machinery had slowed down. A number of piecemeal policy decisions were vouchsafed, but not all the specific ones the project chiefs were pressing for, for example, authority for tactical air strikes and permission to use American contract pilots.

62. President Eisenhower had given a general go-ahead signal on 29 November and had reaffirmed it on 3 January 1961, but the impending change in administration was slowing matters down. For example, a proposed propaganda drop was turned down on 13 January for this reason. On 19 January, at the Special Group's last meeting before the inauguration, it was agreed that a high-level meeting, to include the new Secretaries of State and Defense, should be set up as soon as possible to reaffirm the basic concepts of the project.

Preparations Endorsed

63. Such a meeting was held 22 January, and the project and current preparations were generally endorsed. At a meeting with the new President on 28 January the Agency was authorized to continue present activities and was instructed to submit the tactical paramilitary plan to the Joint Chiefs of Staff for analysis. Shortly thereafter, in an attempt to get a high-level internal review of the plan, it was briefed to Gen. Cabell, Gen. Bull (consultant) and Adm. Wright (ONE). By 6 February the Joint Chiefs had returned a favorable evaluation of the strike plan, together with a number of suggestions.

64. On 17 February the Agency presented a paper (Annex B) to the President which outlined three possible courses of action against Castro.

65. Noting plans for early formation of a government in exile, the paper described the growing strength of the Castro regime under Bloc support and observed: "Therefore, after some date probably no more than six months away it will become militarily infeasible to overthrow the Castro regime except by the commitment to combat of a sizeable organized military force. The option of action by the Cuban opposition will no longer be open."

66. This paper found the use of small-scale guerrilla groups not feasible and advocated a surprise landing of a military force, concluding that the brigade had a good chance of overthrowing Castro "or at the very least causing a damaging civil war without requiring the U.S. to commit itself to overt action against Cuba."

67. Following presentation of this paper to the President, the project leaders were given to understand that it would be at least two weeks before a decision would be made as to use of the invasion force. They thereupon withheld action to expand the force up to 1,000 for the time being.

Movement of Agents

68. Although the invasion preparations were absorbing most of the project's energies and funds WH/4 Branch was still attempting to nourish the underground. There were six successful boat operations, carrying men and materials, in February and 13 in March, and two successful air drops in March. Infiltration of agents was continuing. As of 15 February Miami Base reported the following numbers and types of agents in Cuba: Counterintelligence, 20; positive intelligence, 5; propaganda, 2; paramilitary, 4. As of 15 March the base reported that these numbers had risen, respectively, to 21, 11, 9, and 6.

69. By the invasion date the personnel strength of Miami Base had grown to 160. The intensity of activity there during the latter months of the operation is indicated by the record of a day picked at random—it happened to be 9 February—when 21 case officers spent 140 man hours in personal contact with 125 Cubans.

70. Successive changes in the operational plan and postponements of the strike date are discussed later in this report and are documented in Annexes C, D, and E. Detailed policy authorization for some specific actions was either never fully clarified or only resolved at the eleventh hour, and even the central decision as to whether to employ the strike force was still somewhat in doubt up to the very moment of embarkation.

71. During the weeks preceding the invasion the pace of events quickened. In early March the State Department asked the Agency not to announce formation of the Revolutionary Council or to commit any untoward act until after the 5–9 March Mexico City Peace Conference. The Cubans conferring in New York disagreed on various aspects of a post-Castro platform. The Guatemala camp was having counterintelligence problems.

Sabotage Action

72. On 12 March the LCI "Barbara J" successfully launched and recovered a sabotage team in an action against the Texaco refinery in Santiago.

73. During 13–15 March project chiefs were working intensively to prepare a revised plan which would meet policy objections cited by the State Department. On the 15th the new plan was presented to the President.

74. In mid-March ten members were added to the FRD Executive Committee, the politicians continued their platform talks, and 23 March was set as deadline for choice of a chairman. An intensive defection project was started from Miami Base. A survey was started with the object of determining the trainees' knowledgeability of U.S. involvement in the strike preparations. Trainees at Guatemala were impatient, and a number had gone AWOL.

75. Jose Miro Cardona was unanimously elected Chairman of the Revolutionary Council.

76. In late March the [less than 1 line not declassified] ostensible owner of the Swan Island radio station, thanked all the sponsors of political programs and advised them that no more tapes would be required; purpose of this action was to clear the way for a unity program during the action phase of the operation. A Radio Swan listener survey had received 1,659 replies from 20 countries. Ships with strike force equipment were arriving in Nicaragua, and the Guatemala camp was still receiving trainees as late as the week of 4 April.

Overflights Suspended

77. Cuban overflights were suspended on 28 March. Two reasons have been given for this suspension: (a) that the aircraft were needed to move the strike force from Guatemala to Puerto Cabezas, Nicaragua, for embarkation on the invasion ships; (b) that the Agency wished to avoid any incident, such as a plane being downed over Cuba, which might upset the course of events during the critical pre-invasion period.

78. For a White House meeting on 29 March papers were prepared on these subjects: (a) The status of the defection program; (b) internal Cuban support which could be expected for the landing operation.

79. On 5 April the B-26 "defection" plan was prepared in an effort to knock out some of Castro's air force before D Day in a manner which would satisfy State Department objections. Project chiefs agreed that in event of a policy decision to call off the invasion they would move the troops to sea, tell them that new intelligence made the invasion inadvisable, and divert the force to Vieques Island for demobilization.

80. On 12 April at a meeting with the President it was decided that Mr. Berle would tell Miro Cardona there would be no overt U.S. support of the invasion. The President publicly announced there would be no U.S. support. On 13 April all WH/4 headquarters sections went on 24-hour duty. The Revolutionary Council was assembled in New York and advised that it would be briefed in stages on the military aspects of the project. On 14 April the Council agreed to go into "isolation" during the landing phase of the military operation.

81. The raids on three Cuban airfields were carried out by eight B-26s on 15 April, and destruction of half of Castro's air force was estimated on the basis of good post-strike photography. Afterward, according to plan, one of the pilots landed in Florida and announced that the raids had been carried out by defectors from Castro's own air force. The Council was briefed on the air strike. The diversionary expedition by the force which had been trained in New Orleans failed to make a landing on two successive nights preceding the strike.

82. Immediately before D Day, Radio Swan and other outlets were broadcasting 18 hours a day on medium-wave and 16 hours on short-wave. Immediately after D Day, these totals were increased to 55 hours and 26 hours, respectively. Fourteen frequencies were used. By the time of the invasion a total of 12,000,000 pounds of leaflets had been dropped on Cuba.

83. Late on 16 April, the eve of D Day, the air strikes designed to knock out the rest of Castro's air force on the following morning were called off. The message reached the field too late to halt the landing operation, as the decision to cancel the air strike was made after the landing force had been committed.

84. The invasion fleet which had assembled off the south coast of Cuba on the night of 16 April included two LCIs owned by the Agency, a U.S. Navy LSD carrying three LCUs and four LCVPs, all of them pre-loaded with supplies, and seven chartered commercial freighters. All these craft participated in the assault phase, except for three freighters which were loaded with follow-up supplies for ground and air forces. These vessels were armed with 50-caliber machine guns. In addition, each LCI mounted two 75-mm. recoilless rifles.

85. In addition to the personal weapons of the Cuban exile soldiers, the armament provided for combat included sufficient numbers of Browning automatic rifles, machine guns, mortars, recoilless rifles, rocket launchers, and flame-throwers. There were also five M-41 tanks, 12 heavy trucks, an aviation fuel tank truck, a tractor crane, a bulldozer, two large water trailers, and numerous small trucks and tractors.

86. The invasion brigade comprised 1,511 men, all of them on the invasion ships excepting one airborne infantry company of 177 men. The brigade included five infantry companies, a heavy weapons company, an intelligence-reconnaissance company, and a tank platoon.

87. These troops had been moved by air on three successive nights from the Guatemala training camp to the staging area in Nicaragua where they embarked on the ships which had been pre-loaded at New Orleans. The ships had moved on separate courses from Nicaragua, under unobtrusive Navy escort, to the rendezvous 40 miles offshore in order to avoid the appearance of a convoy. From there they had moved in column under cover of darkness to a point 5,000 yards from the landing area, where they met the Navy LSD. These complicated movements were apparently accomplished in a secure manner and without alerting the enemy.

88. Of the three follow-up ships, one was due to arrive from Nicaragua on the morning of D Day plus 2 and two others were on call at sea south of Cuba. Additional supplies were available for air landing or parachute delivery at airfields in Guatemala, Nicaragua, and Florida. At a Defense base in Anniston, Alabama, there were also supplies ready for 15,000 men. Altogether there were arms and equipment available to furnish 30,000 dissidents expected to rally to the invasion force.

89. The landing was to be carried out at three beaches about 18 miles from each other on the Zapata Peninsula. The left flank of the beachhead was Red Beach at the head of Cochineros Bay; Green Beach was at the right flank, with Blue Beach at the center. The lodgment to be seized was thus a coastal strip about 40 miles long, separated from the interior by an impassable swamp penetrated only by three roads from the north and flanked by a coastal road from the east.

90. In the early hours of 17 April Cuban underwater demolition teams, each led by an American contract employee, went ashore to mark Red and Blue Beaches. Each of these parties engaged in fire fights with small enemy forces but accomplished their tasks, and the troops began moving ashore in small aluminum boats and LCUs. Before daylight small militia forces were encountered at both beaches. These offered little opposition, and many of the militiamen were quickly captured.

91. Not long after daylight the airborne infantry company was successfully parachuted from C-46 aircraft to four of the five scheduled drop zones where its elements were given the mission of sealing off approach roads.

92. At dawn began the enemy air attacks which the project chiefs had aimed to prevent by the planned dawn strikes with Nicaragua-based aircraft against Castro's fields. Action by Castro's B-26s, Sea Furies, and jet T-33s resulted in the sinking of a supply ship, the beaching of a transport, and damage to an LCI. The plan for a landing at Green Beach was thereupon abandoned, and these troops, with their tanks and vehicles were put ashore at Blue Beach. Shipping withdrew to the south under continuous air attack.

93. The air attacks continued throughout the day. The 11 B-26s of the Cuban exile force which were available for close support and interdiction were no match for the T-33 jets. However, at least four of Castro's other aircraft were shot down by machine gun fire from maritime craft, assisted by friendly air support.

94. The first ground attacks by Castro's forces occurred at Red Beach which was hit by successive waves of militia in the morning, afternoon and evening of 17 April. While ammunition lasted these attacks were beaten off with heavy enemy casualties, and several of Castro's tanks were halted or destroyed by ground or friendly air action. On the morning of 18 April, the Red Beach Force, nearly out of ammunition, retired in good order to Blue Beach without being pressed by the enemy.

95. In addition to supporting the ground forces and protecting shipping on 17 April, the friendly B-26s also sank a Castro patrol escort ship and attacked the Cienfuegos airfield. Four of the friendly B-26s were shot down, while three returned safely to Nicaragua, and four landed at other friendly bases.

96. Attempts were made to resupply the brigade with ammunition by air drops. On the night of 17-18 April one C-54 drop was made at Red Beach and three at Blue Beach, and on the following night Blue Beach received two drops. Preparations for resupply by sea had to be cancelled due to enemy air action.

97. At Blue Beach the enemy ground attacks, supported by aircraft, began from three directions on the afternoon of 18 April. Six friendly B-26s, two of them flown by Americans, inflicted heavy damage on the Castro column moving up from the west, using napalm, bombs, rockets, and machine gun fire to destroy several tanks and about 20 troop-laden trucks. Air support to the Blue Beach troops was continued on the morning of 19 April, when three friendly B-26s, including two piloted by Americans, were shot down by Castro T-33s. Jet cover from the Navy aircraft carrier "Essex" had been expected to protect the 19 April sorties, but a misunderstanding over timing hampered its effectiveness.

98. In spite of this air action, however, and in spite of a reported 1,800 casualties suffered by the Castro forces, the brigade's ability to resist depended in the last resort on resupply of ammunition, which had now become impossible. On the night of 18 April, when failure appeared inevitable, the Cuban brigade commander refused an offer to evacuate his troops. And on the morning of 19 April, with ammunition rapidly running out, the brigade was still able to launch a futile counter-attack against the forces relentlessly moving in from the west.

99. In the last hours of resistance the brigade commander sent a series of terse and desperate messages to the task force command ship pleading for help:

"We are out of ammo and fighting on the beach. Please send help. We cannot hold."

"In water. Out of ammo. Enemy closing in. Help must arrive in next hour."

"When your help will be here and with what?"

"Why your help has not come?"

100. The last message was as follows: "Am destroying all equipment and communications. Tanks are in sight. I have nothing to fight with. Am taking to woods. I cannot repeat cannot wait for you."

101. An evacuation convoy was headed for the beach on the afternoon of 19 April. When it became known that the beachhead had collapsed the convoy reversed course.

102. During the next few days two Americans and a crew of Cuban frogmen succeeded in rescuing 26 survivors from the beach and coastal islands.

C. SUMMARY OF EVALUATION

1. In evaluating the Agency's performance it is essential to avoid grasping immediately, as many persons have done, at the explanation that the President's order cancelling the D-Day air strikes was the chief cause of failure.

2. Discussion of that one decision would merely raise this underlying question: If the project had been better conceived, better organized, better staffed and better managed, would that precise issue ever have had to be presented for Presidential decision at all? And would it have been presented under the same ill-prepared, inadequately briefed circumstances?

3. Furthermore, it is essential to keep in mind the possibility that the invasion was doomed in advance, that an initially successful landing by 1,500 men would eventually have been crushed by Castro's combined military resources strengthened by Soviet Bloc-supplied military matériel.

4. The fundamental cause of the disaster was the Agency's failure to give the project, notwithstanding its importance and its immense potentiality for damage to the United States, the top-flight handling which it required—appropriate organization, staffing throughout by highly qualified personnel, and full-time direction and control of the highest quality.

5. Insufficiencies in these vital areas resulted in pressures and distortions, which in turn produced numerous serious operational mistakes and omissions, and in lack of awareness of developing dangers, in failure to take action to counter them, and in grave mistakes of judgment. There was failure at high levels to concentrate informed, unwavering scrutiny on the project and to apply experienced, unbiased judgment to the menacing situations that developed.

D. EVALUATION OF ORGANIZATION AND COMMAND STRUCTURE

1. The project was organized at the level of an operating branch, the fourth echelon in the organization of the Agency, in the Western Hemisphere Division. Its chief, a GS-15, was not given the independence and the broad, extensive powers of a task force commander. Instead, he had to apply constantly for the decision of policy questions and important operational problems to the Deputy Director (Plans) (DD/P), who was in fact directing the project, although this was only one of his many responsibilities. The DD/P delegated much of his responsibility to his Deputy for Covert Action, especially the handling of policy matters involving contact with non-Agency officials. The office of the DD/P and the offices of the project were in different buildings. Consideration was given by the DD/P in late 1960 to raising the project out of WH Division and placing it directly under his Deputy for Covert Action, but this was not done.

2. The Chief of WH Division was in the chain of command between the chief of the project and the DD/P but only in a partial sense. He exercised his right to sign the project's outgoing cables until the week of the invasion even though the project's own signal center was activated at the end of December 1960. He supervised the staffing activities and attended some of the meetings of the Special Group. But the DD/P and his deputy dealt directly with the project chief, and gradually the Chief of WH Division began to play only a diminished role.

3. The DD/P, in turn, reported to the Director of Central Intelligence (DCI) and the Deputy Director of Central Intelligence (DDCI) who usually represented the Agency at the meetings of the 5412 Special Group.

4. The Director delegated his responsibility for major project decisions to a considerable extent. He relied on the DDCI, an Air Force general, for policy matters involving air operations. For military advice he relied on the military officers detailed to the project. This reliance deprived the Director of completely objective counsel, since the project's military personnel were deeply involved in building up the strike force and the DDCI was taking an active role in the conduct of air operations.

Fragmentation of Authority

5. Thus, the project lacked a single, high-level full-time commander possessing stated broad powers and abilities sufficient for the carrying out of this large, enormously difficult mission. In fact, authority was fragmented among the project chief, the military chief of the project's Paramilitary Staff, and several high-level officials, whose wide responsibilities elsewhere in the Agency prevented them from giving the project the attention it required. There were too many echelons; the top level had to be briefed by briefers who themselves were not doing the day-to-day work.

6. Three further extraordinary factors must be mentioned:

(1) The Chief of Operations of the Clandestine Services (COPS), who is the DD/P's chief staff advisor on clandestine operations, played only a very minor part in the project. On at least two occasions COPS was given express warning that the project was being perilously mis-managed, but he declined to involve himself with the project.

(2) The three Senior Staffs, the Agency's top-level technical advisors in their respective areas, were not consulted fully, either at the important formative stages of the project or even after grave operational difficulties had begun to develop; instead, they allowed themselves to be more or less ignored by the chief of the project and his principal assistants. This state of affairs is partly attributable to the inadequate managerial skill and the lack of experience in clandestine paramilitary operations of the WH/4 chiefs; it was not corrected by the DD/P or his deputy or by the Chief of WH Division.

(3) There was no review of the project by the Agency's Project Review Committee, which would at least have allowed the views of the most senior review body in the Agency to be heard.

Independence of DPD

7. Still another important factor in the diffusion of direction and control was the insistence of the Agency's air arm, the Development Projects Division (DPD), on preserving its independence and remaining outside the organizational structure of the project, in which it had a vital, central role, including air drops to the underground, training Cuban pilots, operation of air bases, the immense logistical problems of transporting the Cuban volunteers from Florida to Guatemala, and the procuring and servicing of the military planes. The project chief had no command authority over air planning and air operations. The DPD unit established for this purpose was completely independent.

8. The result was a divided command dependent upon mutual cooperation. There was no day-to-day continuing staff relationship, which is essential for properly coordinated operations. Headquarters of the two units were in different buildings far away from each other. The chiefs of air operations in Guatemala and Nicaragua were DPD representatives, independent of the WH/4 chiefs of these bases, and the Headquarters confusion was compounded in the field.

9. In October 1960, shortly after his assignment to the project, the paramilitary chief noted coordination difficulties between WH/4 and DPD. He pointed out that the organizational structure was contrary to military command principles, to accepted management practices, and to the principles enunciated by the DD/P himself in 1959, and recommended that the DPD unit be integrated into WH/4, under command of its chief.

Failure of Integration Effort

10. The DD/P rejected this recommendation as not being the most efficient solution for technical reasons. The insufficiently effective relationship between the project and the DPD unit was one of the gravest purely organizational failures of the operation. The DD/P has subsequently confirmed this conclusion and has ascribed this lack of effectiveness to personality frictions and to the "classic service rivalry." (We would note that this does not exist in present-day combined commands.)

11. The organizational confusion was augmented by the existence of a large forward operating base in the Miami area, which in turn had loose control over several sub-bases. The mission of this base was vaguely defined and not well understood. In theory the base had a supporting role; actually it was conducting operations which for the most part paralleled similar operations being conducted by WH/4 from Headquarters. This divided effort was expensive, cumbersome, and difficult to coordinate. In some cases the efforts of the two elements were duplicating or conflicting or even competing with each other.

12. The upshot of this complex and bizarre organizational situation was that in this tremendously difficult task the Agency failed to marshal its forces properly and to apply them effectively.

E. EVALUATION OF STAFFING

1. In April 1960 the Director of Central Intelligence stated that he would recall from any station in the world personnel whose abilities were required for the success of the project. This recognition of the need for high-quality personnel is nowhere reflected in the history of the project. The DD/P's Deputy for Covert Action advised his subordinates that the Director's words did not mean that the project was to be given carte blanche in personnel procurement but that officers could be adequately secured through negotiation.

2. In actual fact, personnel for the project were secured by the customary routine method of negotiation between the project and the employee's office of current assignment; no recourse was had to directed assignment by the Director of Central Intelligence. The traditional independence of the 55 individual division and branch chiefs in the Clandestine Services remained unaffected by the Director's statement. The lists prepared by the project for the purpose of negotiation for personnel naturally reflected the preferences of the chief of the project and the willingness of the person in question to accept the assignment. In many cases, the reason for assigning a given person to the project was merely that he had just returned from abroad and was still without an assignment.

3. The basic mistake was made of filling the key spots early, without realizing how much the project would grow and that it should be staffed for a major effort. In some cases, officers originally selected to supervise five persons ultimately had to supervise 15 or 20 times as many. Of the three GS-16 officers assigned to the project, none was given top-level managerial responsibilities. The result of all these factors was that none of the most experienced, senior operating officers of the Agency participated full time in the project.

An Indication of Quality

4. An interesting insight into the quality of the personnel of WH/4 is afforded by the initial "Relative Retention Lists" prepared in April 1961 by the divisions and senior staffs of the Clandestine Services and other Agency units pursuant to the requirements of Regulation 20-701 (Separation of Surplus Personnel). Each such unit was required to group its officers in each grade into ten groups, on the basis of the performance and qualifications of each one. (Under the prescribed procedure, these lists are to be reviewed at several levels before becoming definitive.)

5. Of the 42 officers holding the principal operational jobs in WH/4 in grade GS-12 through GS-15, 17 officers were placed in the lowest third of their respective grade, and 9, or 21% in the lowest tenth. The ratings of 23 of these 42 were made by WH Division, which placed seven in the lowest third, and 19 were rated by other units, which together placed ten in the lowest third.

6. It is apparent from these ratings that the other units had not detailed their best people to WH/4 but had in some instances given the project their disposal cases.

7. Furthermore, although the project eventually included the large number of 588 personnel, there were long periods in which important slots went unfilled, due to difficulty in procuring suitable officers. For example, the counterintelligence officer of the Miami Base was never supplied with a case officer assistant, there was a long period in which the project professed inability to find a CI officer for the Guatemala Base, and months were spent in search of an announcer for Radio Swan. Few Clandestine Services people were found who were capable of serving as base chiefs; the support services had to supply most of them. All of the paramilitary officers had to be brought from outside WH Division, or even from outside the Agency. (Air operations presented no staffing problem for WH/4, since DPD supplied its own people.)

8. There were in fact insufficient people to do the job during the latter stages of the project. Personnel worked such long hours and so intensively that their efficiency was affected. Personnel shortages were one of the reasons why much of the work of the project was performed on a "crash" basis.

Scarcity of Linguists

9. Very few project personnel spoke Spanish or had Latin-American background knowledge. In a number of instances those senior operating personnel in the field stations that did speak Spanish had to be interrupted in their regular duties merely in order to act as interpreters. This lack occurred in part because of the scarcity of Spanish linguists in the Agency and in part because WH Division did not transfer to the project sufficient numbers of its own Spanish speakers.

10. There were many other examples of improper use of skilled personnel. In many instances, case officers were used merely as "hand-holders" for agents and technical specialists were used as stevedores. Some of the people who served the project on contract turned out to be incompetent.

11. Staffing of the project was defective because the whole Clandestine Services staffing system, with absolute power being exercised by the division and branch chiefs, is defective. Each division seeks to guard its own assets; scanty recognition is given to the respective priorities of the various projects.

12. In spite of the foregoing, there were a great many excellent people in the project who worked effectively and who developed considerably in the course of their work. It should also be emphasized that, almost without exception, personnel worked extremely long hours for months on end without complaint and otherwise manifested high motivation, together with great perseverance and ingenuity in solving the manifold problems that the project constantly raised. It should be stated that in general the support people sent to the project by the support component were of excellent quality and effective performance.

13. Unfortunately, however, while many persons performed prodigies of effort, these were often directed towards overcoming obstacles which better organization and management would have eliminated. Such efforts were especially necessary (a) in support of the chimera of "non-attributability" of the operation; (b) in negotiating with the Armed Services for equipment, training personnel, etc., which the Agency should have been able to request as of right; and (c) in providing the support for an overt military enterprise that was too large for the Agency's capabilities.

F. EVALUATION OF PLANNING

1. Before proceeding to an evaluation of the Agency's planning, the over-all policy decisions of the United States Government with reference to the Cuban operation will first be stated in summary form. These decisions not only constituted the background against which Agency planning was conducted but also presented numerous important factors that limited or otherwise determined its scope.

2. We will next endeavor to point out the various occasions on which we believe that the Agency officials responsible for the project made serious planning errors, both of commission and of omission, which affected the project in vital respects.

3. Between the plan approved by President Eisenhower on 17 March 1960 (Annex A) and the invasion plan actually carried out on 17 April 1961 (Annex E) there was a radical change in concept. Originally the heart of the plan was a long, slow, clandestine build-up of guerrilla forces, to be trained and developed in Cuba by a cadre of Cubans whom the Agency would recruit, train and infiltrate into Cuba.

4. But thirteen months later the Agency sponsored an overt assault-type amphibious landing of 1,500 combat-trained and heavily armed soldiers. Most of them were unversed in guerrilla warfare. They were expected to maintain themselves for a period of time (some said a week) sufficient to administer a “shock” and thereby, it was hoped, to trigger an uprising.

Discard of Original Plan

5. By November 1960 the original planning paper (Annex A) had for practical purposes ceased to exist as a charter for Agency action. By that date the Special Group had come to be unanimously of the opinion that the changed conditions, chiefly Castro’s increased military strength through Soviet support and the increased effectiveness of his security forces, had made the original covert activities plan obsolete.

6. The Special Group had, however, not yet agreed on a substitute plan and strong doubt was expressed whether anything less than overt U.S. forces would suffice to obtain Castro’s downfall. But there appeared to be agreement that, whatever the ultimate decision, it would be advantageous for the United States to have some trained Cuban refugees available for eventual use, and that CIA should continue to prepare such a force.

7. At the end of November 1960, the Agency presented a revised plan to President Eisenhower and his advisors. This included (a) infiltration into Cuba by air of 80 men in small paramilitary teams, after reception committees had been prepared by men infiltrated by sea; (b) an amphibious landing of a team of 650–700 men with extraordinarily heavy firepower; (c) preliminary air strikes against military targets. CIA stated that it believed it feasible to seize and hold a limited area in Cuba and then to draw dissident elements to the landing force, which would then gradually achieve enough stature to trigger a general uprising. At this stage of the planning, clandestine nourishment of resistance forces was still an important element, though now overshadowed by the overt strike force concept.

8. President Eisenhower orally directed the Agency to go ahead with its preparations with all speed. But this meeting occurred during the U.S. political interregnum and the proposed target date was later than 20 January 1961, so that in effect the President's instructions were merely to proceed and to keep the preparations going until the new Administration should take office and should make the definitive decisions, especially whether and under what circumstances the landing should take place.

Search for Policy Decisions

9. As an example of the decision-making process, at the meeting of the Special Group held 8 December 1960 the Agency requested authorization (a) to make propaganda leaflet flights over Cuba; (b) to screen non-official U.S. personnel for use in maritime operations; (c) to resupply Cuban resistance elements from U.S. air bases at the rate of two flights a week. Only the first authorization was given at that time.

10. In mid-January 1961 various major policy questions were, at CIA's request, under discussion by the Special Group. These included: (a) use of American contract pilots for tactical and logistical air operations over Cuba; (b) use of a U.S. air base for logistical flights to Cuba; (c) commencement of air strikes not later than dawn of the day before the amphibious assault and without curtailment of the number of aircraft to be employed from those available; (d) use of Puerto Cabezas, Nicaragua, as an air-strike base and maritime staging area.

11. In the end only one of these policy questions was resolved in the affirmative, that with regard to the use of Puerto Cabezas. It should be especially noted that the project's paramilitary chief had strongly recommended that the operation be abandoned if policy should not allow adequate tactical air support.

Conflicting Views

12. The raising of these questions and the failure to resolve many of them demonstrates the dangerous conflict between the desire for political acceptability and the need for military effectiveness. It also indicates the fluctuating policy background against which the officers running the project had to do their day-to-day business. This policy uncertainty was, in several respects, never satisfactorily resolved right up to the very hour of action, and many problems arose out of the changing limitations to which authority to do certain things was subjected in the name of political necessity.

13. Thus, during the months immediately preceding the inauguration on 20 January 1961, the Agency was recruiting and training Cuban troops and otherwise proceeding with a changed plan not yet definitely formulated or reduced to writing, with no assurance that the invasion, which was now the essence of the plan, would ultimately be authorized by the new Administration. The Agency was driving forward without knowing precisely where it was going.

14. The first formal briefing of President Kennedy and his advisors took place on 28 January 1961. (He had received briefings on earlier occasions, even before his election.) At this meeting there was a presentation, largely oral, of the status of preparations, and President Kennedy approved their continuation. But there was still no authorization, express or implied, that military action would in fact eventually be undertaken.

15. In the ensuing weeks, the Director of Central Intelligence and the Deputy Director (Plans), accompanied in some instances by other Agency representatives, attended a number of meetings with the new President and his advisors. (The paper prepared for a 17 February meeting is appended as Annex B.) In the course of these meetings, the Agency presented three informal planning or “concept” papers, dated 11 March 1961, 16 March 1961 and 12 April 1961, each a revision of its predecessor (Annexes C, D and E, respectively). These papers served chiefly as the bases for oral discussions at these meetings.

Successive Alterations

16. According to our information, the revised concept, as exposed by the paper of 12 April 1961, was apparently acceptable to the President although he indicated he might order a diversion. Before that he had authorized the Agency to proceed with mounting the operation, but had reserved the right to cancel at any time. The President was advised that noon on the 16th was the last hour for a diversion. The DD/P checked with Mr. Bundy shortly after noon on the 16th, and no diversion being ordered, authorized the landing to proceed.

17. These three papers disclose that, starting with the World War II commando-type operation outlined in the 11 March 1961 paper (Annex C), the plan had been swiftly and successively altered to incorporate four characteristics which had been deemed essential in order to ensure that the operation would look like an infiltration of guerrillas in support of an internal revolution and would therefore be politically acceptable.

18. The four characteristics were:

- a. an unspectacular night landing;
- b. possibility of conducting air operations from a base on seized territory;
- c. a build-up period, after the initial landing, to precede offensive action against Castro's forces, and
- d. terrain suitable for guerrilla warfare in the event the invasion force could not hold a lodgment.

19. The airfield requirement obliged the planners to shift the invasion site from Trinidad to Zapata. The former area was close to the Escambray Mountains and therefore offered better guerrilla possibilities, but only the latter had a suitable airfield.

20. The third paper also introduced a plan for a guerrilla-type, diversionary landing in Oriente Province two days before the strike and provided that supplies should be landed at night during the initial stages. It also provided for air strikes on military objectives at dawn of D Day as well as on D Day minus 2.

Guerrilla Role

21. Close reading of the three papers also discloses that the invasion was no longer conceived as an effort to assist Cuban guerrilla forces in a coordinated attack. The papers make no claim that significant guerrilla forces existed with whom—after evaluative reports from our own trained agents, confirming their strength, sufficiency of arms and ammunition, and their readiness—we had worked out plans for a coordinated, combined insurrection and attack against Castro. As the 12 April 1961 paper expressly states, the concept was that the operation should have the appearance of an internal resistance.

22. With reference to the strength of the resistance in Cuba, the 11 March 1961 paper refers to an estimated 1,200 guerrillas and 1,000 other individuals engaging in acts of conspiracy and sabotage, but it makes no claim of any control exercised by the Agency or even that coordinated plans had been made and firm radio communications established.

23. The 12 April 1961 paper states the estimate at “nearly 7,000 insurgents” (without specifying the number of guerrillas included therein), who were “responsible to some degree of control through agents with whom communications are currently active.” It locates these in three widely separate regions of the island and states that the individual groups are small and very inadequately armed and that it was planned to supply them by air drops after D Day, with the objective of creating a revolutionary situation.

24. The foregoing language suggests existence of 7,000 insurgents but refrains from claiming any prospect of immediate help from trained guerrilla forces in being. The term “insurgents” seems to have been used in the sense of “potential” insurgents or mere civilian opponents of Castro. A statement about military and police defectors was similarly vague; the Agency was in touch with 31 such persons whom it hoped to induce to defect after D Day.

Arrests of Agents

25. These tacit admissions of the non-existence of effective, controlled resistance in Cuba correspond to the intelligence reports which clearly showed the unfavorable situation resulting from the failure of our air supply operations and the success of the Castro security forces in arresting our agents, rolling up the few existing nets, and reducing guerrilla groups to ineffectiveness.

26. It is clear that the invasion operation was based on the hope that the brigade would be able to maintain itself in Cuba long enough to prevail by attracting insurgents and defectors from the Castro armed services, but without having in advance any assurance of assistance from identified, known, controlled, trained, and organized guerrillas. The Agency hoped the invasion would, like a deus ex machina, produce a “shock”, which would cause these defections. In other words, under the final plan the invasion was to take the place of an organized resistance which did not exist and was to generate organized resistance by providing the focus and acting as a catalyst.

27. The Agency was matching the 1,500-man brigade, after an amphibious landing, against Castro’s combined military forces, which the highest-level U.S. intelligence (USIB reports entitled “The Military Buildup in Cuba”, dated 30 November 1960 and 9 February 1961, respectively) estimated as follows: The Revolutionary Army—32,000 men; the militia—200,000 men; employing more than 30 to 40 thousand tons of Bloc-furnished arms and heavy matériel of the value of $30,000,000.

28. It is difficult to understand how the decision to proceed with the invasion could have been justified in the latter stages of the operation. Under the Trinidad plan (Annex C), access to the Escambray Mountains for possible guerrilla existence might have constituted some justification for the enormous risks involved. This justification did not apply to the Zapata area which was poor guerrilla terrain and offered little possibility for the break-out of a surrounded invasion force. The lack of contingency planning for either survival or rescue of the brigade has never been satisfactorily explained.

29. The argument has been made that the Agency’s theory of an uprising to be set off by a successful invasion and the maintenance of the battalion for a period of a week or so has not been disproved. It was not put to the test, this argument goes, because the cancelled D-Day air strikes were essential to the invasion’s success. Such an argument fails in the face of Castro’s demonstrated power to arrest tens of thousands of suspected persons immediately after the D-Day-minus-2 air strikes and the effectiveness of the Castro security forces in arresting agents, as demonstrated by unimpeachable intelligence received.

Views of Joint Chiefs

30. Agency participants in the project have sought to defend the invasion plan by citing the approval given to the plan by the Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS). To this argument, members of the JCS have replied, in the course of another inquiry, (1) that the final plan was presented to them only orally, which prevented normal staffing; (2) that they regarded the operation as being solely CIA's, with the military called on to furnish various types of support and the chief interest of the JCS being to see to it that every kind of support requested was furnished; (3) that they went on the assumption that full air support would be furnished and control of the air secured and on the Agency's assurances that a great number of insurgents would immediately join forces with the invasion forces; and (4) that, in the event the battle went against them, the brigade would at once "go guerrilla" and take to the hills.

31. The Agency committed at least four extremely serious mistakes in planning:

a. Failure to subject the project, especially in its latter frenzied stages, to a cold and objective appraisal by the best operating talent available, particularly by those not involved in the operation, such as the Chief of Operations and the chiefs of the Senior Staffs. Had this been done, the two following mistakes (b and c, below) might have been avoided.

b. Failure to advise the President, at an appropriate time, that success had become dubious and to recommend that the operation be therefore cancelled and that the problem of unseating Castro be restudied.

c. Failure to recognize that the project had become overt and that the military effort had become too large to be handled by the Agency alone.

d. Failure to reduce successive project plans to formal papers and to leave copies of them with the President and his advisors and to request specific written approval and confirmation thereof.

32. Timely and objective scrutiny of the operation in the months before the invasion, including study of all available intelligence, would have demonstrated to Agency officials that the clandestine paramilitary operations had almost totally failed, that there was no controlled and responsive underground movement ready to rally to the invasion force, and that Castro's ability both to fight back and to roll up the internal opposition must be very considerably upgraded.

33. It would also have raised the question of why the United States should contemplate pitting 1,500 soldiers, however well trained and armed, against an enemy vastly superior in number and armament on a terrain which offered nothing but vague hope of significant local support. It might also have suggested that the Agency's responsibility in the operation should be drastically revised and would certainly have revealed that there was no real plan for the post-invasion period, whether for success or failure.

Existence of Warnings

34. The latest United States Intelligence Board, Office of National Estimates, and Office of Current Intelligence studies on Cuba available at that time provided clear warning that a calm reappraisal was necessary.

35. But the atmosphere was not conducive to it. The chief of the project and his subordinates had been subjected to such gruelling pressures of haste and overwork for so long that their impetus and drive would have been difficult to curb for such a purpose. The strike preparations, under the powerful influence of the project's paramilitary chief, to which there was no effective counterbalance, had gained such momentum that the operation had surged far ahead of policy. The Cuban volunteers were getting seriously restive and threatening to get out of hand before they could be committed. The Guatemalan Government was urging the Agency to take away its Cubans. The rainy season was hard upon the Caribbean. The reappraisal never happened, though these very factors which helped prevent it should have warned the Agency of its necessity.

36. These adverse factors were compounded and exacerbated by policy restrictions that kept coming one upon another throughout a period of weeks and right up until the point of no return. These caused successive planning changes and piled up more confusion. Rapidly accumulating stresses, in our opinion, caused the Agency operators to lose sight of the fact that the margin of error was swiftly narrowing and had even vanished before the force was committed. At some point in this degenerative cycle they should have gone to the President and said frankly: "Here are the facts. The operation should be halted. We request further instructions."

Consequences of Cancellation

37. Cancellation would have been embarrassing. The brigade could not have been held any longer in a ready status, probably could not have been held at all. Its members would have spread their disappointment far and wide. Because of multiple security leaks in this huge operation, the world already knew about the preparations, and the Government's and the Agency's embarrassment would have been public.

38. However, cancellation would have averted failure, which brought even more embarrassment, carried death and misery to hundreds, destroyed millions of dollars' worth of U.S. property, and seriously damaged U.S. prestige.

39. The other possible outcome—the one the project strove to achieve—was a successful brigade lodgment, housing the Revolutionary Council but isolated from the rest of Cuba by swamps and Castro's forces. Arms were held in readiness for 30,000 Cubans who were expected to make their way unarmed through the Castro army and wade the swamps to rally to the liberators. Except for this, we are unaware of any planning by the Agency or by the U.S. Government for this success.

40. It is beyond the scope of this report to suggest what U.S. action might have been taken to consolidate victory, but we can confidently assert that the Agency had no intelligence evidence that Cubans in significant numbers could or would join the invaders or that there was any kind of an effective and cohesive resistance movement under anybody's control, let alone the Agency's, that could have furnished internal leadership for an uprising in support of the invasion. The consequences of a successful lodgment, unless overtly supported by U.S. armed forces, were dubious.

The Choice

41. The choice was between retreat without honor and a gamble between ignominious defeat and dubious victory. The Agency chose to gamble, at rapidly decreasing odds.

42. The project had lost its covert nature by November 1960. As it continued to grow, operational security became more and more diluted. For more than three months before the invasion the American press was reporting, often with some accuracy, on the recruiting and training of Cubans. Such massive preparations could only be laid to the U.S. The Agency's name was freely linked with these activities. Plausible denial was a pathetic illusion.

43. Insistence on adhering to the formalities imposed by a non-attributability which no longer existed produced absurdities and created obstacles and delays. For example, the use of obsolete and inadequate B-26 aircraft, instead of the more efficient A-5s originally requested, was a concession to non-attributability which hampered the operation severely. A certain type of surgical tent requested for the landing beach was not supplied because it could be traced to the U.S. A certain modern rifle was not supplied, for the same reason, although several thousand of them had recently been declared surplus. In the end, as could have been foreseen, everything was traced to the U.S.

44. U.S. policy called for a covert operation and assigned it to the agency chartered to handle such things. When the project became blown to every newspaper reader the Agency should have informed higher authority that it was no longer operating within its charter. Had national policy then called for continuation of the overt effort under a joint national task force, vastly greater man-power resources would have been available for the invasion and the Agency could have performed an effective supporting role. The costly delays experienced by the Agency in negotiating for support from the armed services would have been avoided.

Piecemeal Policy

45. In the hectic weeks before the strike, policy was being formed piecemeal and the imposition of successive restrictions was contracting the margin of error. The last of these restrictive decisions came from the President when the brigade was already in small boats moving toward the Cuban shore. Had it come a few hours earlier the invasion might have been averted and loss of life and prestige avoided.

46. If formal papers outlining the final strike plan in detail and emphasizing the vital necessity of the D-Day air strikes had been prepared and left with the President and his advisors, including the Joint Chiefs, with a request for written confirmation that the plan had received full comprehension and approval, the culminating incident which preceded the loss of the Cuban brigade might never have happened.

47. We are informed that this took place as follows: On the evening of 16 April the President instructed the Secretary of State that the D-Day strikes set for the following morning should be cancelled, unless there were overriding considerations to advise him of. The Secretary then informed the Deputy Director of Central Intelligence, the Director being absent from Washington, and the Deputy Director (Plans) of this decision, offering to let them call the President at Glen Ora if they wished. They preferred not to do so, and the Secretary concluded from this that they did not believe the strikes to be vital to success.

A Civilian Decision

48. Earlier that evening the project chief and his paramilitary chief had emphatically warned the DD/P to insist that cancellation of the strikes would produce disaster. Thus the DD/P, a civilian without military experience, and the DDCI, an Air Force general, did not follow the advice of the project's paramilitary chief, a specialist in amphibious operations. And the President made this vital, last-minute decision without direct contact with the military chiefs of the invasion operation.

49. The President may never have been clearly advised of the need for command of the air in an amphibious operation like this one. The DD/P was aware that at least two of the President's military advisors, both members of the Joint Chiefs, did not understand this principle. This might well have served to warn the DD/P that the President needed to be impressed most strongly with this principle, by means of a formal written communication, and also have alerted him to the advisability of accepting the Secretary's invitation to call the President directly.

50. If the project's paramilitary chief, as leader of the overt military effort, had accompanied the DDCI and the DD/P to the meeting with the Secretary he might have brought strong persuasion to bear on the decision.

51. This fateful incident, in our opinion, resulted in part from failure to circulate formal planning papers together with requests for specific confirmation.

Shifts in Scope

52. The general vagueness of policy and direction permitted a continual shifting of the scope and scale of the project, that is, the type of operational planning commonly referred to as “playing it by ear,” and this in turn led to various kinds of difficulties about people, money, supplies and bases.

53. A staffing guide prepared in May 1960 listed a total of 235 personnel required for the foreseeable future (107 being on board). By September, the strength had been built up to 228. In October another staffing guide listed a total of 363 positions. By the end of the project, 588 people were working in WH/4. There were 160 people in the Miami area alone.

54. The original plan contemplated 200 to 300 Cubans as a contingency force. By mid-July, a force of 500 was being considered. In early November, the plan was to use 1,500 men, and there was talk of as many as 3,000. In early December, a brigade of 750 was agreed upon. Its strength was built up to 664 by the end of January. By 17 March the ground forces in training numbered 973. By 28 March equipment for 1,600 men had been ordered, and the actual brigade strength on 6 April was 1,390. Such changes made it very difficult for the supporting components, particularly the Office of Logistics and Development Projects Division, who were not given much lead time.

55. The original estimate for the project anticipated expenditures to the total of $4,400,000 during the two fiscal years, 1960 and 1961. On 24 March 1960, $900,000 was released for the balance of Fiscal Year 1960. This amount was expended within a month and an additional million dollars released to carry the project to the end of June.

56. In August, a budget was presented for Fiscal Year 1961 which amounted to $13,000,000. By December, $11,300,000 had been obligated and an additional $28,200,000 was requested and authorized. In May 1961, an additional $5,000,000 was requested to meet obligations incurred. The total amount of money for this project for Fiscal Years 1960/61, instead of $4,400,000, was more than $46,000,000.

57. When the project started, it was not realized that bases would be needed at Useppa Island, Key West, Miami, and Opa-locka, Florida; New Orleans, Puerto Rico, Panama, Guatemala, and Nicaragua, as well as innumerable safe houses and other facilities. Consequently the project suffered, because many of these facilities were not ready when needed. The WH Division launched into a large paramilitary project without the bases, the boats, the experienced paramilitary personnel, or a complete and sufficient plan, and never really caught up.

G. THE MIAMI OPERATING BASE

1. The confused relationships between WH/4 headquarters and the forward operating base in the Miami area were a significant factor in the over-all performance of the project mission. The base was activated in late April 1960 and was put in Miami mainly because it was the chief center of Cuban refugees in the United States.

2. From the beginning, the DD/P and his associates took a firm stand against allowing this base to become more than a small support organization, and until September 1960 the base did little except carry on liaison with the Cuban exile organizations and U.S. law enforcement agencies. For example, there was only one paramilitary officer at the base during this period.

3. The DD/P's Chief of Operations wrote in June 1960: "I recognize your need for some operational personnel in the Miami area to service and conduct certain activities there. I am firmly opposed, however, to the growth of an organization which would represent a second headquarters or intermediate echelon there." At this same time, the DD/P's Assistant for Covert Action emphasized that the function of the forward operating base should be one of coordination, with command remaining in Headquarters.

4. In August the DD/P wrote that he was worried about Miami and wanted to be sure that "we are not duplicating there any functions that are being performed in Headquarters. For instance, I am not quite clear what are the duties of the PM types there since this component is neither a headquarters nor a training installation nor even a forward command post." And in another memo in November, he again urged that WH/4 be especially careful to avoid any duplication of effort between Miami and Headquarters.

Duplication of Effort

5. By this time there was plenty of duplication. Headquarters and the Miami Base had become engaged in many parallel or overlapping operations and were even competing with each other. Both components were handling all kinds of agents and in some cases the same ones. The only activity that Miami did not get into was air operations, but even here it necessarily had a role in many of the clandestine air drops.

6. There was a general feeling at Headquarters that the forward base existed solely for support and that Headquarters was in the best position to handle operations because it had ready access to policy guidance and fast radio communications to and from all elements. This view ignored the fact that much of the communication with Cuba was only by secret writing and couriers; that Miami was the main source of information, politicians, agents, and soldiers for the project; that it was the logical location for infiltration and exfiltration; that the base, through the maintenance of effective liaison, had the complete cooperation of the local FBI, the Border Patrol, Immigration, Coast Guard, FCC, Customs, Navy, and police officials.

7. Except for the Director of Central Intelligence, who visited the base, top Agency officials concerned with the project did not have first-hand knowledge of what was being done and what could be done at Miami. The limitations they placed on base activities had serious consequences. For example, when the resistance organizers being trained in Guatemala were ready to go into Cuba in September, the maritime capability to infiltrate them did not yet exist. By the time the base had built up some capabilities in various lines, valuable months had been lost.

The Miami View

8. On the other hand, there was a general feeling at the base that it should be a "station", conducting operations just as Havana was able to do (up to the date when diplomatic relations were broken off), with Headquarters providing support, guidance and policy. This view failed to realize that a station with several hundred people would have been very difficult to conceal, that it would have cost a million dollars to move everyone to Miami, and that Headquarters would have gotten into the operations anyhow, due to the easy access to Miami from Washington, especially by telephone.

9. The letter of instructions to the base chief, dated 6 October 1960, was pretty vague. It stated that he would have authority over all project personnel and responsibility for the supervision of any project activities conducted through the Miami area from other areas. It authorized him to use personnel, matériel, facilities and funds for the accomplishment of the over-all Agency mission. He was made responsible to the chief of the project.

10. The first intelligence (FI) case officer reported to the base in September 1960 and proceeded to acquire, train and direct agents. At the time of the invasion, the Miami Base had 31 FI agents in Cuba, all of whom were reporting and all of whom had been recruited by the base.

The CI Section

11. The counterintelligence (CI) section began to function in mid-July 1960. By the time of the strike, this section had 39 carefully selected, highly educated Cubans trained as case officers to form a future Cuban Intelligence Service; also, 100 selected Cubans trained as future CI officials and civil government officials; also, a reserve of 100 older non-political individuals trained as a reserve intelligence corps.

12. The paramilitary (PM) section was opened in late June 1960 with one officer. His job was to conduct liaison with the Cuban leaders in order to obtain recruits for the Guatemala camps. A second PM officer reported in August, and at this time there was a beginning of an attempt to infiltrate arms, ammunition and personnel into Cuba clandestinely by boat. (These were the “PM types” whose duties had mystified the DD/P.) There were also two maritime “types” who were training the crew of a borrowed small boat for clandestine trips.

13. By 15 November 39 people had been assigned to the Miami base in addition to 44 people from the Agency’s Office of Communications. In addition to support elements, there were sections for propaganda, FI, CI, political action, and PM.

14. By 15 April 1961, the base and its sub-base had 160 persons assigned, as follows:

10	FI
5	CI
2	Political Action
7	Propaganda
25	Support
26	PM
14	Security
68	Communications
3	Miscellaneous

15. While the Havana Station was still operating, Miami Base was in close touch with it by courier and secure communications. When Havana Station was closed, Miami expected to take over the stay-behind assets, such as they were. However, Headquarters took over their control. Miami concentrated on the training and infiltration of agents.

PM Support Role

16. In PM activities, control was tightly held by Headquarters, and the PM section of the base was limited pretty much to providing support in recruiting soldiers and running small boat operations. This tight control meant that the PM officers at the base looked to Headquarters for guidance rather than to the chief of base. The PM and other sections had their own channels to Headquarters, and this led to uncontrolled action and considerable confusion. PM officers in Key West, a sub-base of Miami, also sometimes communicated directly with Headquarters.

17. There are alleged to have been cases in which a Headquarters decision was conveyed to the Miami Base by three persons simultaneously, each over the telephone. The result of this was that the base had an enormously high phone bill and the base chief often was not informed of events until after they were over, if at all.

18. The Miami case officers retained their agents as long as the agents were reporting by secret writing. Once the agents reported by radio, they were taken over by Headquarters. This was resented by the Miami case officers, who felt that they were in the best position to know the agents, having recruited and trained them.

19. Case officers in Headquarters, on the other hand, felt that Miami case officers tried to steal their agents when they passed through the Miami area. One agent who visited Headquarters received promises of money and support which went far beyond what the case officer in Miami had offered. The base was not informed of these promises until the agent mentioned them. For the next several months, this particular agent was unmanageable and would not even meet with the Miami case officer. This was naturally viewed as Headquarters meddling.

Examples of Confusion

20. Case officers in Miami also felt that they were unduly handicapped in that Headquarters was not only competing with them but also reviewing their actions, which was something like playing a game with the umpire on the other team. It is doubtful that a reviewing component can maintain objectivity when it is also competing with the component whose activities it is reviewing.

21. Numerous examples could be cited to illustrate the confusion that existed. The divided control over maritime operations is discussed elsewhere in this paper. There was an expensive fiasco over some special lubricating oil additive intended for sabotage use in Cuba. The organizational arrangement made necessary hundreds of telephone calls and cables which otherwise would not have been sent, and the areas for uncertainty and misunderstanding were still considerable. For example, a Miami cable of 15 February referred to an agent message and asked, "Does Headquarters intend to answer and arrange this operation?"

22. The general situation also led to an extraordinary number of temporary-duty trips back and forth between Washington and Miami. These were not only expensive but added a great many problems in the way of support and security.

23. In December 1960 the base chief pointed out to Headquarters that the base needed "clarification and specification of the requirements it is expected to fulfill and tasks that it is expected to perform, together with the investment of sufficient authority and discretion for the operational action which may be involved." In March 1961 he pointed out that "the base would welcome more precise requirements for its agents than had been received up to that time in the interests of making efficient use of them."

24. In May 1961 he wrote a memorandum on control of denied-area operations which pointed out that future operations should either be controlled from Headquarters or from a forward operating base, but that the divided control which had existed during the project had resulted in parallel, sometimes duplicative and conflicting efforts and in operational relationships which were competitive, without purpose, and sometimes counter-productive.

25. The inspectors agree that this divided effort represented an ineffective and uneconomical use of time, money, and matériel, and less than maximum utilization of Agency employees, plus unexploited, delayed or poorly coordinated use of Cuban agents and assets.

H. INTELLIGENCE SUPPORT

1. The WH/4 Branch had not only the responsibility for the Cuban project but also the normal area duties of a geographical unit in the Clandestine Services. Besides being considered a task force with the mission of overturning the Castro government, it also had the Headquarters desk responsibility for Cuba, including support of Havana Station and Santiago Base until the break in diplomatic relations.

2. This arrangement required WH/4's intelligence (FI) section to collect intelligence on Cuba not only for the task force, with its special requirements, but also for the entire U.S. intelligence community, with its diverse and long-range needs.

3. The section was plagued with personnel shortages from the start, but as long as the U.S. Embassy in Havana remained open, thus assuring communications, it received and processed a good yield of intelligence from Cuba, chiefly on political, economic, and Communist Party matters. Late in 1960 the section was directed to place emphasis on military information, but it found that its agents in Cuba lacked access to high-level military sources.

4. The FI section transmitted copies of all the reports it processed to the paramilitary section as well as to the rest of its regular intelligence customers.

The Net in Havana

5. The section devoted considerable effort to supporting Havana Station in preparing its agents for stay-behind roles in the event of a break in diplomatic relations. When the embassy finally closed on 3 January 1961 the station had a single net for positive intelligence. It comprised some 27 persons, 15 of whom were reporting agents and the rest radio operators, cutouts and couriers. The principal agents and one of the radio operators were U.S. citizens and thus had doubtful status after the break in relations.

6. In September 1960 as the military invasion concept was beginning to gain ascendancy in project planning, the chief of the project created a G-2 unit. But instead of placing this unit directly under himself as a project-wide unit and making its chief a member of his immediate staff, he put it in the paramilitary section under the aggressive Marine Corps colonel who became the paramilitary unit chief at about that time.

7. As chief of this low-echelon intelligence unit, whose analyses were to have important influence on an action vitally affecting national security and prestige, WH/4 brought in an officer of undoubted ability but of limited experience in paramilitary and FI operations. It was a grave error to place this G-2 unit in such a subordinate position in the project, and this error produced the serious consequences described below.

Function of G-2 Unit

8. The paramilitary G-2 unit consisted of four officers and several secretaries. Its principal function was to prepare intelligence annexes to the successive invasion plans. Its sources of information included, in addition to the FI section's reports, photographic intelligence, cartographic intelligence, Special Intelligence, armed services reports, and messages received from the paramilitary section's own agents in Cuba. Reports from the armed services were procured rapidly through direct informal liaison rather than through the usual slower channels.

9. In various ways the functioning of the regular FI section, which was directly under the project chief, was adversely affected by the paramilitary G-2 unit.

10. The PM unit absorbed the available personnel. The chief of the FI section was not invited to attend WH/4 staff meetings, and for security reasons, he never had access to WH/4's war room. During the final weeks the FI section was not permitted to examine the PM section's incoming operational cables for possible positive intelligence content. The FI section chief did not have a clearance for photographic intelligence.

Lack of Liaison

11. There was no close liaison between the two sections, and this resulted in some duplication in preparation of reports requested by the DD/P, because neither section would learn of the requests made of the other. Until the end of 1960 the two sections were housed in different buildings.

12. The most serious consequence of the third-echelon position of the G-2 unit was that it concentrated in the hands of the unit chief the dual function of receiving all the information available from Government-wide sources, including that from the agents of his own paramilitary section, and of interpreting all these data for the purpose of supplying intelligence support to the various invasion plans.

13. Interpretation of intelligence affecting the strike force aspect of the operation was thus entrusted to officers who were so deeply engaged in preparations for the invasion that their judgments could not have been expected to be altogether objective. This circumstance undoubtedly had a strong influence on the process by which WH/4 arrived at the conclusion that the landing of the strike force could and would trigger an uprising among the Cuban populace. This conclusion, in turn, became an essential element in the decision to proceed with the operation, as it took the place of the original concept, no longer maintainable, that the invasion was to be undertaken in support of existing and effective guerrilla forces.

14. Irrespective of the validity of that conclusion, it is clear that the interpretative analysis should have been made not by the persons who were working day and night to prepare the invasion but by an objective and disinterested senior interpretation specialist from the Agency's FI Staff or from its Office of Current Intelligence.

Intelligence Support Vacuum

15. Another serious error in the field of intelligence support was that Miami Base received almost no intelligence support from the Headquarters G-2 section. This may be attributed to the facts that the paramilitary chief was almost completely preoccupied with the strike force preparations and that his subordinate G-2 was not given project-wide responsibilities and to the rigid security restrictions under which the paramilitary section was expected to operate, as well as to the general confusion in the organizational position of the Miami Base.

16. This serious support vacuum at Miami was compounded because the base, in spite of its large size and the fact that it was deeply engaged in its own operations in Cuba, had no intelligence support section. There was no single officer or unit charged with responsibility for interpreting the considerable amount of intelligence derived directly from base sources and from Special Intelligence.

17. Furthermore no photographic intelligence was available to Miami Base, which had no officer with a clearance entitling him to receive it. There was substantially no intelligence support covering the Cuban beach areas or the political situation inside Cuba. There was no analysis or interpretation of Special Intelligence, and there was no mechanism to call critical material to anyone's attention.

18. The result of this highly defective state of affairs was that individual Miami case officers were forced to rely upon their own interpretation of the separate intelligence reports, instead of having this material interpreted for them by specialists. They were not given a number of other items of operational intelligence which were in existence in the G-2 unit of the paramilitary section at Headquarters.

I. THE POLITICAL FRONT AND THE RELATION OF CUBANS TO THE PROJECT

1. The Cuban opposition front, as conceived by the Agency in consultation with the State Department, was to have the following characteristics:

- a. Full restoration of the 1940 Cuban constitution.
- b. Return to the basic principles of the revolution, as enunciated in the 1958 Caracas Declaration.
- c. Pro-Western and strongly anti-Communist orientation.
- d. Political complexion ranging from a little to the right of center to somewhat left of center.
- e. Ability to muster the broadest possible support from the Cuban population.

2. The functions of such a front organization were conceived to be:

- a. A cover for covert action against the Castro regime.
- b. A catalyst and a rallying point for anti-Castro groups variously reported to number 178, 184, or 211.
- c. A possible nucleus for a provisional government of Cuba following Castro's downfall.

3. The terms of reference thus excluded followers of the former dictator, Fulgencio Batista. They also excluded extreme leftists.

4. Exclusion of the Batistianos and other ultra-conservatives caused one kind of problem. Many of the exiles had been Batista followers. Many of them were rich and had assets, such as boats and followers, which could be used. Some had military experience. Some of them had American friends who were influential enough to urge their claims to consideration upon the White House.

The Leftist Fringe

5. Exclusion of the far-left fringe caused another kind of problem. It was hard to tell how far left some persons were. And some of those whose political acceptability was questionable nevertheless claimed such substantial following inside Cuba that it was difficult to ignore them.

6. In forming the Frente Revolucionario Democrático (FRD) the Agency focussed its attention principally on personalities and groups who had either participated in Castro's government or supported his revolution but had become disillusioned and gone into opposition.

7. In early 1959 the Havana Station was already assessing a wide variety of anti-Castro personalities with whom it was in contact. In mid-1959 a station agent was exploring the possibility of covert support to the Montecristi Movement of Justo Asencio Carrillo Hernandez.

8. In the mid-1950s the Montecristi group had been active against Batista, who exiled Carrillo. He returned after the revolution to take an important banking post but found Castro's Communist tendencies intolerable and went into opposition again. His group is described as liberal and progressive but rejecting any accommodation with Communism.

The Organizing Committee

9. Carrillo was one of several Cuban figures whom the Agency induced to defect in late 1959 or the early months of 1960. Others were Manuel Francisco Artime Buesa, Jose Ignacio Rasco Bermudez, and Manuel Antonio Varona Loredo. It was these four who, after long negotiations, formed the organizing committee of the FRD in May 1960.

10. Artime, who is still under 30, joined Castro's movement as an anti-Batista student. Under instructions from the Catholic Church he organized a group of 4,000 Catholic Action students to gain the farmers' help against Batista. The view has been expressed that he was the Jesuits' penetration of the 26 July Movement. Castro gave him a high post in National Agrarian Reform Institute (INRA) from which he resigned after ten months to form the Movement to Recover the Revolution (MRR), composed in part of his former Catholic Action followers. This exile opposition group provided a large proportion of the recruits for the strike force.

11. Rasco, a college and university classmate of Castro's, is a lawyer and history professor, described as a nice young intellectual without much talent for action. In the fall of 1959 he became the first president of the Christian Democratic Movement (MDC), an anti-Communist Catholic group which Castro drove underground in April 1960 at which time Rasco fled the country.

12. Varona's career in government and in opposition politics goes back to the 1920s. During the regime of President Prio Socarras he held several important posts, including that of prime minister, and was responsible for anti-Communist policies and measures. He collaborated with Castro until the Communist pattern of the new regime became evident, coming to the U.S. in April 1960. Before leaving Havana he had presented a plan for Castro's overthrow, including a unified opposition and U.S. aid for developing propaganda and military capabilities.

The Political Spectrum

13. Varona was representative of the older opposition parties (Autentico and Ortodoxo) which had survived both Batista and Castro and which were roughly in the middle of the political spectrum. Artime's group also occupied a centrist position, but its membership was drawn from the younger generation on Cubans. Carrillo and Rasco appeared to be a little left and a little right of center, respectively.

14. Thus the original group of organizers represented a fairly broad range of political views. They were joined in June 1960 by Aureliano Sanchez Arango who claimed leadership of the AAA group, the initials possibly representing Asociacion de Amigos de Aureliano. Both Sanchez Arango and Varona claimed to have considerable following in the Cuban labor field. Sanchez Arango and his followers appeared to have some general knowledge of the use of clandestine techniques.

15. These five associated themselves in issuing a manifesto at Mexico City on 22 June 1960. This document called upon Cubans, other Latin Americans and the world at large to help the FRD overthrow Castro's dictatorship. The FRD pledged itself to establish a representative democratic government with full civil liberties under the 1940 Cuban constitution. It pledged free general elections within 18 months of establishment of a provisional government. It proposed to ban the Communist party and institute a program of social and economic progress for all classes of Cubans.

16. Varona's maturity and experience led to his selection as coordinator, in effect, general manager, of the FRD. This immediately precipitated the resignation of Sanchez Arango and in turn led to the beginning of a problem in establishing and maintaining FRD unity which the project never fully solved.

Change in Policy

17. The FRD had originally been conceived as the channel through which all of the project's aid to the Cuban cause would flow. However, Sanchez Arango's walkout threatened a loss of assets and capabilities which the project wanted to preserve. The result was expressed as follows in a briefing prepared by WH/4 for CINCLANT in November 1960:

"In October we made a change in operational policy. Heretofore we had kept our efforts centered on the FRD; however, we will now consider requests for paramilitary aid from any anti-Castro (and non-Batista) group, inside or outside Cuba, which can show it has a capability for paramilitary action against the Castro regime. We feel that the combination of our controlled paramilitary action under the FRD aegis and the lesser-controlled operations of other Cuban revolutionaries will bring about a considerable acceleration of active anti-Castro expressions within Cuba. We will, in any event, have the lever of support as a mechanism for influencing the ultimate emergence of one individual or group as the primary figure in the anti-Castro community."

18. Because of the gregariousness of Cuban exiles, the project was unable to prevent this change in policy from becoming known to the FRD executive committee. When the Bender Group, now generally understood by Cubans and many others to represent the CIA, began responding to requests from and giving support to defectors from the FRD and to groups which the FRD considered politically unacceptable, the organization which was supposed to be a world-wide symbol of Cuban freedom and which was being groomed as the nucleus of the next government of Cuba naturally felt that its prestige had been undermined.

Diffusion of Effort

19. This complicated relations between project case officers and the FRD leaders. It also appears to have resulted in some diffusion of effort in the attempts at clandestine infiltration of arms and paramilitary leaders into Cuba. It seriously hampered progress toward FRD unity, sharpened internal FRD antagonisms, and contributed to the decline in strike force recruiting efforts.

20. The composite political complexion of the FRD shifted a little to the right in August 1960 with the joining of Ricardo Rafael Sardinia, who headed an organization called the Movimiento Institucional Democrático (MID).

21. A source of friction between the FRD and its project sponsors was the effort to induce it to set up its headquarters outside the U.S. The Cuban leaders were finally persuaded by financial leverage to move to Mexico City where the Mexican Government had agreed to be hospitable. Housing and office space were arranged for the executive committee members and their families and for a project case officer and his secretary. [less than 1 line not declassified] in Mexico City was reactivated for support duties, such as [less than 1 line not declassified] and the move was made.

22. However, the Mexican Government appears not to have kept its word, and the Cubans were subjected to surveillance and other harassment. Within a few weeks it became evident that the situation was intolerable, and everybody moved back to Miami, which is where the Cubans wanted to be in the first place.

The Bender Group

23. The man responsible for laying the groundwork of the FRD, arranging a long series of meetings among the Cubans, and persuading them to merge their differences and issue a joint manifesto, was the chief of the project's political section. He was known to the Cubans and inevitably to the press as "Frank Bender". The Bender Group, for reasons of plausible denial, purported to be composed of U.S. businessmen who wanted to help overthrow Castro. The Cubans do not seem to have cared whether this was true or not, but the guise irritated them because they wanted to be in direct touch with the U.S. Government at the highest level possible.

24. Bender's linguistic accomplishments did not include Spanish and this may have diluted his effectiveness in dealing with Cubans.

25. After the FRD was launched the handling of purely FRD affairs in Mexico City and later in Miami was turned over to a case officer with fluent Spanish and long experience in Latin American affairs.

26. However, Bender continued to be identified with the project. The FRD leaders' antagonism toward the Bender Group was sharpened when, at the time of the change in operational policy noted above, WH/4 assigned Bender the responsibility of dealing with Cuban individuals and groups outside of the FRD framework.

The Rubio Padilla Group

27. One of the outside groups the project continued to work with was the Action Movement for Recovery (MAR), headed by Juan Rubio Padilla. Use of this conservative group of rich landlords was strongly advocated by William D. Pawley, an influential Miami businessman. A paper prepared by WH/4 for the Director of Central Intelligence's use in briefing Senator Kennedy in July 1960 stated MAR's claims to a widespread resistance organization needing only arms and ammunition and orders to go into action and called the MAR relationship a most encouraging development.

28. However, Rubio was too conservative for the FRD's taste, and the MAR was never incorporated into the FRD.

29. An organization which resisted incorporation in the FRD until March 1961 and which meanwhile had a stormy relationship with the Bender Group was the Movimiento Revolucionario del Pueblo (MRP), headed by Manuel Antonio Ray Rivero. Ray had been Castro's minister of public works until he lost his job to a Communist. He arrived in this country in November 1960 and agreed to accept assistance from the Bender Group but wished to maintain his freedom of choice. The project's unilateral use of Ray resulted in some successful maritime operations.

30. Bender's efforts to get Ray to join the FRD produced strained relations, but in December Ray agreed to accept military aid through the FRD. Ray's program appeared to be identical with Castro's but without Communism and without hostility to the United States. Ray became less intransigent as time went on and in February and March 1961 was participating in talks with Bender and Varona on the formation of the Revolutionary Council which he ultimately joined. There seems to be no substance to allegations in the press that Ray was ignored. In fact, his unsubstantiated claims to wide underground resources are said to have been received uncritically by some project personnel.

Contact with Batistianos

31. Another allegation which gained some currency was that the project was supporting and otherwise using former associates and supporters of Batista. At one point WH/4 did have contact with one ex-Batista leader, Sanchez Mosquera, and gave some support to his group, but this effort was soon called off. There were also attempts by Batistianos to penetrate the project's military effort, but these were resisted. The FRD's own intelligence section was active in attempting to screen out Batistianos. The strike force contained some members of the former Cuban Constitutional Army, which existed under Batista, but these were recruited as soldiers not as politicians.

32. The brigade officers seem to have been clean of the Batista taint. However, the FRD, for whom they were supposedly fighting, justly complained that it had had no hand in their selection.

33. Jose Miro Cardona, a distinguished lawyer who turned to politics late in his career, was the first Cuban prime minister after the Castro revolution, was later ambassador to Spain, and was ambassador-designate to the United States when he broke with Castro, took asylum in the Argentine Embassy, and was eventually granted safe conduct to this country (in October 1960) where he became the FRD's secretary-general for public relations.

34. Under the guidance of Bender he became a strong force for unity in the FRD during its most difficult period, the virtual political interregnum before the inauguration of President Kennedy. Miro was influential in bringing Ray into the Revolutionary Council which was formed on 20 March with Miro as chairman.

Visit to Training Camp

35. Miro, with other Council members, visited the strike force in Guatemala on 29 March in a much-needed effort to spur troop morale. There had been far too little contact between the FRD and the soldiers being trained in its name. Artime, Varona, and Antonio Jaime Maceo Mackle had been there in February in an attempt to calm mutinous spirits. The last previous visit had been made in the fall of 1960 by Col. Eduardo Martin Elena, head of the FRD's military staff and a former constitutional Army officer. Martin Elena antagonized the trainees, and with the beginning of straight military training under a U.S. Army officer, who had no interest in Cuban politics, a ban was placed on visits to the camp by Cuban politicians.

36. This was probably a mistake and an unreasonable interference in the Cubans' management of their own affairs. Controlled contact between the FRD and the troops could have done much to improve the morale and motivation of the troops and make the training job easier. There was nobody in the Guatemala camp who could answer the political questions of the trainees, who were all volunteers and deserved to know what kind of a future they were preparing to fight for. Furthermore, the FRD needed a chance to develop the loyalty of the troops who were presumably to install and protect its leaders on Cuban soil as members of a provisional government.

37. This was one example of a high-handed attitude toward Cubans that became more and more evident as the project progressed. Cubans were the basic ingredient for a successful operation and, although the aim of having the exiles direct activities was probably idealistic and unattainable, nevertheless the Agency should have been able to organize them for maximum participation and to handle them properly to get the job done.

An American Operation

38. But with the Americans running the military effort, running Radio Swan, and doing unilateral recruiting, the operation became purely an American one in the exile Cuban mind, and in the public mind as well. In by-passing the Cubans the Agency was weakening its own cover.

39. The official attitude which produced this situation is reflected in the project's progress reports. In November a report noted that the Agency had "plenty of flexibility to choose the Cuban group we would eventually sanction as a provisional government." A January report indicated that the Agency, rather than the Cubans, was making the plans and decisions: "We have charted five different lists of proposed assignments for any future provisional government of Cuba and are compiling biographic data on those Cubans who might be utilized by us in forming a future Cuban government."

40. The crowning incident which publicly demonstrated the insignificant role of the Cuban leaders and the contempt in which they were held occurred at the time of the invasion. Isolated in a Miami safe house, "voluntarily" but under strong persuasion, the Revolutionary Council members awaited the outcome of a military operation which they had not planned and knew little about while Agency-written bulletins were issued to the world in their name.

41. They had not been puppets in the early days of the project. Some of the Cubans had drawn up detailed operational plans for resistance in areas of Cuba that they knew intimately; others provided cover and support. One wealthy exile even voluntarily went through the assessment routine at Useppa Island along with the young trainees. They had reason to feel that the project was in the nature of a joint venture, at least.

The Military Emphasis

42. But when the project began to shift from a clandestine operation to a military operation, Cuban advice and participation no longer seemed necessary. Cubans who up to about November 1960 had been close to some of the plans and operations were cut out. To the military officers on loan to the project, the problem was a military one, and their attitude was "to hell with the Revolutionary Council and the political side."

43. The paramilitary and the political action sections of WH/4 were not in effective touch with each other; in effect, they treated their tasks as unrelated, and this was reflected in the field. The diminished relationships with the Cuban leaders were a measure of the extent to which people in the project became carried away by a military operation.

44. The effective utilization of Cubans and cooperation with them was also hampered to some extent because many of the project officers had never been to Cuba, did not speak Spanish, and made judgments of the Cubans on very slim knowledge. (A notable exception was the propaganda section, which was well qualified in this respect.) They considered the Cubans untrustworthy and difficult to work with. Members of the Revolutionary Council have been described to the inspectors as “idiots” and members of the brigade as “yellow-bellied.”

45. However, many staff employees in the project realized that the Cubans would have to be dealt with realistically and allowances made for their differences and weaknesses. In some instances, case officers achieved quite remarkable rapport with the Cubans they were handling. These officers were ones who had had considerable experience in dealing with foreign nationals in various parts of the world, and the results showed it.

Dealing with Cubans

46. Some military officers on loan to the project were less successful in dealing with Cubans. They simply gave military orders to these foreign nationals and expected to be obeyed.

47. Some of the contract employees, such as ships' officers, treated the Cubans like dirt. This led to revolts, mutinies, and other troubles. Some very able Cubans withdrew from the project because of the way they were treated.

48. The inspecting team has received a definite impression that this operation took on a life of its own, that a number of the people involved became so wrapped up in the operation as such that they lost sight of ultimate goals.

49. There is a substantial question whether any operation can be truly successful when the attitudes toward the other people are so unfavorable. There does not seem to be much excuse for not being able to work with Cubans. If this nationality is so difficult, how can the Agency possibly succeed with the natives of Black Africa or Southeast Asia?

50. The Agency, and for that matter, the American nation is not likely to win many people away from Communism if the Americans treat other nationals with condescension or contempt, ignore the contributions and the knowledge which they can bring to bear, and generally treat them as incompetent children whom the Americans are going to rescue for reasons of their own.

J. CLANDESTINE PARAMILITARY OPERATIONS—AIR

1. The first attempt at a clandestine air drop over Cuba took place on 28 September 1960. (By coincidence this was the same night as the first maritime operation.) A 100-man arms pack was dropped for an agent rated as having considerable potential as a resistance leader. The crew missed the drop zone by seven miles and dropped the weapons on a dam. Castro forces scooped them up, ringed the area, caught the agent and later shot him. The airplane got lost on the way back to Guatemala and landed in Mexico. It is still there.

2. This operation might have indicated an unpromising future for air drops. In fact, its failure was influential in persuading the chiefs of the project of the futility of trying to build up an internal resistance organization by clandestine means, and within the next few weeks the operational emphasis was beginning its fateful swing toward the overt strike-force concept. To this extent the portent of failure was heeded, but it did not suffice either to halt the air drops or to ensure arrangements for their success. The attempts went on and on with results that were mostly ludicrous or tragic or both.

3. On 26 December 1960, Headquarters received word that a Cuban agent, who had been given Agency training in this country, wanted an air drop of not more than 1,500 pounds of demolition and sabotage matériel and weapons. He clearly specified the layout and the location of the drop zone, and also the amounts and kinds of matériel desired. WH/4 cabled this requirement to the air base in Guatemala, where all the flights originated. However, the Development Projects Division (DPD) then cabled Guatemala that arms and ammunition would be dropped with food to make a maximum load, also 200 pounds of leaflets for a drop elsewhere. This cable was not coordinated with WH/4, which sent a message to the agent the following day stating that a cargo drop would take place as requested and that the weight would be 1,500 pounds.

Rice and Beans

4. A drop was made on 31 December. The 15-man reception team received, not only 1,500 pounds of matériel which was different from the original request because the specific items could not be packed in waterproof containers in time, but also 800 pounds of beans, 800 pounds of rice and 160 pounds of lard.

